This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. PREFACE.

In the fifty-third volume of the WEEKLY REPORTER the characteristics of the publication will be found unaltered. Every endeavour has been made to render the reports succinct and accurate, and they have been published as soon as possible after the decisions have been pronounced. It is believed that the cases in this volume may be cited with the confidence which the Profession has always placed in the WEEKLY REPORTER.

The Annual Digest contains a summary of the cases published from the 7th of November, 1904, to the 26th of August, 1905 (both inclusive), in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and from the beginning of September, 1904, to the end of August, 1905, in the Law Reports, the Law Journal Reports, and the Law Times Reports.

THE

WEEKLY REPORTER,

1904-1905.

Court of Appeal.

From K. B. Div.
(Earl of Halsbury, L.C., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.) — Oct. 25.

ALDRICH v. BRITISH GRIFFIN CHILLED IRON AND STEEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Costs—Security for costs—Bond of foreign company—Ord. 65, r. 7.

There is no general rule that the bond of a foreign company will not be accepted as security for costs.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., in chambers.

The plaintiff was a subject of, and resident in, the United States of America, and as the trustee in bankruptcy of an American company he brought the present action against the defendants in the High Court of Justice in England. The defendants thereupon obtained an order that the plaintiff, being a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, should give security for their costs of the action to the amount of £80. The plaintiff offered as security a bond of the Fidelity and Deposit Co. of Maryland, which the defendants objected to as being the bond of a foreign company. The Fidelity and Deposit Co. of Maryland was incorporated under the laws of the State of Maryland, in the United States of America, in 1894, and had since then carried on business in many places in the United States. In 1901 the company opened an office in London, and for the purpose of better securing the guarantee bonds of the company issued in the United Kingdom, the company by deed transferred a sum of £50,000 invested in Consols to three trustees—namely, Lord Revelstoke, Sir Clinton Dawkins, and John Pierpont Morgan, jun. By the deed no part of the abovementioned sum was to be paid or transferred to the company until it was proved to the reasonable satisfaction of the trustees that there were no guarantee bonds issued by the company in the United Kingdom outstanding and unprovided for. It was stated in the affidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiff that the company's bonds had been accepted by the Board of Trade, and also in the Chancery and Probate and Admiralty Divisions.

An application was thereupon made to the master, who, after consulting the other masters of the King's Bench Division, refused to accept the proposed security upon the ground that there was a general rule that the bond of a foreign company would not be accepted as security. Upon appeal, Phillimore, J., in giving judgment, said that the company was a sound company, having valuable assets in England, to remove which out of the jurisdiction would be a breach of faith with its clients and would possibly imply a breach of trust on the part of the trustees of those assets, and that the trustees were excellent trustees; but he agreed with the masters that there should be a general rule that the bond of a foreign company would not be accepted as security, and he accordingly dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and Llewellyn Davies, for the plaintiff.—There is no general rule that the bond of a foreign company will not be accepted as security. No case can be found where any such rule is laid down. Each case must be considered on its own merits, one element for consideration, no doubt, being that the company is a foreign one. The company here is thoroughly sound and the bond is fully secured by the fund in the names of the trustees in England. The learned judge came to the conclusion that the security was ample, but he declined to accept it on the ground of the existence of the alleged general rule. That being so, it is not necessary to send the case back to the master to inquire into the sufficiency of the security.

R. J. Neville, for the defendants.—The security must now, by ord. 65, r. 7, be given to the satisfaction of the party, and not to the satisfaction of the master, that rule providing that the bond shall "be given to the party or person requiring the security." It is therefore the general rule that the bond of a foreign company, when objected to as security, will not be forced on an unwilling party, especially in view of the possible difficulty of serving the foreign company and of enforcing the security against them.

He referred to Knight v. De Blaquiere, Sau. & Sc. 648.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—To my mind this is a plain case. When the question of the sufficiency of a particular security comes before the master, he must take into consideration all the circumstances. To lay down a general rule that in a business inquiry as to the sufficiency of a security for, say, £80, the bond of a foreign company will not be accepted would be wrong. There is no such general rule, and each case must be decided on its own merits. The learned judge here considered the security to be amply sufficient, and he only rejected it by reason of the supposed general rule. It is not, therefore, necessary to send the case back to the master to inquire as to the sufficiency of the security offered, and we accordingly direct the bond to be accepted as security for £80.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree that there is no such general rule as that which the learned judge supposed to exist. In the Chancery Division the judges had considered the question of accepting the bonds of foreign companies as security, but had arrived at no general rule. The practice in the Chancery Division, therefore, remains that each case must be decided upon its own merits.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

Lunacy.

Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ. } June 6; July 18, 1904.

In re A., A PERSON OF UNSOUND MIND NOT SO FOUND BY INQUISITION. (a.)

Lunacy—Jurisdiction—Person lawfully detained as a lunatic—Person appointed to exercise powers of committee of the estate—Joint power to appoint among children—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), ss. 116, 120, 128.

A joint power to appoint among children is a power vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee, and the judge in lunacy may, under section 128 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, direct its exercise by a person appointed to exercise powers of a committee of the estate.

Per Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissentiente.—In section 128 the words "in the character of trustee" do not apply where the consent is required as a check on the undue exercise of the power.

This was a summons which came before Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in chambers, and was by him adjourned into court.

The applicant was the husband of A., a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition and lawfully detained as a lunatic; the powers and provisions relating to management and administration in the Lunacy Act, 1890, were consequently applicable by virtue of section 116 (1) (c).

The applicant had been appointed by order dated the 27th of July, 1893, to exercise certain of the powers of a committee of A.'s estate, and he now asked that he might be at liberty, on behalf of A., to exercise, or concur with the applicant (i.e., with himself in the character of husband) in exercising, the joint power of appointment contained in their marriage settlement by executing a deed-poll under the hands and seals of the applicant and the said A. appointing that, subject to the life interests of the husband and wife, certain shares of the trust property comprised in the settlement should be held in trust for two of the seven children of the marriage.

By the marriage settlement, which was dated the 7th of January, 1868, certain funds belonging to A. were settled upon trust for the husband and wife and the survivor of them for life, and after the death of the survivor upon trust for such of the children of the marriage as the husband and wife jointly, by deed revocable or irrevocable, or as the survivor by will or deed, should appoint, and in default of appointment for the children in equal shares.

Christopher Farwell, for the application.—I submit there is jurisdiction under section 128 of the Lunacy Act, 1890—if not under section 120 (l)—to authorize the committee to exercise the power, as being vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee. When a person in whom a power is vested proceeds to exercise it he becomes a trustee for the purpose of exercising it: Tempest v. Lord Camoys, 31 W. R. 326, 21 Ch. D. 578; Butcher v. Butcher, 1 V. & B. 79; Coffin v. Cooper, 13 W. R. 571, 2 Dr. & Sm. 365. The last two cases show that the donee of a power of appointment is a trustee. [ROMER, L.J.—In Coffin v. Cooper Kindersley, V.C., does not say the donee is a trustee, but that the power is in the nature of a trust.] Lord Hatherley almost calls him a trustee in Topham v. Duke of Portland, 18 W. R. 235, L. R. 5 Ch. 40. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—What is the best instance you can give of a power vested in a trustee as such?] The power of appointing a new trustee: In re Shortridge, 43 W. R. 257, [1895] 1 Ch. 278. In re Nevill, 31 Ch. D. 161, 34 W. R. Dig. 168, is in my favour. [ROMER, L.J., referred to In re Garrod, 34 W. R. 157, 31 Ch. D. 164.] [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In In re Skeats' Settlement, 42 Ch. D. 522, 527, 38 W. R. Dig. 202 Kay, J., seems to consider that the power of appointing new trustees is a power of a fiduciary character.] [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The power of appointing trustees is a duty, but the power to appoint among children is not.] There may be no duty to appoint, but a person who does appoint is in a fiduciary position. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—In re Nevill is your strongest case.] If the court can authorize the committee to consent to the exercise of a power, as was done in that case, it can authorize him to exercise a power vested in the lunatic. [ROMER, L.J.—The court can authorize him to consent, but not to exercise a power unless it be vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian.]

Cur. adv. vult.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the question is whether the 128th section of the Lunacy Act, 1890, gives to a judge exercising jurisdiction in lunacy jurisdiction to make an order for the exercise, by the committee of the estate of a lunatic not so found, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, of a limited power of joint appointment vested by a marriage settlement in the lunatic (the wife) and the applicant (the husband). [His lordship read the power.] The 128th section of the Lunacy Act, 1890, runs thus: "Where a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian, or the consent of a lunatic to the exercise of a power is necessary in the like character, or as a check upon the undue exercise of the power, and it appears to the judge to be expedient that the power should be exercised or the consent given, the committee of the estate, in the name and on behalf of the lunatic, under an order of the judge, made upon the application of any person interested, may exercise the power or give the consent in such manner as the order directs."

Now, is this power of appointment by the husband and wife jointly during their joint lives with or without power of revocation and new appointment a power which is vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee or guardian? In the case of Coffin v. Cooper, 13 W. R. 571, 2 Dr. & Sm. 365, Kindersley, V.C., dealing with the exercise by a married woman of a power of appointment by will over a fund to be divided among her children, which power had been exercised by the married woman, in pursuance of covenants by deeds with one of her sons and third parties, that she would appoint in favour of such son not less than a certain sum out of the fund, and by the same deeds the son mortgaged to such third parties all his interest in the fund whether by appointment or in default of appointment, held, that the appointment was good notwithstanding the covenants in the deeds, and in the course of his judgment used these words (p. 373): "In the absence of authority I should have decided this case with reference to certain broad principles, the soundness of which cannot (I think) be disputed. One is that a power to appoint among children is a power in the nature of a trust, created and intended to be exercised with a view to the benefit of the objects of the power, as a class and as individuals."

In the case of In re Nevill, 31 Ch. D. 161, which was a case in which trustees had a power of advancement with the consent of the husband and wife, and the husband was found lunatic, the court, purporting to act under section 137 of the Act of 1853, the section corresponding with section 128 of the Act of 1890, held that there was jurisdiction to authorise his committee to consent. There is no reason why the exercise of a power and the giving of a consent should be dealt with differently.

In the case of In re Harwood, 36 W. R. 27, 35 Ch. D. 470, the court doubted as to how far a power of sale fell within section 136 of the Act of 1853, the section dealing with powers vested in a lunatic for his own benefit.

The next case is In re Skeats' Settlement, 42 Ch. D. 522, a case dealing with power of appointment of new trustees. Kay, J., dealing with that power, says (p. 527): "I come to the conclusion that this is a power of a fiduciary character, and consequently that the man who exercises it is exercising a duty of a fiduciary nature to the cestuis que trust."

In In re Little and In re Harrison, 37 W. R. 289, 40 Ch. D. 418, Kay, J., dealing with power of appointment by a married woman under a limited power in favour of children, after pointing out that there is no doubt that there may be a case in which, where there has been a bonâ fide release not made for any corrupt purpose of the appointor, the release is good, goes on to say (p. 422): "The power to distribute the fund among the children of the tenant for life is a power which contemplates that the circumstances of the family may so alter that it may be of the highest possible importance to give a larger share to one child than to another. It is a power essentially, in that respect, in the nature of a trust."

In In re Baggs, [1894] 2 Ch. 416*n*, 38 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL 127, 71 L. T. 138, the Court of Appeal held that the power of sale vested in a lunatic as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1882, was not exercisable by the committee under the jurisdiction conferred by section 128 of the Act of 1890.

Having regard to these authorities I have on the whole come to the conclusion that section 128 of the Act of 1890 does give jurisdiction to the judge to direct the committee to exercise the power of appointment on behalf and in the name of the lunatic. I have come to this conclusion with more hesitation because I regret to say that COZENS-HARDY, L.J., does not concur in it.

The section is not very clear, but the words "in the character of trustee" are wide enough if liberally construed to cover this power of appointment, in respect of which the appointor undoubtedly owes a fiduciary duty to the children, although, as pointed out by Kay, J., and indeed by Kindersley, V.C., the appointor may release the power and do other things which a trustee in the strict sense of the word could not do. It seems to me, therefore, one should examine the section and the nature of the power and consider whether the Legislature could have intended that such a power should be exercised by the committee.

Now it is true that the power is such that the parties to the settlement must have contemplated the personal qualifications of a mother conjointly with the father to exercise such a power, and it might therefore be said that such a power was not proper to be exercised by the committee or a trustee, who would have presumably no such personal qualifications; but I think that the answer to this is that this must often be equally true of a trustee strictly so called, for many a trustee is chosen either for his personal qualifications or for the relation in which he stands to the cestui que trust, and notwithstanding this objection, it is plain that section 128 would give jurisdiction to the court to direct the committee to exercise all the powers and discretions of the named trustee.

It follows, therefore, that this case must go back to Master Ambrose to consider if this is a case in which the order ought to be made.

ROMER, L.J., also thought that the limited power of appointing to children did fall within section 128. He referred to In re Shortridge, where an argument that the power of appointing new trustees was not a power vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee was described by Lord Halsbury as a "hypercritical objection," and said it was significant that the section did not say "where a lunatic is a trustee," but "where a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee." His lordship could not help thinking that section 128 was the correlative of section 120 (l), under which the judge might direct the committee to "give any consent required for the exercise of any power where the power to consent is in the nature of a beneficial interest in the lunatic," and coupling those words with the words of section 128, it seemed as if provision were made for every case in which a power to consent could be vested in a lunatic. Under section 128 a committee under an order of the judge might, where the consent of a lunatic to the exercise of a power was necessary in the character of a trustee or as a check upon the undue exercise of a power, give the consent. These words were very wide, and it seemed strange, if his lordship's view were the correct one, why a distinction should be made between the exercise of a power and the giving of a consent.

It was said that in the case of a joint power given to husband and wife the power could not be exercised if the wife was a lunatic, but that if the power were given to the husband with the consent of his wife, i.e., as a check on its undue exercise, then the committee under order of the judge could give the consent. It would be strange and anomalous if there were jurisdiction in the one case and not in the other.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This summons raises an important and difficult question — whether it is competent to the court to authorize a committee to exercise a special power of appointment in favour of children, contained in the marriage settlement of the lunatic. The settlement is in common form—that is to say, subject to the life interests of the parents, the capital is held upon trust for such one or more of the children as the parents jointly by deed, or the survivor by will, shall appoint, and in default for the children at twenty-one or marriage equally. The wife in the present case is a person of unsound mind not so found by inquisition, and the application is made under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890.

Now it is clear that some statutory authority must be found to justify what is proposed. Two sections of the Act have been referred to, section 120 (l) and section 128. With respect to the former, it is sufficient to say that this is not a power "vested in the lunatic for his own benefit," and the case cannot therefore be brought within that section. With reference to section 128 there is more difficulty. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] It has been held under that section, and under the corresponding section, 137 of the Act of 1853, that the court can authorize the committee to exercise a power of appointing new trustees: In re Bowmer, 7 W. R. 313, 3 De G. & J. 658; In re Shortridge, 43 W. R. 257, [1895] 1 Ch. 278. This conclusion was inevitable, for section 129, which corresponds with section 138 of the earlier Act, expressly asserts that the Act extends to such a power. It may not be strictly accurate to describe a power of appointing new trustees vested in a lunatic as "a power vested in the lunatic in the character of trustee," but it is nevertheless true that the appointment of a new trustee if the donee of the power could not or would not act could be enforced or secured by the beneficiaries in a proper case under the general or statutory jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery: In re Sparrow, 18 W. R. 1065, L. R. 5 Ch. 662. It is therefore no great stretch of language to hold that such a power is one which falls within the terms of section 128.

There are many instances in which a power is vested in a lunatic in the character of trustee, e.g., the powers of advancement and maintenance contained in the present settlement are given to "the trustees or trustee for the time being." It is sufficient to refer to In re Boyce, 12 W. R. 359, 4 De G. J. & S. 205; Lord Westbury says at p. 209: "But assuming the trustee to take merely a power to sell the real estate, his position under the will is this: he is appointed trustee; he is directed peremptorily to sell the testator's real estate on the widow's death; he is empowered to give effect to that sale by the execution of all necessary conveyances. In other words, three things are combined in his person under the language of the will—namely, the office of trustee, a personal obligation, and a power of fulfilling and discharging that obligation. Where these three things concur, the case, in my judgment, falls within the statute, and the court has jurisdiction thereunder to appoint a new trustee."

It is, however, difficult to maintain that a special power of appointment the exercise of which will defeat a child's vested interest, can be considered as a power vested in a parent "in the character of trustee." There is no obligation upon a parent to appoint. Such a power may be released. The Court of Chancery could not, under its general or statutory jurisdiction, provide for the execution of such a power. In In re Baggs, [1894] 2 Ch. 416*n*, it was contended that by virtue of section 116 and section 128 the judge in Lunacy could authorize the applicant to exercise the power of sale conferred upon the alleged lunatic as tenant for life under the Settled Land Act as being a power vested in the alleged lunatic "in the character of trustee," and the language of section 53 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, was relied upon as showing that in exercising such a power the tenant for life is deemed to be in the position of a trustee. But the Court of Appeal declined to accept this view. And in In re Salt, 44 W. R. 146, [1896] 1 Ch. 117, Rigby, L.J., referring to In re Baggs, says (p. 121) that the lunatic was clearly not a trustee within section 128.

It is true that in In re X., 42 W. R. 657, [1894] 2 Ch. 415, where a settlement contained a power enabling the alleged lunatic tenant for life to sell with the consent of the trustees, and the master had found that a sale was desirable, the Court of Appeal held that it could authorize the exercise of the power of sale, but without saying whether it was under section 120, as being a power for the benefit of the alleged lunatic, or under section 128, or under both sections.

These three cases are not perhaps easily reconciled, but they seem to me to establish the proposition that it is not enough, in order to bring a case within section 128, to make out that a power is fiduciary in its nature, or that if exercised it must be exercised fairly and honestly and without any personal beneficial interest. The present power is beyond doubt one of that nature: Palmer v. Locke, 28 W. R. 926, 15 Ch. D. 294. But I am not prepared to say that it is a power vested in the lunatic "in the character of trustee." I may add that the express mention in section 120 (h), of a power of leasing vested in a lunatic having a limited estate supports the view that such a power would not fall within the general language of section 128.

Mr. Farwell, in his able argument, relied upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Neville, 31 Ch. D. 161, where it was held that the court could authorize the committee to consent to the exercise of a power of advancement given to the trustees with the consent of the lunatic, but on consideration I do not think that authority helps him. That was a case falling under the second branch of section 128—the consent of the lunatic to the exercise of the power being necessary "as a check on the undue exercise of the power." The words "in the character of trustee" do not apply to such a case.

In my opinion section 120 (l) and section 128 do not exhaust every kind of power. There are powers which are vested in the donee neither for his own benefit nor in the character of a trustee. A power of leasing vested in a limited owner—section 120 (h)—is one instance of such a power. I think the present power falls within that class. It follows that, in my opinion, there is no jurisdiction to make the order asked for. I may add that there is no trace in the Lunacy Office of any such order having been ever made, although the jurisdiction has existed for half a century.

The case was sent back to the Master.

MAYOR, &C., OF WESTMINSTER v. JOHNSON.
THE SAME v. FULLER. (a.)

Inland revenue—Land tax—Public underground lavatories provided and maintained by sanitary authority—Land Tax Act, 1797 (38 Geo. 3, c. 5), s. 4—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), ss. 44, 45.

A metropolitan borough council, acting as sanitary authority, provided and maintained a number of public lavatories and sanitary conveniences in pursuance of section 44 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. The lavatories and conveniences were constructed under the surface of the public streets.

Held, by Collins, M.R., and Stirling, L.J. (Mathew, L.J., dissenting), that the borough council were liable to be charged with land tax in respect of the lavatories and conveniences.

Judgment of Wright, J. (52 W. R. 350, [1904] 1 K. B. 19), reversed.

Appeals from the judgment of Wright, J., on the trial of two actions without a jury: reported 52 W. R. 350, [1904] 1 K. B. 19.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The actions were brought by the Corporation of Westminster for declarations that certain underground public lavatories and sanitary conveniences, situate in the City of Westminster, were exempt from land tax.

The actions were tried together upon agreed statements of facts, which are set out, 52 W. R. 350-1.

Wright, J., was of opinion that the corporation had only such an interest in the lavatories and conveniences as was necessary for the purpose of discharging their public duties, and not such a right of property as would render them liable to be charged with land tax. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the defendants.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Sylvain Mayer, for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 21.—COLLINS, M. R., read the following judgment: The question in this appeal is whether the appellants, who are collectors of land tax in the parish of St. James, Westminster, are entitled to demand land tax from the respondents, who are the sanitary authority of Westminster, in respect of certain lavatories and conveniences erected and controlled by them under their statutory powers.

By section 44, sub-section 1, of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, the sanitary authority may provide public conveniences, and by sub-section 2 the subsoil of any road, exclusive of the footway adjoining any building or the curtilage of a building, shall be vested in the sanitary authority. By section 45, where the sanitary authority provide and maintain lavatories or conveniences they may make regulations for the management thereof, and may let them for any term not exceeding three years at such rent and subject to such conditions as they may think fit, and charge such fees for the use of any lavatories or water-closets provided by them as they may think proper.

In the first of the two cases before us, Johnson's case, the sanitary authority have made such a convenience containing a lavatory, &c., at Piccadilly-circus, and have settled a scale of fees for the use thereof. The convenience is described in the written statement of agreed facts. It is a walled and roofed structure covering a considerable area, and is open to the public from 7 a.m. to 1 a.m., when it is shut up. Male and female attendants are in charge while it is open; the cost of erection was about £5,000. The fees received at this convenience produce an income in excess of the expenses. All the other conveniences are worked at a loss. Can the respondents be said to have or hold land or a hereditament or tenement in the case of this particular convenience within the meaning of the Land Tax Act, 1797 (38 Geo. 3, c. 5), s. 4? Wright, J., has held that they cannot, on the ground that "having or holding" in the Land Tax Act, 1797, must primâ facie import ordinary unqualified rights of property, and are not satisfied by a restricted and qualified property which the sanitary authority in his view possessed in this case.

No doubt the tendency of modern decisions has been to limit the meaning of the word "vest" in the Public Health Acts in connection with a street to vesting "in the urban authority such property, and such property only, as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use," as stated by Lord Herschell in the passage cited by Wright, J., from Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird. But no case has gone so far as to hold that actual property as distinguished from an easement only was not passed to the authority by that word. Coverdale v. Charlton decided that it conferred the right to demise the right of pasturage. In Rolls v. Vestry of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, Jessel, M.R., treated the former case as deciding that the soil of the street vested in the vestry so as to entitle them to sell it on the closing of the street. This decision was qualified on appeal by the Court of Appeal, who held that the property of the vestry in the highway was determined as soon as the highway ceased to be a highway. In Wandsworth Board of Works v. United Telephone Co. Brett, M.R., reviewed these decisions, and, adhering to his opinion in Coverdale v. Charlton, pointed out that the case of Rolls v. Vestry of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, dealt only with the duration, not the extent, of the right conferred. When the authority has used the powers vested in it for that purpose, and has brought into existence a building out of which a profit is made, a building vested in it which it has statutory powers to let, it seems to me difficult to contend that the authority does not come within the words of the Land Tax Act as "having or holding" a "tenement or hereditament." I think it is impossible to deny that what they hold is an interest in land. In fact this is a stronger case than Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Fowler, for here the site is actually vested in the local authority, and it could not be suggested here, as it was there, that what they took was an easement only. Here, as there, the persons acquiring the interest are a corporation and acquire it in fee. If it be possible that the respondents might at some time have to abandon and close the convenience and that in such case their statutory interest in the subsoil might cease, so also, as Lord Watson points out in Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Fowler, might the Metropolitan Railway lose their interest in the site of their tunnel.

Unless, then, the fact that the convenience is held subject to the statutory obligation to admit the public at such times as by their regulations they deem fit exempts from rateability, the statutory conditions are fulfilled. We are not, however, dealing with the poor rate or the paving rate, neither is there any statutory exemption, though the statute does make some exemptions, and this is not Crown land. The objection really goes to quantum, not to rateability, and in the present case if the convenience is a tenement or hereditament and the corporation "have" or "hold" it, it is undoubtedly being turned to profitable use and has some value.

With respect to the conveniences in Fuller's case, the same reasoning applies, though the fact that the expenses exceed the income will presumably be taken into account in assessing the value. This is not the tribunal for determining that question, which would have to be decided as provided in the Act: see section 8. If and so far as the land tax has been redeemed in respect of any part of the site, a proper allowance must, of course, be made. I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: In each of these cases the parties have agreed to submit to the court the question whether land tax can be assessed in respect of certain conveniences recently constructed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors under a public street, in exercise of the powers conferred by the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, sections 44 and 45.

Land tax was first imposed for one year only by 4 W. & M. c. 1 (1692). In every subsequent year down to and including 38 Geo. 3 (1797) a similar Act was passed. The last of these annual Acts was 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, which was made perpetual by another Act of the same session, 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, which contained provisions for the redemption and purchase of the tax. Most of the enactments of the last mentioned statute have been repealed, but re-enacted with variations by 42 Geo. 3, c. 116. The nature of the existing tax has been considered and explained in two cases—Reg. v. Land Tax Commissioners, 1 W. R. 479, 2 E. & B. 694, and Lord Colchester v. Kewney. The whole of England is for the purpose of this taxation divided into districts, and a fixed annual sum is required to be raised from the land in each of them. The sum to be so raised is assessed yearly by assessors chosen by and acting under the directions of commissioners appointed for the purpose in each district; 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 8. The assessment is to be "charged with as much equality and indifference as is possible by a pound rate" (section 4), or, as it is afterwards more briefly expressed (section 8), "by an equal pound rate" upon all manors, lands, hereditaments, and other premises within the district. There are, however, certain exceptions from this taxation. First, land in the occupation of the Crown at the date when the Act became perpetual is exempt (Attorney-General v. Hill, 2 M. & W. 160); but land which is Crown property, but not in the occupation of the Crown, is not free: Lord Colchester v. Kewney. Secondly, lands belonging to any colleges, hospitals, and other institutions specified in section 25 are thereby made exempt; this exemption extends only to lands held by such institutions at the date when the tax was made perpetual—Lord Colchester v. Kewney—but continues as regards such lands even after they have been sold by the institution to which it belonged: Cox v. Rabbits, 26 W. R. 483, 3 App. Cas. 473. Thirdly, lands as to which the land tax has been redeemed are, of course, exempt; but it is provided that the amount of tax so redeemed is to be deducted from the total amount leviable within the district, and the remainder only levied on the lands remaining charged with the tax, as if these had formed an entire district: 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, s. 74; 42 Geo. 3, c. 116, s. 180. The broad result is that all land which was chargeable with the tax at the time when it was made perpetual remains chargeable therewith, unless in the meantime the tax in respect thereof has been redeemed. But, as was pointed out by Channell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Lord Colchester v. Kewney, the amount for which any particular piece of land is assessed may vary from year to year, according as its value decreases or increases relatively to the rest of the land in the district. It may even happen that the value may become nominal, in which case the property would in practice not be included in the assessment, and thus would in a sense cease to be assessable. Whether this has taken place or not is a matter for the determination of the commissioners for the assessment; it is not one on which this court can be asked to express an opinion, and I do not understand the questions submitted to the court in these cases to relate to anything of this kind, but to be in substance whether the plaintiffs have or hold any messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments capable of being assessed to land tax.

Objection is taken on behalf of the plaintiffs to the taxation of these conveniences in question on two grounds—first, the use to which they are applied; and, secondly, the nature of the interest which the plaintiffs have in them. As to the former of these objections, the point is that the conveniences are for the benefit of the public, and that the public cannot be excluded from them. Conveniences have been erected under the authority of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, which authorizes the sanitary authority to provide and maintain them "in situations where they deem the same to be required." The sanitary authority has power to make them in the subsoil of a road, but there appears to be nothing to prevent the authority from erecting buildings for the purpose above ground. If the plaintiffs had erected such a building on a piece of land acquired for the purpose, and subject at the time of its acquisition to land tax, would land tax cease to be payable merely by reason of the use to which the erection is applied? I fail to see why it should be. The case would not fall within any of the exceptions which I have pointed out. By the statute the tax is, in my opinion, made payable by reason of ownership, not by reason of occupation, and still less by reason of the nature of the occupation. The Brockwell Park case (Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council) was referred to in this connection. There, however, the liability to poor rate was in question, and fell to be decided in reference to statutes expressed in very different terms from those with which we are here concerned. But even as regards liability to poor rates, it does not seem to me to be clear that the Brockwell Park case would govern. Lord Herschell, in advising the House of Lords, contrasts that case with London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith, 42 W. R. 330, [1893] A. C. 562, in which the London County Council was held to be rateable to poor rates in respect of a station and works for pumping sewage. His lordship said: "The land on which the pumping-stations were constructed, the rateability of which was there in question, was not by statute dedicated to that use. The London County Council could place their pumping-stations where they pleased; they could remove them elsewhere at any time they thought fit, or dispense with them altogether, if they adopted some other method of dealing with their sewage, and could sell or let the land to a tenant, whose use of it would be unrestricted. About the rateability of the land there could be no real controversy." Some of these observations would apply to the hypothetical case which I have put of a building erected on land acquired for the purpose. That, of course, is not the actual case under consideration; but if, as I think, the land which I have supposed to be acquired would not be freed from land tax by reason of the use to which it was put, it seems to me that neither can the existing conveniences be exempted solely by reason of the nature of their use.

It remains, then, to consider whether the plaintiffs have or hold a messuage, land, tenement, or hereditament within the meaning of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 4. The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 44, sub-section 2, provides that "for the purpose of such provision" (that is, the provision of such a convenience) "the subsoil of any road . . . shall be vested in the sanitary authority." Section 45 provides that where a sanitary authority provide and maintain public lavatories or sanitary conveniences, "such authority may (a) make regulations and bye-laws with respect to the management and user thereof; (b) let the convenience for any term not exceeding three years at such rent and subject to such conditions as they may think fit"; and (c) "charge such fees for the use of any lavatories provided by them as they may think proper." It seems to me that the powers conferred by this section enable the sanitary authority, having made proper regulations and bye-laws and fixed reasonable fees for the use of the conveniences specified, to hand over to others the administrative part of their duties in connection therewith, and with that view to let the same for terms not exceeding three years. I think that, when letting is spoken of, the term is used in the ordinary sense. The estate vested in the sanitary authority by section 44, sub-section 2, is not defined; but it seems to me that what is to vest is not a mere easement, but such an estate or interest as will enable the authority to perform the duties imposed and to exercise the powers conferred by the Act, including the power of letting. This appears to me to be in accordance with what is laid down in Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Fowler and Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird. This being so, in my opinion the conveniences in question fall under one or other, or even more than one, of the designations of messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, held by the sanitary authority, within the meaning of 38 Geo. 3, c. 5, s. 4. It appears that the site of the convenience which is the subject of the first of these actions was formerly occupied partly by the street and partly by houses; the land tax had been redeemed in respect of one these houses, but not of the others. The houses were bought by the plaintiffs' predecessor for the purpose of street improvements and thrown into the street. Since that time no land tax has been paid in respect of the site, the reason being, I presume, that the commissioners regarded the value as nominal merely. It is for the commissioners and not for this court to determine whether the structure erected by the plaintiffs (so far as the site consists of land the tax on which has not been redeemed) is or is not of nominal value merely. Similar remarks apply to the conveniences which are the subject of the second action. In my judgment, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: In these cases I agree with my brother Wright, and am of opinion that his judgment should be affirmed. The Land Tax Act, 1797, s. 4, seems to me to deal with estates known to the common law, which might be held in perpetuity, and the tenure of which was subject to no restrictions. It was contended for the appellants that the word "vested" in the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, s. 44, sub-section 2, indicated an intention to create an ownership in the plaintiffs. But the sense in which the term is used with respect to the rights granted to local authorities is explained in the cases referred to in the judgment of Wright, J. Whether it be the street or the subsoil mentioned in the Act, the position of the plaintiffs seems to me to be the same. They have no property in the ordinary sense. They are not owners or occupiers. They have control as custodians only, and are granted by implication in that capacity such property and authority as will enable them to protect and preserve the rights of the public. In support of the appeal the main reliance was placed on sub-section 1 of section 45 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891. It was urged that the provisions of that sub-section showed that the plaintiffs were owners in fee of the structures in question. They are empowered to charge for their use, and what was received, it was said, was in the nature of rent. They were further entitled to let them for any term not exceeding three years. It was contended that the plaintiffs therefore possessed the ordinary rights of the landlord. But the charges made to the public are described in the statute as "fees," and, as appears from the agreed facts, they are not made for purposes of profit, but with the object of aiding in meeting the necessary expenditure incurred in the interest of the public, and in order to place some check on a too indiscriminate public user. The fees which are paid are no more rents than the small sums paid for the use of chairs in the public parks. Further, with reference to the power of letting, any demise must be subject to the obligations of the plaintiffs. Provision must be made that the premises should be maintained for the purposes indicated in the statute. What would be received by the tenant would be the difference between the fees paid and necessary outgoings, which, as I have already said, would not be a return in the nature of rent. Further, it must be borne in mind that the right to receive payments from the public and the right to let are both statutory. They do not spring from ownership and would not exist without the sanction of Parliament. The appellants argued that, if the building in Johnson's case was assessable, the other similar structures would be subject to the tax, because of the power which the plaintiffs possessed to make such charges for their use as they thought proper. But this reasoning would seem to involve the consequence that the enclosures provided for similar purposes on the surface of the street would become hereditaments liable to land tax. The case seems to me not to be distinguishable in principle from the Brockwell Park case (Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council) and the Tooting Common case (London County Council v. Wandsworth Borough Council, 51 W. R. 499, [1903] 1 K. B. 797). I see no reason in the absence of express enactment for imposing on the ratepayers the additional burden of the land tax. For these reasons it seems to me the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal allowed.

BARBERS COMPANY v. GROSE-SMITH. (a.)

Tenant for life and remainderman—Capital and income—Settled fund—Mortgage—Authorized security—Arrears of interest—Deficient security.

If a fund, which is settled upon a tenant for life and remainderman, is properly invested on a mortgage which proves insufficient to pay principal and interest in full, the sum realized ought to be divided between the tenant for life and remainderman in the proportion which the amount of interest in arrear bears to the amount of principal due under the mortgage, without taking into consideration any sums received by the tenant for life by way of interest from the security.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

John Atkinson, by his will dated the 30th of August, 1858, gave his residuary estate upon trust for conversion and investment, and upon further trust, subject to certain interests which had determined, to pay the income to his eleven nephews and nieces for life and the survivors and survivor of them, and, after the decease of the survivor upon trust to pay the capital to the Barbers Company to be held by them upon certain charitable trusts.

The testator died on the 8th of November, 1861.

£29,000, part of the residuary estate, was invested on a mortgage, which carried interest at 5 per cent. reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment.

In January, 1889, the interest on the mortgage began to fall into arrear; and in May, 1889, the trustees entered into possession. Since that time the rents arising from the mortgaged property had been paid to the tenant for life, but they were insufficient to keep down the interest, and it was apprehended that the property when sold would not realize enough to pay the principal moneys and the arrears of interest in full.

In March, 1892, the present action was commenced by the Barbers Company against the then trustees of the testator's will and the then tenants for life for the purpose of determining whether the mortgaged property ought not to be realized.

By an order made on the 2nd of June, 1892, the court ordered the trusts of the will to be carried into execution, and directed an inquiry whether any and what proceedings should be taken to realize, among other securities, this mortgage.

In 1894 the chief clerk certified that this mortgage ought not to be realized.

In April, 1898, part of the mortgaged property was sold in pursuance of an order made in the action and realized £4,600.

In 1903 the tenants for life took out a summons in the action asking that the £4,600, and also the proceeds of sale of the rest of the mortgaged property when sold, might be apportioned between the tenants for life for the time being of the residuary estate and the trustees of the will, as representing the capital, in proportion to the amount due in respect of arrears of interest and the amount of capital remaining due on the mortgage, and asking, further, that directions might be given for the realization of so much of the mortgaged property as remained unsold. At the date of this application the amount due for capital on this security was about £22,000, and the amount due for arrears of interest about £9,000.

Kekewich, J., ordered an immediate sale of the remaining farms, and ordered, further, that the £4,600 should be apportioned between the tenants for life and the capital in the proportion which the amount of interest in arrear at 5 per cent. bore to the amount of principal due under the mortgage.

The Barbers Company appealed from this decision so far as it related to the apportionment.

Carson, K.C., and Spencer, for the appellants.—We submit that the right principle of apportionment in this case is that followed by Kay, J., in In re Foster, 39 W. R. 31, 45 Ch. D. 629. The moneys received by the tenant for life by way of interest ought to be added to the proceeds of sale and the total treated as the sum recovered on the mortgage; then it must be ascertained how much at the date of sale would have come to the tenant for life and how much to the corpus if there had been no deficiency, and the total is divided between the tenant for life and the remainderman in proportion to those two amounts. In the present case Kekewich, J., has followed his own decision in In re Alston, [1901] 2 Ch. 584, 50 W. R. Dig. 157. That principle is simply to divide the proceeds in the proportion which the amount of interest in arrear bears to the amount of interest due under the security. We submit, however, that this method bears hardly on the remaindermen.

They also cited Stewart v. Kinsale, [1902] 1 Ir. R. 496; Turner v. Newport, 2 Ph. 14; Cox v. Cox, 17 W. R. 790, 8 Eq. 343; In re Bird, 49 W. Dickinson, for two of the trustees of the will,

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Lyttelton Chubb, for all but one of the tenants for life.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the remaining tenant for life, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal fails. I think that the judgment of Kekewich, J., in this case and also his judgment in In re Alston were quite right. In this case there was an authorized investment, a mortgage, and that investment was a security for capital and interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and for a long time the security was sufficient and the interest was paid. Then the security begun to be deficient; there was not enough to keep up the full payment of the interest, and there was a grave probability that the security might not be sufficient to provide payment of the capital. Under these circumstances a portion of the securities was realized, and that produced £4,600. Then a question has arisen about apportioning this amount. Strictly speaking we cannot make a final adjustment in the case. It is impossible at present to ascertain all the factors which are necessary for this adjustment. We do not know at present what the unsold residue of the estate may be, but it is said that it will be convenient, although the time for final adjustment has not come, and the conditions are not present which would enable us to make that final adjustment, that we should declare now what will be the principle of the final adjustment, in order that, for the convenience really of all parties this sum that has been realized may be provisionally apportioned, and that any adjustment which is ultimately necessary when all the factors have been ascertained can be made on the occasion of the final adjustment. But in the meanwhile we have to make an order which will constitute really a provisional apportionment, and I may say that I do not think, as far as I can judge from Kekewich, J.'s, judgment, that he meant what he did to be anything more than a provisional apportionment. That being the case now, one has to deal with the question of what is the right principle of apportionment or adjustment. Now, as the Master of the Rolls said, in the Irish case of Stewart v. Kinsale, that, if he had to choose there between In re Foster and In re Moore, he preferred the principle laid down in In re Moore, and I say as he did, that I prefer that principle. Really the Master of the Rolls gives such clear and forcible reasons in his judgment for his preference that I feel that I should not better them in any way by anything that I may add now to them. But in only one respect do I at all criticize what the Master of the Rolls said. I do not think that the question whether In re Foster or In re Moore laid down the right principle of apportionment was quite as open a question according to the English cases as the Master of the Rolls assumed, because it seems to me that with regard to In re Foster it is a case which, as Mr. Carson told us, has never been followed, and as he also practically had to admit it has never been preceded. I mean by that, that there never was before the decision in In re Foster a case in which the principles which would support that decision were in the slightest degree indicated. One cannot help seeing, when one looks at the judgment of Kay, J., in In re Foster, and considers it with the greatest care, having regard to his learning and carefulness as a judge, that curiously enough, although he therein particularly refused to follow in In re Moore he does so without the indication of any reason why he disapproved of In re Moore or preferred the calculation which he enunciated in In re Foster. I say, therefore, that I prefer In re Moore. Now, cases were cited to us of unauthorized investment, but I do not mean to trouble myself with those cases, because I think they have no bearing on this case whatsoever. You have a case here of authorized investment, it was given to a tenant for life, and the fund was to go ultimately to remaindermen. Now, having that state of things, and the security being a security both for principal and for interest on the mortgage at the rate of 5 per cent., what is to be done in a case where for a considerable time that interest has been paid, and then the security is realized and proves insufficient? What was it a security for? It was a security equally for the principal and the interest. Now I will venture to try and enunciate, not a calculation, but a principle here which one ought to apply in these cases, and that principle is that, there being a security for the principal and the interest, and there having been a loss, you ought to take care that there is rateable equality in the incidents of that loss. That is all that you have got to do. Now I will proceed to make the calculation which follows upon that principle, and I will now take the very words of In re Moore. Take the amount due for capital and the amount due to the tenant for life for arrears of interest, and then apportion the sum accordingly. That is the principle, it seems to me, we have to apply in the present case. The result of this will be that the appeal fails, but we will introduce what words may be necessary by way of precaution to prevent it being supposed that this is a final apportionment.

ROMER, L J.—I am of the same opinion. I must say that, but for the cases of In re Foster and In re Phillimore, I should have thought the principle to be applied in a case like the present was quite clear. The question may be shortly stated as follows: There was a mortgage debt, an authorized security. It is settled by a settlement on a tenant for life, with remainder to some remaindermen. Interest is paid on the mortgage debt for some time in full; then the interest falls into arrear, and after there are some arrears outstanding and due the security has to be realized, and it turns out that there is not sufficient to pay the arrears of interest and the capital of the capital debt. What is to be done under the circumstances? I should have thought, as I have said, that the way to proceed was pretty clear, and the considerations which would lead to the way in which the fund should be dealt with are pretty obvious. In the first place, as to the interest which was paid to the tenant for life, it is clear that the tenant for life was entitled to receive it, and that the remaindermen could have no possible claim upon the sum so received by the tenant for life, and no equity against the tenant for life in respect of those sums in any point of view whatever. That being so, what is the position of the tenant for life and the remaindermen so far as concerns the property that represents the security for the debt? They are simply in the position of two persons who have one security for the two debts belonging to them respectively. Notwithstanding the payment of interest to the tenant for life, so far as concerns his arrears of interest he has a right as against the remaindermen to have those arrears charged upon the security. The security is a security not only for principal but for interest, and that is a right the tenant for life had, and I fail to see any equity on the part of the remaindermen which would enable the remaindermen to challenge the position or right of the tenant for life. That being so, when the security is insufficient to pay the two debts charged upon the security, I should have thought it would follow as a matter of clear right that the tenant for life would say to the remaindermen: "Apportion our security, which is a security for my debt as well as yours, between us in proportion to the amount of the debts, in the same way as you would if you had a mortgage given on one security for two separate debts and the security is insufficient. You apportion the insufficient proceeds between the mortgage debts." That is the simple principle, and there is no possible equity that I can see to prevent the ordinary rights applying and being enforced. That, on principle, as I have said, ends the case.

About the authorities only let me say a few words after what my lord has said. So far as concerns Turner v. Newport, Cox v. Cox, and In re Bird, they are all authorities dealing with cases of unauthorized investment, and have no application in principle to such a case as we have to deal with here. Where you are dealing with cases of unauthorized investment from the very nature of the transaction you have to consider the rights of the parties at the time it was made. Almost of necessity you must go back to readjust those rights as I have stated. Those cases, in my opinion, have no real bearing upon the case we have to decide. The case that we have here, had to be considered in In re Moore, and there it received, to my mind, proper and sufficient treatment. The principle I have referred to was carried out, and rightly carried out in that case, as indeed it was also in Lyon v. Mitchell, In re Barker, In re Alston, and Stewart v. Kinsale. The only authorities that cause the slightest trouble are those of In re Foster and In re Phillimore. As my lord has pointed out, In re Foster had no previous authority to justify it, and speaking with great respect of the very learned judge who decided it, in my opinion the decision in that case was wrong. The learned judge there appears to have arrived at a method of apportionment which, as far as I can see, was not argued and not authorized by any previous authority, and he gave no reason for his adopting that method of apportionment. He states no principle on which he is said to have proceeded, and that case has never been followed. It was not followed even in In re Phillimore, and the other judges have expressly declined to follow it, as, for example, in Lyon v. Mitchell and in In re Barker. With regard to In re Phillimore I need only say this, that I think Swinfen Eady, J., was misled there by the form the argument took before him. The real point of principle on which that case ought to have been decided, in my opinion, was never brought to the attention of the learned judge; he was led to believe by the argument before him that the whole question he had to decide was one as to the point of time from which an account should be taken as against the tenant for life in respect of the income received by him, and which was to be brought in as a sort of hotchpotch in order to produce the apportionment. He was led to consider that that was the only question he had to decide. As it was, he declined to follow In re Foster, but it is really, for the reasons that I have given, no authority upon the question we have here. But so far as it really proceeded on a different basis from that which I have indicated as a correct basis, I cannot help saying that, in my opinion, it was wrongly decided. Those are the only two cases which are really in any way in conflict with the principle I have indicated. To my mind, as I have said, it is a perfectly clear and intelligible principle, and one that ought to be applied without any difficulty. I will only add that in this case we are really deciding a hypothetical question, but we are led to do that under the advisability, if not the necessity, of allowing some provisional division to be made in respect of £4,600 between the tenant for life and the remaindermen. I think that justifies the court in deciding the question though as I have said it is up to the present time hypothetical. I think the order that was made by Kekewich, J., as to the apportionment of the £4,600 ought to be prefaced by a statement to the effect that the apportionment of that sum is to be without prejudice to a final adjustment when the estate is perfectly realized. It is not until the estate is perfectly realized that you can finally adjust the right, and not till then can you take a proper account between the parties. You cannot treat the £4,600, for example, as representing any specific portion of the original mortgage, and for that reason, amongst others, you could not possibly at the present time have a complete and final adjustment and apportionment as far as regards the £4 600. Therefore, as I have said, the division of the £4,600 can only be treated as provisional, and the final adjustment of the rights must take place when the estate is fully realized. There will be then time to apply for the taking of such accounts as may be necessary to finally adjust the rights of the parties on the principles we have decided.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add after the judgments given by my lord and Romer, L.J. I think the true way to approach this question is to treat it as though the whole security had been realized and had produced a certain sum; then the inquiry which the court would have to make would be what was due on the security at the time of realization? The answer would be, the capital and the arrears of interest, nothing more would be due. It would be idle to say the interest which had been paid wholly or in part to the tenant for life was then due upon the security of the land or upon the proceeds of the sale of the land. The only charge would be for those two sums, capital, and arrears of interest. On what principle are you to apportion them? Just in the same way as you would if it were a contributory mortgage, part owing to A. and part owing to B., you would apportion it rateably. Just so here when the ultimate realization comes to pass you would have to ascertain what was due for capital and what was due for arrears of interest. It is a plain, simple, and intelligible rule which was adopted by Pearson, J., in the case of In re Moore. It follows from what has been said in the case of In re Moore, which was followed by Kekewich, J., in In re Alston, and by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in what I may very respectfully refer to as his very able judgment in Stewart v. Kinsale, and again by Kekewich, J., in his judgment in this case, that those are correct. But with the greatest respect to Kay, L.J., and Swinfen Eady, J., I cannot consider the decision in In re Foster or in In re Phillimore as correct. I do not refer to the cases as to unauthorized investments. They are on a different footing to a case like this, where the tenant for life was entitled to the income derived from this mortgage. The appeal will be dismissed, the only variation being that this order is without prejudice to any ultimate adjustment on the whole scheme.

In re CLUTTERBUCK'S SETTLEMENT.
BLOXAM v. CLUTTERBUCK. (a.)

Settlement — Marriage settlement — Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Accumulations of income of settled property—Investment of accumulations—"At one and same time"—Construction.

Property purchased by a wife with the accumulations of income derived from property settled by a marriage settlement is not property to which she becomes entitled during the coverture so as to fall within the meaning of the ordinary covenant to settle after-acquired property; and where the covenant is expressed to apply only to sums of a specified value to which she becomes entitled "at one and the same time," and the sums accumulated are each less than the specified amount, these words are an additional reason why the covenant does not apply.

Originating summons.

This summons was rendered necessary because of two conflicting decisions upon what was acquired property within the meaning of the usual covenant to settle such property in a marriage settlement.

By indenture of settlement made the day before the marriage of the Rev. John Balfour Clutterbuck with the defendant Catherine Purslow Clutterbuck, then C. P. Cresswell, spinster, a sum of £3,500 to which Mrs. Clutterbuck was then entitled, payable upon the death of her father (who died in 1880), was assigned to the trustees of the settlement upon trust, after the marriage and upon the same becoming payable, to pay the income to Mrs Clutterbuck for her life, for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her death to pay the income to Mr. Clutterbuck for his life, or until the events mentioned, and then upon trusts for the children of the marriage as mentioned. The settlement contained the following clause: "And it is hereby agreed and declared that if the said Catherine Purslow Cresswell now is, or if during the said intended coverture she, or the said John Balfour Clutterbuck in her right, at one and the same time, and from one and the same source, shall become seized, or possessed of, or entitled to, any real or personal property of the value of £200 or upwards, for any estate or interest whatsoever, in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy," except specified articles, "then and in every such case the said Catherine Purslow Cresswell and John

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Balfour Clutterbuck, and all other necessary parties, shall . . . convey, assign, and assure the said real and personal property to, or otherwise cause the same to be vested in, the said trustees or trustee" upon trusts for sale or investment, and to stand possessed of the moneys so arising, and the investments upon the trusts declared concerning the sum of £3,500, except in a particular mentioned. There were children of the marriage.

Upon the death of her father, Mrs. Clutterbuck received the income of the £3,500, and from time to time saved and accumulated sums out of it, with the result that in 1894 the accumulations amounted to £300 or more. In that year she used the £300, with £1,000, which she obtained on mortgage of the property purchased, in the purchase of certain real property, which was conveyed to her as her separate property. She subsequently mortgaged it.

The present trustees of the settlement took out this summons against Mr. and Mrs. Clutterbuck, two of their children, and the trustees of the marriage settlement of another child, asking whether they, the trustees, were entitled, under the agreement for the settlement of after-acquired property, to have a conveyance from Mrs. Clutterbuck of the hereditaments conveyed to her in 1894.

Cruickshank, for the trustees of the settlement.

H. B. Howard, for Mrs. Clutterbuck.—The property purchased by my client is not property which she had at the time of the settlement or has become seized of or entitled to since within the meaning of the covenant. It is true that the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Bendy, 43 W. R. 345, [1895] 1 Ch. 109, is against this view, but the case of Churchill v. Denny, 23 W. R. 825, L. R. 20 Eq. 534, was not cited to the learned judge. That case shows that Mrs. Clutterbuck did not acquire her title to the land at the time of purchasing it within the meaning of the covenant. And in Finlay v. Darling, 45 W. R. 445, [1897] 1 Ch. 719, Romer, J., refused to follow In re Bendy, and decided the contrary. [He was stopped by the court.]

Douglas, for the other defendants.—I admit that the half-yearly receipts of income were not caught by the covenant. But I submit that when Mrs. Clutterbuck capitalised the income and purchased the property with it, she became seized of and entitled to the property within the meaning of the covenant: Lewis v. Maddocks, 8 Ves. 150, 17 Ves. 48. It was changed to a permanent investment, and therefore fell within the covenant: In re Bendy.

BUCKLEY, J.—I fail to find any ground for saying that the trustees are entitled to have the property purchased by Mrs. Clutterbuck conveyed to them. At the date of the settlement Mrs. Clutterbuck was not entitled to this future income because it did not then exist. There was no sum of £200 or any other sum existing as accumulations of income. But her right to this property purchased with the accumulations of income did not arise during the coverture. It arose under the settlement itself. It is not, therefore, within the covenant. There is another thing fatal to the claims of the trustees. The property of the value of £200 covenanted to be settled was to be property to which the wife became entitled "at one and the same time." But she did not become entitled to these accumulations of income at one and the same time, but in successive half-years. The covenant, therefore, does not apply to them. That the right of the lady to these future periodical receipts of income did not arise during coverture was decided in Churchill v. Denny, where Jessel, M.R., held that the settlor did not become entitled to the money he received for the commutation of his pension at the date of the commutation, and that he was then merely varying the investment, and not acquiring a title to the property. I am pressed with the decision of In re Bendy. In deciding that case Kekewich, J., relied upon Lewis v. Maddocks, 8 Ves. 150, 17 Ves. 48, where Lord Eldon held that income invested and converted into capital became subject to a covenant to settle after-acquired property. In that case the husband had agreed to settle all his personal estate. The effect of Lord Eldon's judgment was that the covenant would not bind every sovereign received by the husband, but that some effect must be given to the words "all his personal estate," and if the husband so dealt with his income as to capitalize it, it would be bound by the covenant. But the principles of that decision do not apply here. The covenant of Mrs. Clutterbuck is essentially different from the covenant to settle all the personal estate in that case. She did not covenant to settle all her property. The decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Bendy is commented upon by Romer, J., in Finlay v. Darling, and I respectfully agree with his observations. The decision of Romer, J., in that case is in direct conflict with that of Kekewich, J., in In re Bendy. And in the present case, the words "at one and the same time" are an additional reason for holding the property outside the covenant, which did not occur in Finlay v. Darling. I need only add that in In re Dowding's Trusts, 52 W. R. 293, [1904] 1 Ch. 441, Kekewich, J., made some comments upon his own decision in In re Bendy, which shows that upon reconsideration he might have preferred the view of Romer, J., to that of his own. I hold that the property purchased by Mrs. Clutterbuck is not bound by her covenant and that the trustees of the settlement have no title to it.

Settled land—Person having powers of tenant for life—Conditional residence—Invalidity of condition—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 51, 58, sub-section 1, clause 2.

A testatrix devised her residuary real and personal estate to her niece upon condition that she resided in the house of the testatrix during the lifetime of the sister of the testatrix, and there kept a home for the sister whenever she should so require it; if this condition were not complied with, then the property was to pass over to another niece upon the same condition. The sister of the testatrix was a lunatic not so found, and had been subject to restraint for twelve years.

Held, that the provision as to residence was a condition and not a trust or reservation for the benefit of the lunatic, and the devisee being a person having the powers of a tenant for life within the meaning of section 58, sub-section 1, clause 2, of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the condition in question was void under section 51 of that Act.

cluding trustees for the purpose of the Settled Land Acts), and after various bequests devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property unto her niece, M. E. Richardson, upon condition that she resided in the house of the testatrix, called Brooklyn, during the lifetime of the sister of the testatrix, and kept there a home for the said sister whenever she should wish to use it; and in the event of the said niece predeceasing her or refusing to comply with such condition, then the testatrix devised and bequeathed all her real and personal property, subject to a like condition, to another niece, C. M. Richardson, plaintiff in the present action; and in the event of both said nieces predeceasing the testatrix or refusing to comply with the said condition, then the real and personal estate was devised and bequeathed, subject to the above condition, to another niece, A. H. Richardson; and if all the three nieces predeceased the testatrix or refused to comply with the said condition, then the whole of the real and personal estate was devised and bequeathed to trustees upon trust for her said sister, Mary Ellen Richardson, during her life, and after her decease upon trust to sell the same and divide the proceeds equally between the children of her said brother, G. Richardson, as therein mentioned.

The testatrix died on the 28th of March, 1902, and M. E Richardson, the niece, by a deed-poll disclaimed the conditional devise and bequest to her. The plaintiff, C. M. Richardson, the other niece, accepted the gift, and came over from America and resided at the house of the testatrix, called Brooklyn, and was prepared to provide there a home for the sister of the testatrix. The said sister, Mary Ellen Richardson, was a lunatic not so found by inquisition, and had been under restraint in an asylum since 1891. She was fifty-five years of age, and there was no likelihood of her recovering her reason. The plaintiff desired to sell the whole of the real estate devised to her.

An originating summons was taken on her behalf asking—(1) Whether the plaintiff was under the will of Alice Richardson a person having the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts in regard to Brooklyn, and whether she could sell it discharged from the condition imposed by the will, and, if so, whether she was absolutely entitled to the proceeds of sale discharged from any obligation to provide a home for Mary Ellen Richardson.

Hughes, K.C., and H. M. Humphrey, for the plaintiff.—The condition as to residence is void under section 51 of the Settled Land Act as tending to prevent tenant for life exercising powers conferred by the Act. Section 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, provides as follows: "If in a settlement, will, assurance, or other instrument executed or made before or after, or partly before and partly after the commencement of this Act, a provision is inserted purporting, or attempting by way of direction, declaration, or otherwise to forbid a tenant for life to exercise any power under this Act, or attempting or tending, or intended by a limitation, gift, or disposition over of settled land, or by a limitation, gift, or disposition of other real of any personal property, or by the imposition of any condition, or by forfeiture or in any other manner whatever to prohibit or prevent him from exercising, or to induce him to abstain from exercising, or to put him into a position inconsistent with his exercising any power under this Act, that provision, as far as it purports, or attempts, or tends, or is intended to have, or would or might have the operation aforesaid, shall be deemed to be void." Section 58, sub-section 1, clause 2: "Each person as follows shall, when the estate or interest of each of them is in possession, have the powers of a tenant for life under this Act, as if each of them were a tenant for life as defined in this Act, namely—a tenant in fee simple, with an executory limitation, gift, or disposition over, on failure of his issue or in any other event." Looking at section 58, sub-section 1, clause 2, it is evident that the plaintiff, C. M. Richardson, who is tenant in fee simple under the will with an executory limitation over in a certain event, is a limited owner having the powers of a tenant for life under that section: In re Paget's Settled Estates, 30 Ch. D. 161; In re Smith, Grose-Smith v. Bridges, 47 W. R. 357 [1899] 1 Ch. 331. C. M. Richardson can therefore sell Brooklyn free from any condition.

Younger, K.C., and Baden-Fuller, for the respondent.—This is a trust for the sister of the testatrix, and the nieces were trustees. It is not really a condition: In re Kirk, Kirk v. Kirk, 31 W. R. 94, 21 Ch. D. 431; Wright v. Wilkin (1862), 10 W. R. 403. The intention of testatrix was to benefit the lunatic, and to provide her with a home; not to benefit the nieces during the lifetime of the lunatic. C. M. Richardson was not tenant for life within the Act as she was a trustee.

No reply called for.

JOYCE, J.—In this case, in the events which have happened, there is a devise to the testatrix's niece, Catherine Mary Richardson, upon condition that she resides in the house, known as Brooklyn, during the lifetime of the testatrix's sister, Mary Ellen Richardson, and provides there a home free of cost or charge of any kind for her said sister Mary Ellen Richardson whenever her said sister chose to avail herself of such home, and in the event of Catherine Mary Richardson not complying with the condition then the property was devised to another niece. Now, the sister Mary Ellen Richardson there referred to was unfortunately a lunatic, and at the date of the will had been confined as a lunatic for ten or twelve years, and I am informed that it is in the highest degree improbable that she will ever recover her mental faculties. In that state of things it appears to me that this provision with respect to residing by the devisee at Brooklyn and providing a home for Mary Ellen Richardson, if and whenever she should recover and wish to avail herself of such house is, in truth, a condition, not merely a trust or reservation for the benefit of this lunatic, as it might have been if the condition had been one merely for the payment of a sum of money, or an annuity, or a condition permitting the lunatic to reside and occupy a portion of the property during her life. It appears to me, having regard to the cases with reference to residence, that the condition in this case does not differ materially from the other cases in respect of residence, and is just as obnoxious to the provisions of section 51 of the Settled Land Act as if it had been a provision for residence merely. In that state of things I hold that Catherine Mary Richardson is "a tenant in fee simple, with an executory limitation over" in a certain event—that is to say, she is one of the class of persons within clause 2 of sub-section 1 of section 58 of the Settled Land Act, having the powers of a tenant for life, and therefore the condition in question is void under section 51 of the Act. She is entitled to sell the property free from any condition.

BROOKS v. BRADSHAW. (a.)

Adulteration—Article purchased for test purposes—Time for instituting prosecution—Information within time specified—Issue of summons after time—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), s. 19, sub-section 1.

By section 19 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, where any article of food or drug has been purchased for test purposes, a prosecution under the Act shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of purchase.

Held, that the prosecution was "instituted" if the information was laid within twenty-eight days, and that a summons, though not issued until after that time had elapsed, was not too late.

Beardsley v. Giddings, [1904] 1 K. B. 847, considered.

Case stated by justices of Norwich, who had dismissed an information of the appellant, an inspector under the Food and Drugs Acts, against the respondent for selling milk alleged to be adulterated with 43 per cent. of added water.

The question was whether the proceedings were out of time, having regard to section 19 (1) of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, which enacts that a prosecution "shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of the purchase."

The information was laid on the 23rd of January, 1904, which was within the period of twenty-eight days from the date of purchase of the test article by the appellant. The summons was issued the same day, and was made returnable on the 11th of February. The summons should have been served not later than the 27th of January, to comply with sub-section 2 of section 19. The summons was not served until the 29th of January, and in consequence the case was not proceeded with on the return day, but on the application of the appellant a fresh summons dated the 11th of February was issued upon the information of the 23rd of January by the same justice returnable on the 3rd of March.

The respondent contended that the prosecution had not been instituted within twenty-eight days, on the ground that the laying of the information alone was not an institution of a prosecution under section 19 (1), and that the section required not only the laying of the information, but also the service of the summons within twenty-eight days from the alleged offence.

The appellant contended that the laying of the information was a sufficient institution of proceedings, and that the summons need not be served within twenty-eight days.

The justices were of opinion that it was imperative that the summons be served within twenty-eight days, and dismissed the information.

The inspector appealed.

No one appeared for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I do not think that the question in this case is exactly covered by the decision in Beardsley v. Giddings, as it is really whether there is any valid objection to a summons being issued more than twenty-eight days after the date of the alleged offence, the information having been laid within twenty-eight days, which is the time fixed by the statute. In Beardsley v. Giddings it happened that the summons was issued on the same day as the information was laid, and the court there held that a prosecution was instituted under the Act by the laying of an information and the issue of a summons, and not by the service of the summons. Therefore the court held that it was not the service though outside the twenty-eight days, that was the governing condition, but the commencement of the proceedings. Wills, J., in the course of his judgment in that case stated that he had always understood that in criminal proceedings the commencement of them was the laying of the information. In my opinion that view is the right view to take. Ever since Ex parte Fielding was decided in 1861, the courts seem to have held that on a valid information a series of summonses can be issued unless, of course, there had been a determination on the merits. On this ground it seems to me that in the present case we should be guided by the decision in Beardsley v. Giddings, although it does not exactly cover the question here, and that we ought to hold that as the information was laid in proper time, the issue of the second summons on the 11th of February was not too late, since the information was the commencement of the proceedings. The case must be remitted to the justices to hear and determine.

TINWELL (Appellant) v. MAYHOOK (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Excise licence—Sale of spirits in bond —"Dealer in spirits"—Excise Licences Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), s. 2.

The appellant, a ships' store merchant, was the renter of a Customs bond, and in this bond he kept, amongst other dutiable articles, a quantity of spirits. The captain of a foreign vessel in the port ordered stores for his vessel from the appellant, and amongst these goods was an order for twelve reputed quart bottles of spirits. These were taken from the appellant's bonded warehouse in the ordinary course, and were conveyed to the ship and were there sealed up by a Customs official. The seal was not broken until the vessel was at sea outside territorial waters.

Held, that the appellant was a "dealer in spirits" within the meaning of section 2 of the Excise Licences Act, 1825, and required an excise licence.

Case stated by justices in and for the county of Northumberland.

At a petty sessions holden at Blyth, in and for the petty sessional division of Bedlingtonshire, in the county of Northumberland, on the 1st of December, 1903, an information was preferred by Frederick William Mayhook, officer of Inland Revenue, the respondent, against Alfred Arthur Tinwell, the appellant, charging the appellant "for that he on the 4th day of September, 1903, at Blyth, in the said county, did deal in and sell certain spirits, to wit, twelve reputed quart bottles of spirits, without having in force such a licence as by the statute in that behalf was and is required, contrary to the form of the statutes in that case made and provided."

At the hearing the following facts were proved or were admitted by both parties:

(a) That the appellant is a ships' store merchant carrying on business at his office and warehouse in Blyth. In this warehouse he kept such of his stock as consisted of ships' stores, stores upon which no excise duties are payable.

(b) That with respect to stores on which duty was payable he was a renter of a Customs bond at Blyth, and in this bond he kept, amongst other dutiable articles, a quantity of spirits.

(c) That none of these spirits or dutiable articles could be taken out of this bond except under the formalities prescribed by the Custom House officials and in the presence of an officer of Customs.

(d) That, on the 4th of September last, the captain of a foreign vessel, called The Amor, ordered a quantity of stores for his vessel from the appellant in the usual course of business. Amongst these goods was an order for twelve bottles of spirits. On receiving this order the appellant followed the usual procedure to obtain these spirits from the bond, which was as follows: A document called a "stores authority" was filled up and signed by the captain. This is a request from the captain to the appellant to draw the spirits from his bonded warehouse, and the signature of the captain is attested on the back by the appellant's representative. This document was taken to the Customs House, and in pursuance of the request the bond was opened by the Customs officials, and in the presence of a Customs officer the spirits were taken out of bond and permission given to the appellant to remove the spirits by licensed cart to the ship. On the arrival of the spirits at the ship the receipt of them was attested by another Customs official there on board, and the goods sealed up by him. This seal is not broken until the vessel is at sea outside territorial waters. [Copies of the necessary documents were annexed to and formed part of the case.]

(e) That no stock of dutiable goods was kept in the appellant's private warehouse, or at any other place than the Customs bond, and that he neither sold nor disposed of any other spirits for consumption in the United Kingdom, but only supplied the same to foreign-going vessels. On spirits supplied to such vessels no duties are payable to the Inland Revenue.

(f) That the appellant had supplied vessels with dutiable goods, including spirits, in a similar manner to this since the opening of the Customs bond at Blyth in 1898. That for years previous to 1898 he had also supplied vessels, but as there was no bond at Blyth the goods had to be brought from the Tyne, but always under the same formalities.

(g) That the appellant made yearly returns to the Inland Revenue of the quantity of spirits he supplied to foreign-going vessels, and received from them a drawback of twopence per gallon. That on no occasion had the Inland Revenue suggested to him that he ought to obtain an excise licence to deal in spirits, nor was it known to him or to the members of the ship-store trade generally in Blyth or the neighbourhood that any licence was required.

Upon these facts it was contended by the respondents that under 6 Geo. 4, c. 81, s. 2, a licence is required by every dealer in spirits not being a retailer thereof; and by section 26 of the same Act a penalty is incurred by every unlicensed dealer in spirits not being a retailer thereof. By section 104 of the Spirits Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 24), a sale by retail is defined as a sale of spirits in any quantity less than two gallons or less than one dozen reputed quart bottles. A dealer's licence is therefore required by every person selling spirits in quantities not less than two gallons. This applies to persons selling spirits in bonded warehouses, as, if not, there would have been no necessity for the exemption contained in section 12 of the Excise Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), as amended by section 5 of the Excise Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 113), and section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 90), in favour of persons selling goods in bonded warehouses in quantities not less than one hundred gallons.

For the appellant it was contended that no dealing in spirits within the meaning of the said Act had been proved. That the Act was only intended to apply to dealers for delivery or consumption within the United Kingdom, and that where there was no storage of nor dealing with spirits, except in so far as drawing from bond for export was concerned, no licence was required.

The justices being of opinion that the appellant had dealt in spirits within the meaning of the said Act without having the required licence, convicted him of the offence and fined him the mitigated penalty of £1, including costs.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether or not the justices were right in their determination that the appellant had dealt in spirits without a licence.

The Excise Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), s. 2, provides: "There shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto his Majesty, in and throughout the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the several duties of excise, or rates and sums of money hereinafter following; (that is to say,)

"For and upon every excise licence to be taken out by any maker, manufacturer, trader, dealer, retailer, or person hereinafter mentioned, within Great Britain and Ireland, to be paid by such maker, manufacturer, trader, dealer, retailer, and person respectively, the respective annual sum or duty of excise in British currency hereinafter mentioned . . . Spirits. Every dealer in spirits not being a retailer thereof ten pounds."

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Spirits Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 24), s. 104, provides: "The sale of spirits in any quantity less than two gallons or less than one dozen reputed quart bottles shall be deemed sale by retail."

Bruce Williamson, for the appellant.—The appellant was not a "dealer in spirits" within the meaning of section 2 of the Excise Licences Act, 1825. That section was intended to deal only with persons who had excisable commodities under their own control and who had premises for the purpose of storing them. A person like the appellant dealing in spirits which are never in his own custody or possession and incapable of being charged with duty by the Inland Revenue authorities and which are exported as in the present case, ought not be brought within the purview of the Excise Acts. There are numerous provisions in the Excise Acts that spirits which are exported abroad or goods which are taken out for ship stores shall not be liable to any duty either of customs or excise. By section 82 of the Spirits Act, 1880, "spirits warehoused may, on the prescribed bond being given, subject to the prescribed regulations and subject to the conditions, regulations, and restrictions required by any Act in force for the time being, be delivered out without payment of duty for ships' stores." The excise is purely a matter of inland revenue. The appellant is dealing in articles specially exempt from duty; he ought not to be compelled to take out an excise licence.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the respondent.—Section 12 of the Excise Act, 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 81), provides that it shall not be necessary to take out an excise licence for the sale of any excisable commodity, but only while it is in the import warehouse; and section 5 of the Excise Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 113), says this section " . . . shall not extend to exempt from liability, to take out an excise licence for the sale of foreign wine or spirits, any person who shall sell at one time any quantity less than 100 gallons thereof respectively." [He was stopped.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In my opinion, the decision in this case was perfectly right. The appellant carries on the business of a ships' stores merchant, and I have no doubt he sells, and would be glad to sell, spirits to the persons who wish to buy stores from him. It is said that in this particular transaction he ought not to be regarded as being a dealer in spirits, because the quantity of spirits which he sold quite lawfully to the captain of the ship came out of bond and was taken to the ship under the protection of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876. However, for reasons which were indicated by my brothers in the course of this argument, it seems to me that that code of regulations was simply enacted for the purpose of protecting the revenue against goods being taken out of bond and surreptitiously getting into such a state of circumstances that the duty ought to be paid, and is certainly not in any way conclusive, and is not an argument which helps us very much on the question whether excise duty is payable or not by the appellant as a dealer. The Act of 1825 imposes a duty upon every dealer in spirits, and I agree that for dealers in spirits in the ordinary sense there are other protective sections to which counsel for the appellant called our attention—namely, as to keeping certain books, and stock books, and certain securities that his trade would be carried on in a way which could be supervised by the officers of excise. Those precautions in the case of an ordinary dealer in spirits—a man who does sell spirits and has or may have, spirits for the purpose of sale on his premises—do not do more than afford some evidence of what was thought necessary for protecting that kind of trade. Therefore we have to see whether or not there is anything in this Act which excludes from the words "a dealer in spirits"—which are the words I have just read from the schedule in question—a man who does deal or has happened to deal, and deals as part of his trade, in spirits in bond and sells them while they are in bond. I ought to say that the terms of the certificate or the excise licence, though not given in form, are really given in section 7 of the same Act, as counsel for the respondent told us. They are to contain the true name and place of abode of the person or persons taking out the same, and the true date or time of granting such licence, and the place at which the trade or business for which the licence is granted shall be carried on. Therefore, that does not of necessity contain any particulars or details as to the character of the warehouse or anything of that kind, but only identifies the person and indicates the place at which he is going to carry on this business. That being the nature of the certificate, from the time that counsel for the appellant explained to me section 12 of the Act of 1825, and particularly when we consider section 12 as amended by or extended by the provisions of the Act of 1860, I do not think there is any doubt in this case. It is clear that the Act did consider that the sale of spirits in bond might require the person who sold them to have a licence, because the section says: "It shall not be necessary for any person or persons to take out an excise licence for the sale of any foreign goods or commodities for the sale of which in any manner an excise licence is required by this Act . . ." It is perfectly obvious that those words refer to foreign goods and commodities which would be the subject of duty if they were sold in this country or imported into this country. That is made clear by the next sentence: "whilst such goods and commodities shall be and remain in the warehouse or warehouses in which the same shall have been deposited, lodged, or secured according to law, before payment of duty upon the importation thereof." Counsel for the appellant ingeniously suggested that that meant that there might a sale before the payment of duty, and it was not necessary to take out a licence for sale as a dealer before the payment of duty. I think this is not what the section means, but that those words 'before payment of duty" are only the description of bonded warehouse in which the goods have been deposited. Then the section does not make all sales of that character sales in respect to which no licence need be taken out, but it has this important proviso: "Provided always, that every such sale shall be of not less than one entire cask," and when the Legislature refer to that in the Act of 1860, they speak of it as enacting "That it shall not be necessary for any person or persons to take out an excise licence for the sale of any foreign goods or commodities, for the sale of which in any manner an excise licence is required, whilst such goods or commodities shall be and remain in the warehouse." They again repeat the language of the section and go on to say it "shall not extend to exempt from liability to take out an excise licence for the sale of foreign wine or spirits any person who shall sell at one time any quantity less than 100 gallons." Therefore, both sections, to my mind, contemplate that the Act would have included all sales, but has limited first a smaller quantity and then a larger quantity as not being sales where a licence is required. Counsel for the appellant always assists us in these licensing cases, and in other cases too, and we pressed him to say why was that section wanted, if his view was right that all these excise licences are only required when you are selling dutiable goods—goods upon which the duty would have to be paid. He was obliged to say that they were inserted for the purpose of making it clear that a transaction which might otherwise come under the Act did not come under the Act. That is ingenious, but it does not seem to me to be consistent with the proviso. It would have been so easy to avoid all doubt by saying, "People making those sales should not be considered dealers," and then you could have understood it; but it only exempts certain kinds of sales from the necessity of a licence being taken out under an earlier section of the Act. I think, therefore, that this man does deal in spirits within the meaning of the Act of 1825. No doubt he does a most respectable and lucrative business in the sale of wines and spirits to ships, but he must do that business by being a licensed dealer and not an unlicensed dealer.

AMYOTT v. DWARRIS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Will—Construction—Eldest son of my sister.

A testator devised an estate "to the eldest son of my sister and his heirs for ever." At the date of the will the sister had two sons, but the elder of these two died in the testator's lifetime.

Held, that at the date of the will there was a person in existence answering the description in the will, and the words used were sufficient to pass the fee simple to him, had he survived the testator; but as he predeceased the testator, that there was an intestacy.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Jamaica.

The words of the will and the circumstances sufficiently appear in their lordships' judgment.

Macnaghten, K.C., and J. Austen-Cartmell, for the appellant.

Norton, K.C., and Waggett, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir ARTHUR WILSON) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The point raised on this appeal is a very short one, and in their lordships' opinion free from difficulty. The question, such as it is, turns on one passage in the will of Sir Fortunatus William Dwarris. After certain limitations, which have failed or determined, he disposed of a property called "Golden Grove" by giving it in these words: "To the eldest son of my sister Frances McKeand Gibney and his heirs for ever." It appears that at the time when the testator made his will Mrs. Gibney had two sons. There was, therefore, at that time in existence a person answering the description of the "eldest son" of his sister Frances. It was contended that the word "eldest" was not properly applicable to the elder of two persons, and that, if the testator had really meant Mrs. Gibney's first-born son, he would have said "elder," not "eldest." In their lordships' opinion, that objection savours of hypercriticism. If a man has two sons, and only two, the ordinary way of speaking of the first-born, if not designated by name, is to call him the eldest son of so-and-so. There being, then, a person in existence at the time answering the description in the will, their lordships are of opinion that that person, though he died afterwards in the testator's lifetime, was the object of the testator's bounty. There is nothing in the context to warrant any departure from the proper and ordinary meaning of the words employed.

All the authorities from Lomax v. Holmden, 1 Ves. sen. 290, to Meredith v. Treffry, 12 Ch. D. 170, point in the same direction. The case of Re Harris' Trust, 2 W. R. 689 (1854), on which the appellate court seems to place some reliance, cannot be regarded as an authority to the contrary. The learned Vice-Chancellor who decided that case was at the time of the decision under a misapprehension as to the operation of the Wills Act. He seems to have thought that with reference to the objects of testamentary bounty the Act had an effect similar to that which it has "with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it" (section 24), an error afterwards corrected by the Court of Appeal in Bullock v. Bennett, (1855) 3 W. R. 291, 7 D. M. & G. 283.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the question put ought to be answered by saying that the testator died intestate as regards the fee simple expectant upon the failure or determination of the limitations set out in paragraph 5 of the special case, and that upon the facts stated in the special case the estate is now vested in the appellant.

As an arrangement has been made as to costs, there will be no order as to costs except that the parties are to be at liberty to apply for an order to tax their their costs.

HALL AND WIFE v. LEES AND OTHERS. (a.)

Master and servant—Nurse supplied by nursing association—Negligence by nurse—Liability of committee of association.

By the carelessness of a nurse supplied by the defendants, the committee of an association formed to supply trained nurses to attend on patients during illness, the female plaintiff, while under the influence of anæsthetics, was seriously burned by a hot-water bottle placed by the nurse in direct contact with her body. In an action to recover damages for the injury so sustained, Held, that under the rules of the association the latter did not undertake to nurse the patient, but only to supply, so far as reasonable care could ensure it, a duly certified nurse, who was to be under the control and instructions of the medical man. Therefore at the time of the alleged negligent act the relation of master and servant did not exist between the association and the nurse, and the defendants were not responsible for her negligence.

Application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Jelf, J., and a jury at Manchester Assizes.

The action was brought by Harry Hall and his wife, Mary Sophia Hall, against the members of the House Committee of the Oldham Nursing Association to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the female plaintiff by reason of the negligence of a nurse who was supplied to the plaintiffs by the said association.

The plaintiffs alleged by their statement of claim as follows: That it was part of the business of the Oldham Nursing Association (the defendants) to supply trained nurses for reward for the purpose of nursing persons during sickness and assisting at operations, and that all the nurses supplied as aforesaid were engaged by the defendants and all contracts for the supply of such trained nurses were entered into with the defendants. That in March, 1902, the plaintiff, Mary Sophia Hall, was about to undergo a surgical operation, and the defendants, at the request of the plaintiffs and for reward to be paid to them by the plaintiffs, supplied two trained nurses to attend Mrs. Hall during the operation and to nurse her afterwards until her recovery. That the nurses were so negligent and unskilful in their attendance on Mrs Hall that she was severely injured. The alleged negligence was that the nurses without instructions from the surgeon who performed the operation placed hot-water bottles between Mrs. Hall's legs whilst she was unconscious under chloroform, and left them in contact with her legs during the operation and for a long time after the operation was over, and that the hot-water bottles were so hot that they severely burned Mrs. Hall's legs.

The defendants pleaded that they did not undertake to nurse Mrs. Hall, but only to find and supply her with two nurses of reasonable skill and competence to assist her at and after the operation, and to be throughout their attendance on her subject to the control and directions of the surgeons employed by the plaintiffs. Further, they pleaded that the nurses supplied by them were skilful and competent, and they (the defendants) had no power or control over them as servants, agents, or otherwise, or over their work while they were attending on Mrs. Hall.

At the trial the rules and regulations of the associa- were put in evidence, and it was further stated that the association was a voluntary association of persons who had undertaken the work of supplying trained nurses to persons in need of them within the district of Oldham, and that the wages of the nurses were paid by the association.

The material portions of the rules and regulations of the associations were as follows: "1. Name.—This institution shall be named the Oldham Nursing Association. 2. Object.—To supply aid and instruction in skilled nursing by nurses located in Oldham in accordance with these rules and regulations. 5. Officers and House Committee.—The officers shall consist of president, treasurer, and secretary or secretaries. The House Committee shall consist of the officers, with not less than seven ladies and three gentlemen, one of whom shall be a doctor. 6. Superintendent.—To be appointed by the House Committee, one month's notice for the termination of the appointment to be given on either side. Duties.—(a) To receive all applications for nursing service, and promptly attend to the same; (h) to control the work of the domestic servants; (i) to superintend the work of the nurses, and to devote what time she can command to nursing duties. 7. Nurses.—(a) Nurses shall be supplied to attend infectious cases; (b) maternity nursing shall be undertaken; (c) a proportion of nurses shall be reserved for non-infectious medical and surgical cases only. (d) Appointment and Discharge.—Nurses to be appointed or discharged by the House Committee in consultation with the superintendent. Nurses shall be recommended for appointment by the superintendent to the House Committee; for the termination of such appointment one month's notice shall be given on either side. Any nurse who infringes the rules or is guilty of misconduct is liable to dismissal by the superintendent without notice, after consultation with the president or the doctor on the House Committee, or one of the secretaries. (e) Qualifications.—Each nurse shall have had at least two years' training in a general hospital, and none shall be eligible for appointment who are over thirty-five years of age. (g) General Department.—Each nurse shall be expected to devote all her energy and skill to the work entrusted to her—viz., by affording aid and instruction for the relief of suffering, and the promotion of recovery from sickness; she shall avoid gossip, and not interfere with the domestic affairs or with the religious opinions of the patients. (h) Responsible to Superintendent.—Each nurse shall be responsible to the superintendent, to whom she shall at once refer in a case of doubt or difficulty, and shall conform to her instructions in all matters pertaining to work and conduct, and shall give to her a daily account of work done, and pay each day to the superintendent any money received for nursing. 8. Regulations as to Nurses when on Duty.—(c) Each nurse, when engaged in weekly nursing, shall be allowed eight hours' sleep and two hours' leisure daily; when on duty she shall wear the uniform provided for her. (d) When a nurse is engaged in continuous nursing and sleeps at the home, she shall be allowed ten hours out of the patient's house, the time being arranged to suit the doctor attending. (e) When at a case the nurse shall not absent herself from duty without the permission of the patient's friends. (j) Only such cases shall be undertaken as are attended by a medical man, whose instructions the nurse must implicitly follow. 10. Charges.—(a) The charges stated below are minimum charges, and may be increased at the discretion of the House Committee. (d) For continuous nursing twenty-one shillings a week with board and lodging. (k) Payments for nursing should be made to the superintendent at the time of application; if this is not done, then to the nurse when her visits are made. (m) Washing to be charged at 2s. 6d. per week, which sum, as well as travelling expenses, should be paid to the nurse."

The ordinary method of dealing with an application for a nurse was to send to the applicant with the nurse a printed form headed "Oldham Nursing Association," and to the following effect: "At the request of . . . I send herewith Nurse . . . to attend the case of . . . The charge for her services will be at the rate of £ s. d. per week." This was signed by the lady superintendent. There followed certain observations for the information of the applicant. Attached to this form was a form of "Discharge and confidential report to be returned 24 hours before the termination of the nurse's services." This consisted of a statement that the nurse's services not being required after a day named she had been notified that she might leave on that day. There was a space for a report on her "efficiency as a nurse," "to be filled in by the medical attendant," and other spaces for a report on her "care and kindness in attendance on patient" and on her "general conduct," "to be filled in by employer."

In the present case the application for a nurse was made orally by Dr. Robertson, who was Mrs. Hall's medical attendant. He asked that a particular nurse whom he named might be sent, but he was informed that her services were not available. It then appeared that two nurses would be required, and two nurses were sent accordingly. The forms which were forwarded to Mr. Hall stated that each of the nurses was sent at the request of Dr. Robertson, and that the charge for the services of each of them would be at the rate of £1 11s. 6d. per week.

The evidence showed that Mrs. Hall underwent two operations, and that, when she recovered consciousness after the second operation, it was found that a hot-water bottle had been left in direct contact with her body instead of having been separated from it by a blanket, and that she thereby suffered serious injuries.

At the trial the learned judge left two questions to the jury. The first question was—Was the injury to Mrs. Hall caused by negligence on the part of the nurses or either of them? Their answer was, Yes. The second question was—Did the association undertake to nurse Mrs. Hall through the agency of the two nurses as their servants, or only to procure for her the services of two nurses? The jury answered that the association undertook to nurse her through the agency of the nurses as their servants. They assessed the damages at £300. The learned judge directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for that amount.

The defendants appealed.

Montague Lush, K.C. (T. F. Byrne and Arthur Page with him), for the defendants.—Whether the verdict of the jury that there was negligence here on the conflicting evidence given was right or wrong, for the purposes of this appeal it was not challenged. The sole ground of the appeal was that on the true construction of the contract the finding of the jury to the second question could not be supported. There was no undertaking, no contract, on the part of the defendants to perform the work of nursing. All they undertook to do was to supply trained certified hospital nurses. When the nurse entered on her duties at the patient's house the defendants ceased to have any control over her so far as the details of nursing went, she received her instructions from the medical man and became the servant of the patient engaged to carry out the orders of the doctor and assist and wait on the patient during her illness as her servant for the time being.

Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co, 25 W. R. 263, 2 C. P. D. 205; Donovan v. Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate, 41 W. R. 455, [1893] 1 Q. B. 629; and Murray v. Currie, 19 W. R. 104, L. R. 6 C. P. 24, were cited.

Pickford, K.C., and W. Ambrose Jones, for the plaintiffs.—By the rules of the association the committee supply trained nurses on payment of certain fees to the association to nurse patients through illness, the nurses being paid regular salaries by the association. The superintendent's duty was to receive and attend to all applications for nurses; and each nurse was responsible to the superintendent, from whom she received her instructions. The committee therefore exercised general control over all the nursing staff and had power to dismiss for misconduct, incompetency, or other reasonable cause. They therefore were liable for the nurses' negligence. The jury having found that the plaintiff's injuries were caused through want of care or skill on the part of one or both of the nurses whom the defendants sent to perform the work of nursing, the defendants were liable, the relation of master and servant having been established between the association and the nurses. To say that the nurse was the servant of the doctor because she received instructions from him was as startling a proposition as it was unsound. It was true that the doctor's orders were to be carried out by the nurse, but the parting with control over a servant for a specific purpose did not relieve the master from liability arising from the servant's negligence in the performance of that special duty.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is certainly an interesting case and one of some public importance, for it has to do with a state of things which is very common and in which the community at large are very much concerned. The defendants were the house committee of an association of persons who from philanthropic motives had organized a system by which they supplied skilled nurses to attend surgical operations and other cases of sickness. They did this for persons who could not afford to pay for the attendance of nurses, and also for persons who could pay. The nurses were selected by them, and they took great care to get competent nurses. They paid them regular salaries, and in this way they were able to keep at their disposal a number of nurses of whose qualifications they were assured. In the present case the applicant for a nurse was a person who was able to pay. He required a nurse to attend his wife who had to undergo a serious operation. The application was made personally by the doctor who was attending the patient. He asked for a particular nurse, with whose capability he was acquainted, but he was unable to obtain her services. It turned out that two nurses were necessary, and two were supplied, and the operation was performed. After the operation it was discovered that, while the patient was unconscious by reason of anæsthetic which had been administered to her, one of the nurses had carelessly applied a hot-water bottle in such a way as to cause the patient a serious burn. In respect of this injury the patient's husband and herself brought this action against the association who had supplied the nurses. The question was whether the association on supplying a nurse became responsible to the patient for any negligence on the part of the nurse. That is a question the answer to which turns on what is the real contract between the parties. If by the contract the association undertook to nurse the patient, then they would be responsible for any want of skill on the part of the person whom they sent to perform the work of nursing. If, on the other hand, all the association contracted to do was to supply the patient with a competent nurse, then, if they exercised ordinary care and skill in choosing the nurse, their responsibility was at an end, and they were not responsible for any want of care or skill on the part of the nurse.

Now, looking at the rules and regulations, what did they show? There appeared to be no other evidence, except the rules and regulations and the other printed documents to which they had been referred, as to what the association undertook to do. Did they show an undertaking to nurse or only to supply nurses? The jury had found that the association undertook to nurse. But in my opinion this is not a question of fact for the jury, but a question of law for the court on the construction of documents. It seems to be clear, on a consideration of those documents, that the undertaking of the association was to find and supply nurses as to whom they had taken all possible means to secure that they were properly qualified and efficient. That is the extent of their undertaking. The plaintiffs called attention to some rules which they said suggested the relation of master and servant between the association and the nurses. The rules only aimed at securing efficiency on the part of the nurses for the benefit of those to whom they were sent. [His lordship having referred at length to the rules and regulations and the other documents, continuing said:] The conclusion at which I have arrived is that the association did not undertake to nurse the patient, but to supply her with a nurse, so far as reasonable care could ensure it, competent to perform the duties of a nurse, who, while she was with the patient, should be under the control and instructions of the medical attendant, and should not, so far as nursing was concerned, be the servant of the association. It seems to me unnecessary to refer to any authorities, but I should like to quote a few words from the judgments in the case of Murray v. Currie, 19 W. R. 104, L. R. 6 C. P. 24. There the question arose whether stevedores engaged in loading a ship were servants of the owner of the ship. Willes, J., said: "In one sense, indeed, they may be said to be agents of the owner; but they are not in any sense his servants. They are not put in his place to do an act which he intended to do for himself." And Brett, J., said: "I apprehend it to be a true principle of law that, if I lend my servant to a contractor, who is to have the sole control and superintendence of the work contracted for, the independent contractor is alone liable for any wrongful act done by the servant while so employed. The servant is doing, not my work, but the work of the independent contractor." Applying the principle laid down there to the present case, it cannot be said that the relation of master and servant existed so as to make the association liable for the negligence of the nurse. It follows, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

CHAPMAN v. WINSON. (a.)

Principal and agent — Commission — Sale of house — "When and if the purchase is completed by private treaty."

The defendant, who had a house for sale, agreed with the plaintiff that if the latter introduced to him a person within a week who should become the purchaser of the house, he would pay the plaintiff as and by way of commission a sum of £50 "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty." The plaintiff introduced a lady, who signed a contract to purchase the house and paid the defendant a deposit. The lady was, however, unable to carry out the contract, and an arrangement was come to between her and the defendant that the latter should release her from the contract and should retain the deposit, and this was done. The plaintiff having claimed commission,

Held, that the commission was payable only in the event of the purchase being completed in the ordinary legal meaning of the word by the execution of the conveyance and the handing over of the purchase-money, and that, as the purchase went off through no default of the vendor, the plaintiff was not entitled to commission.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (52 W. R. 478) reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) reversing the judgment of Judge Austin sitting at the Bristol County Court (reported 52 W. R. 478).

The action was brought to recover commission. In June, 1902, the defendant, who was a trustee of the property, was trying to sell the Full Moon Hotel, particulars of which he gave to the plaintiff, who knew a lady who was a likely purchaser. On the 8th of September, 1902, the defendant gave the plaintiff the following commission note: "I have seen Mr. Dunwell (Bass & Co.'s manager), and he is agreeable that if your friend is named and introduced within one week and becomes the purchaser of the above hotel that you shall be paid as and by way of commission the sum of £50 when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty. This is, of course, subject to your friend not having previously been introduced and no one else being entitled in respect of the same introduction."

The lady was thereupon introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff, and on the 11th of September she signed a contract agreeing to purchase the hotel from the defendant for £2,000, and by way of deposit she paid the defendant £200. Subsequently she found that she would be unable to complete the contract, and she wrote to that effect to the plaintiff, who on the 30th of October wrote the following letter to the defendant: "I have this morning received a remarkable letter from the lady Re Full Moon, in which she says the landlords have upset her. I am perfectly willing to help try and get her to complete, but whether she does now do so or not, as per custom I shall look to you for my commission out of her deposit."

An arrangement was thereupon come to between the defendant and the lady whereby it was agreed that the defendant should release her from the contract, and that he should retain the deposit of £200, and this was accordingly done. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action in the Bristol County Court claiming commission.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, being of opinion that in construing the commission note he was bound to give some effect to the words "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty," and that inasmuch as the purchase never was completed in the ordinary meaning of the word, and inasmuch as the purchase went off through no default of the vendor, the plaintiff was not entitled to commission. The Divisional Court held that the word "completed," as used in the commission note, did not mean completed in the ordinary legal sense—namely, by execution of the deed of conveyance and the handing over of the purchase-money; that the purchase was "completed by private treaty," the vendor being bound by the contract to sell and the purchaser to buy; and that the plaintiff was entitled to commission.

The defendant appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court, reversing the judgment of the judge of the Bristol County Court in an action by the plaintiff to recover commission. The county court judge held that the plaintiff was not entitled to commission upon the ground that the conditions precedent which had to be performed in order to entitle him to commission had not in fact been performed by him. The question turns wholly upon the construction of this particular commission note. By it the defendant agreed that "if your friend is named and introduced within one week, and becomes the purchaser of the above hotel, you shall be paid as and by way of commission a sum of £50 when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty. This is, of course, subject to your friend not having previously been introduced and no one else being entitled in respect of the same introduction." In fact, a lady was introduced by the plaintiff, and that lady entered into a contract to purchase the hotel for £2,000, and she agreed to pay a deposit of £200 at once, and £1,800, the balance of the purchase-money, later. She paid the deposit, and then found that it was out of her power to complete the purchase. In these circumstances the plaintiff wrote a letter to the defendant advising him of that fact, in which he said: "I am perfectly willing to help try and get her to complete, but whether she does now do so or not as per custom I shall look to you for my commission out of her deposit." That raises the question at issue. In that letter the plaintiff placed his own construction upon the word "completed," saying that the lady had not completed, and yet by what he called "custom" he claimed to be entitled to commission. The county court judge found that upon the true construction of the commission note completion meant completion by payment of the purchase-money, and that therefore the condition upon which the commission was to become payable was not fulfilled. The Divisional Court took a different view, and dwelling upon the later words "by private treaty," held that those words were attached to and governed the previous word "completed," and that they meant that when and if the treaty to purchase was completed by an agreement, then whether the actual purchase was completed or not, the commission became payable. It is, no doubt, possible for a party to agree to pay commission in any event he pleases, and therefore we must see what is the agreement which the parties have made in the present case. It seems to me that upon the true construction of the contract the parties have made it a condition precedent to the right to commission on the introduction of a purchaser that the purchase should be completed—that is to say, that the purchase-money should be paid over. The commission note emphasises this twice. It first states "if your friend is named and introduced within one week and becomes the purchaser." That does not mean a mere agreement on paper by some one to become the purchaser, but it means that the person introduced shall actually become the purchaser. For instance, it cannot be supposed that commission would be payable if a crossing-sweeper entered into a contract to become the purchaser. There is no question here of the purchase going off owing to the default of the vendor. Then the commission note later on speaks of the commission being payable "when and if the purchase is completed by private treaty." As my brother Stirling has pointed out during the argument, those words cannot mean that the agreement of purchase is to be completed by another agreement or treaty. They mean that the purchase is to be completed in the ordinary sense. The contract shows that the defendant meant to exclude any liability to pay commission upon a mere agreement to purchase. He intended that the transaction should begin by a treaty of purchase to be carried to completion by payment of the purchase-money. This view is in accordance with the authorities which have been referred to. The question depends in each case upon the terms of the particular contract, but in Lott v. Outhwaite it seems to me that in all its essentials the contract was the same as that in the present case. There Lindley, L.J., in giving judgment, said: "In order to entitle himself to his commission the agent must prove either that the purchase had been completed, or that, if it had not, the non-completion was due to the default of the vendor." The learned Lord Justice there used the word "completion" in the same sense as it was used in the contract in the present case. He went on: "Had the purchase in the present case in any fair business sense of the word been 'completed'? The answer must be unquestionably, No. Deane had admitted in cross-examination that he was unable to complete. The vendor had not been in default. He gave the purchaser facilities for completing the contract in bits. The purchaser paid £3,000, and the vendor received a further sum of £3,000 from sub-purchasers. There the thing stopped. The purchase had never been completed, and there had been no default of the vendor." In that case the contract did not go on, because the whole of the purchase-money was not paid, and therefore the purchase was not completed. The same thing in effect has happened here. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The real question which we have to decide is, what is the true meaning of the commission note in the present case. Mr. Kerly admitted that, if the words "by private treaty" had not been inserted after the words "when and if the purchase is completed," he would be out of court, and indeed he could not have avoided that admission by reason of the decision of this court in Lott v. Outhwaite. The Divisional Court attached great weight to the words "by private treaty," and thought that the defendant's contention required them to transpose those words and to place them next after the word "purchase," and that it would be a wrong construction of the agreement so to trans-pose them. The Divisional Court in reality thought that by reason of the words "by private treaty" coming immediately after the word "completed" the agreement meant, "when and if an agreement to purchase is completed by private treaty." That seems to me to be a wider departure from the language of the commission note than the mere transposition of the words "by private treaty." With all respect I am unable to take the same view of the commission note as that taken by the Divisional Court, which, if I may be allowed to speculate on the matter, does not seem to me to be in accordance with the intention of the parties.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Each case must be determined according to the terms of the particular commission note. Everything here points to this, that the commission was intended to be payable when, and only when, the purchase-money was paid to the defendant. The vendor was only a trustee of the property, and he had no personal interest in the matter beyond that of a trustee. In these circumstances, the commission note was drawn up. It seems to me that the material words are "when and if the purchase is completed." Here the purchase never was completed.

JARVIS v. BIRMINGHAM CORPORATION. (a.)

Will—Charity—"Charitable and benevolent"—Validity of gift—Construction.

Where a testator by his will gave the residue of his real and personal estate to "charitable and benevolent" institutions,

Held, that there was no uncertainty, and that the gift took effect as a charitable bequest.

Adjourned summons.

By his will dated the 12th of June, 1899, Thomas Best, the testator, after making divers dispositions of his property, gave, devised, and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate unto his trustees therein named and their heirs, upon trust to pay thereout his just debts and legacies, and the testator gave, devised, and bequeathed all the ultimate residue of his said real and personal estate unto the Lord Mayor and corporation of the city of Birmingham upon trust to apply the same and the income thereof in aid of such charitable and benevolent institutions in the city of Birmingham and the Midland counties in such manner and in such proportions as the said lord mayor and general purposes committee for the time being of the said corporation should in their sole discretion from time to time determine and direct.

The testator died on the 1st of June, 1903, and his will was duly proved by the executors therein named.

The present application was made by trustees of the will, in order to obtain the opinion of the court as to the validity of the said charitable gift.

Hewett, for the trustees of the will.

Methold, for the Birmingham Corporation.—A gift to charitable or benevolent objects has been held void for uncertainty, but a gift to charitable and benevolent objects has never been so held. In several Scotch cases similar words have been held to be good, and in one case, Cobb v. Cobb's Trustees, 21 Rettie 638, the actual words in question in the present case were upheld. On this construction, "charitable" governs "benevolent," and there is no uncertainty: In re Sutton, Stone v. Attorney-General, 28 Ch. D. 464, 33 W. R. Dig. 243.

Parker, for the Attorney-General, took the same view.

Preston, for the next-of-kin of the testator.—Scotch cases are not binding in this court and in the present instance they are not applicable; the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, does not apply to Scotland, and the Scotch courts will not execute a trust: Blair v. Duncan, 50 W. R. 369, [1902] A. C. 37.

Ellis v. Selby, 1 My. & C. 286, was also cited.

FARWELL J., in giving judgment, said: On the construction of the words of the will, in my opinion the gift is good. The words "charitable and benevolent" must be taken as referring to one class of objects. I cannot, as I am asked to do, infer from the wording of the will that the testator intended two classes of objects to benefit. If I did so it would be in effect to read the words of the gift as "charitable or benevolent." I am not surprised that, owing to the technical meaning that the word "charity" has acquired in the English law, the testator, if he wished the charities which were to benefit under his will to be those of a benevolent nature, should insert words to give effect to such wish. The effect is that any object in order to take under the gift must be a charitable one in the legal sense, and further, that it must be benevolent as well.

Cases decided in the Scotch courts are in no sense binding here, and for the reasons that have been given in argument, in my opinion, the Scotch cases that have been cited are inapplicable to the present case.

The dictum of the court in Ellis v. Selby, 1 My. & C. 286, was merely interlocutory and is overruled. This is outweighed by In re Sutton, Stone v. Attorney-General, 28 Ch. D. 464, and I must follow it.

The result is, therefore, that the gift in question is good as a charitable bequest.

Motion.

The Barry Urban District Council, as the local education authority for the urban district of Barry, under section 1 of the Education Act, 1902, established an education committee which was constituted in accordance with the scheme made by the council and approved by the Board of Education.

The scheme provided that the education committee should, when complete, consist of nine members, of whom five were to consist of members of the council. Under clause 6, the five members of the committee who were elected as members of the council were not to hold office after they had ceased to be members of the council, and subject thereto, and to another provision, immaterial to be here stated, the members of the committee were to hold office for a period of three years, "provided nevertheless that one-third shall go out of office on the 1st day of May, in the year 1904, and in each succeeding year. The council shall determine the order in which they shall retire."

The proceedings of the council are regulated by standing orders framed under the authority of the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 199, and the Public Health Act, 1875, Schedule I.

Under standing order No. 19, notices of motion are to be given in writing five days before the meeting of the council.

Under No. 35, no motion to rescind any resolution which has been passed within the preceding six months, is to be in order, unless one month's notice thereof has been given, and unless the same has been mentioned in the notice of the meeting at which it is to be discussed.

Under No. 40, all or any of the standing orders may be suspended for any specific purpose by a two-thirds majority of the council.

At the annual meeting of the council, held on the 20th of April, 1903, nine persons, including the plaintiff and four other members of the council, were appointed members of the education committee. It was resolved that three members of the committee, of whom the plaintiff was not one, should retire at the end of the first year, that three other members, including the plaintiff, should retire at the end of the second year, and that the remaining three should retire at the third year.

Owing to the redistribution of the wards in the urban district of Barry, the whole of the members of the council went out of office on the 15th of April, 1904, on which day there was an election, the plaintiff again being elected as a member of the council.

On the 18th of April, 1904, the annual meeting of the council was held. At this meeting, the standing orders having been suspended by the requisite majority it was resolved "that so much of the resolution passed by the council on the 20th of April, 1903, deciding that Miss M. E. Meredith should retire from the education committee at the end of the first year, and that Mr. Milward (the plaintiff) should retire from such committee at the end of the second year, be rescinded, and that in lieu thereof Miss M. E. Meredith retire on the 1st of May, 1905, and Mr. J. Milward (the plaintiff) retire on the 1st of May, 1904."

Subsequently to the passing of this resolution the council interfered with and prevented the plaintiff from attending at and acting as a member of the education committee.

The plaintiff accordingly brought an action against the council asking for a declaration that the resolution of the 18th of April, 1904, was ultrà vires, and that he was entitled to act as a member of the education committee until 1905. He asked for an injunction against the council.

It was arranged that the hearing of a motion for an interlocutory injunction should be treated as the trial of the action.

Under section 17 (1) of the Education Act, 1902, a council having powers under the Act is to establish an education committee, or education committees, constituted in accordance with a scheme made by the council and approved by the Board of Education.

Under section 21 (3), a scheme under the Act, when approved, is to have effect as if it were enacted in the Act, and any such scheme may be revoked or altered by a scheme made in like manner and having the same effect as an original scheme.

Buckmaster, K.C., and O. Leigh Clare, for the plaintiff.—The statute and the scheme together constitute a complete code of all the rights of all parties. There is no power given to the council to enable it from time to time to vary the order of retirement of the members of the education committee. Consequently as soon as the council has once fixed the order of retirement, its powers in this matter are exhausted.

Astbury, K.C., and Lushington, for the defendant council.—There is a distinction between acts of the council which are done under the Education Act and the scheme, and acts which are done by virtue of its own discretion. Thus we agree that the plaintiff once having been elected a member of the education committee, could not be ousted before his term of office had expired. But it was open to the council, in the exercise of its own discretion, provided that it did not transgress the provisions of the scheme, to vary the order of retirement of the members of the committee, and thus cut short the plaintiff's term of office. It might further be objected that the plaintiff has no title to sue. It is clear from section 17 (2) of the Act that the committee has no property, and membership of the education committee is, therefore, merely an administrative office which confers no vested right on its holders. Aslatt v. Corporation of Southampton, 29 W. R. 117, 16 Ch. D. 143, and Livingstone v. Mayor of Westminster, 52 W. R. 395, [1904] 2 K. B. 109, are distinguishable on this ground. The council, however, has no desire to press this objection.

BUCKLEY, J., after reading the above-cited section of the Education Act, and referring to the scheme, continued: Now it is to be noticed that the Act simply provides that the council is to establish an education committee. The members of the committee, how they are to retire, and all other details are left, so far as the Act is concerned, to be determined under the word "establish." The council is to establish the committee, determine its constitution, and so on, and then that which they so establish is to be "the education committee." Under the term "establish" they either could, or they could not, determine the method of retirement. If they could not determine the method of retirement, of course they could not resolve that one of the members should retire at a particular date. I have doubt myself that they could determine the method of retirement. If they determine the method of retirement, could they reserve to themselves power from time to time to vary the method of retirement which they had once established under the Act? I think not. What they did was this. [His lordship read the resolutions passed at the two meetings of the council, and continued:] That is to say, the council purported to rescind the resolution at which it had previously arrived, that Mr. Milward should retire at the end of the second year. I think it had no power to do so. When, in 1903, the council passed the resolution that he be appointed, and that he do retire at the end of the second year, it was functus officio until it procured the approval of a new scheme under section 21 (3) of the Act. The council had appointed Mr. Milward to be a member of the education committee to hold office until the 1st of May, 1905.

The argument on the other side really comes to this, that by introducing into the scheme the words, "the council shall determine the order in which they shall retire," they had provided that the council shall from time to time determine the order in which they shall retire. I do not think that they had any power to do that. Their own power was to make a scheme which was to be a final scheme, and they could not make a scheme as to which they could say, "This is not to be a final scheme, but is to be revocable and alterable as we from time to time think proper." The Act of Parliament prohibits that by section 21 (3), which says that a scheme may be revoked or altered by a scheme made in like manner, but not otherwise. I do not think that they had any power to reserve to themselves by the scheme any authority to vary from time to time that which they had done under the scheme. I think that the effect of this resolution of 1903 is just as if they had written in the scheme, "the members shall consist of nine people, of whom Mr. Milward shall be one, and Mr. Milward shall hold office until 1905." I do not think that they had any power to alter that.

A question was suggested, though Mr. Astbury said he was not in a position to raise it, as to whether Mr. Milward could sue in respect of an office in respect of which he had no property—a mere administrative office. Of course the question would be capable of being raised somehow by the defendants, or others interested in being in office, but Mr. Astbury does not raise the question that the plaintiff is not the proper person to sue, and asks for a decision, and says that there is no defect as regards the power to sue.

I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that the resolution that he should retire in 1904 is ultrà vires, and that he is entitled to act as a member of the committee until May, 1905, and that an injunction must go to restrain the defendants from acting contrary to the Act.

ALIANZA CO. (LIMITED) v. BELL (SURVEYOR OF TAXES). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Company resident in United Kingdom—Trade carried on partly in the United Kingdom and partly abroad—Exhaustion of capital—Caliche beds—Manufacture from caliche of nitrates and iodine—Exhaustion of beds—Deduction from gross profits of the cost of raw material—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c 35), s. 100, Schedule D, case 1, rr. 1, 3; and 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

A company purchased nitrate grounds in Chile. The business of the company was to manufacture from the "caliche" dug up from the surface of the nitrate grounds, at works situated some miles distant, nitrates and iodine, from the sale of which their profits were made. In assessing the profits of the company to income tax under Schedule D, the company claimed a deduction in respect of the cost of the raw material, the "caliche," as being a disbursement or expense for the purposes of their trade.

Held, that the company must be treated as a company formed for the purpose of working a bed of "caliche"; that the exhaustion of the "caliche" was in the nature of expenditure of capital, and that no allowance could be made in respect of it, although the beds were being exhausted.

Case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London, upon an appeal to them by the Alianza Co. (Limited) against an assessment made upon them under Schedule D of the Act of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 for the year ended the 5th of April, 1901, of £67,950 based on the company's printed accounts for the three preceding years ended the 31st of December, 1899.

The material facts set out in the case were as follows:

The appellant company is an English company and was, incorporated on the 11th of June, 1895, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, with memorandum and articles of association, and has a registered office at 3, Gracechurch-street, in the city of London.

The appellants are the owners of nitrate grounds known as Alianza, in the province of Tarapaca, in the Republic of Chile, containing 361 Peruvian estacas, or thereabouts, with the buildings and machinery thereon; and they have erected a factory and acquired for refuse ground other lands immediately adjoining the said nitrate grounds, and they have acquired wells on grounds for sources of water supply at Pozo Quinto and elsewhere; and they have also acquired and hold in connection with the said nitrate grounds lands at the port of Chucumata, some of which are held by them absolutely and other parts of which are held for terms of years. The appellants manufacture from "caliche," nitrates and iodine, and export the same for sale.

The objects for which the company was established were as stated in the memorandum of association to be (inter alia)—(a) "To acquire and take over the nitrate grounds known as 'Alianza' in the province of Tarapaca, in the Republic of Chile, containing 361 Peruvian estacas, or thereabouts, with the buildings and machinery thereon, and a site for the erection of a factory and for refuse ground, also other lands immediately adjoining the said nitrate grounds and certain lands at the port of Chucumata, together with all rights acquired in connection therewith being the property of Messrs. Gibbs & Co., of Iquique, Chile, and with a view thereto to enter into and carry into effect, with or without modification, the agreement referred to in clause 5 of the articles of association of this company." (b) "To carry on the business of manufacturers and exporters of and dealers in nitrates, iodine, and other products." (d) "To open, work, explore, develop, and maintain the nitrate grounds or deposits, minerals and other properties and works of the company."

The capital of the company is £1,000,000, divided into 200,000 shares of £5 each. Articles 81 and 82 relate to the powers of directors and include powers as therein mentioned of issuing debentures, bonds, mortgages, debenture stock, and other securities. Article 83 relates to reserve fund, and provides as follows: "The directors before recommending any dividend may carry to a reserve fund such assets as they think proper, and such reserve fund shall be available to meet contingencies or for dividends or for making good loss or depreciation or for repairing, improving, and maintaining any of the property of the company and for such other purposes as the directors shall in their absolute discretion think conducive to the interests of the company, and subject to clause 4 hereof the directors may invest the reserve fund upon any investments which are or may be authorized by law in England as investments for trustees, and the directors may from time to time deal with and vary such investments and dispose of all or any part thereof for the benefit of the company and divide the reserve fund into such special funds as they think fit, and shall not be bound to keep any of the assets constituting such reserve fund separate from the other assets of the company." Article 85 provides that: "The directors may from time to time write off from the amount standing in the books of the company, to the credit of cost of any assets of the company or on any other account, such sums as the directors may consider reasonable or proper either for depreciation or on account of bad or doubtful debts or otherwise howsoever." Article 96 provides that: "The cost to the company of and incident to the acquisition of any property may for the purposes of the balance-sheet be taken into account in estimating the value of such property and may be spread over a series of years."

By agreement dated the 14th of June, 1895, the nitrate grounds known as Alianza referred to in the memorandum were duly acquired from Messrs. Gibbs & Co., and the company took possession of the said property and the other properties referred to in the agreement. They erected large manufacturing works (termed officina) in Chile on the said property. The raw material (caliche) from which nitrate is produced is found in deposits upon the said nitrate grounds either at or close to the surface, and in layers covering the said nitrate grounds about six feet in depth. The chief value of the nitrate grounds consists in the caliche, which is found on the land, and, when the same has been worked out and exhausted, the commissioners are of opinion that the land, machinery, and plant will be of little value. Before the purchase of the nitrate grounds acquired by the appellant company, the same had been examined and tested by numerous bore holes for the purpose of ascertaining the presence and extent of the layers of caliche.

The process of manufacture which has been, and is, followed by the appellant company is as follows: The raw material (caliche), which usually contains about 30 per cent. of nitrate of soda, is loosened in the ground by the means of explosives, and is then dug up and carted or railed to the works. It is then crushed and subjected to various processes of manufacture, and is then bagged and sent by rail to the ports and shipped. To produce nitrate of potash, subject to certain modifications of detail in manufactures, the general treatment is the same. The "caliche" on the said nitrate grounds owned by the appellant company is year by year consumed and worked out, being the raw material used for the production of the nitrates and iodine.

The exact amount of "caliche" used by the appellants in any year can be ascertained without difficulty.

The appellants' gross profit on takings are wholly derived from the sale of nitrate and iodine, the raw material of which is extracted from the said grounds as aforesaid. According to the report of the company for the year 1898 it is stated that a sum had been advanced by Messrs. Antony Gibbs & Sons for working capital, which sum had since been liquidated principally by the issue in January, 1898, of 2,000 5 per cent. debenture bonds of £100 each (£200,000), which issue would be gradually redeemed by annual drawings during a period of about fifteen years or sooner at the discretion of the directors. In the report of the directors submitted to the shareholders at the sixth annual general meeting of the company on the 27th of June, 1900, the directors stated that "the gross profits arising from nitrate and iodine shipped during the year amount to £101,699 17s. 2d., and the balance at credit of profit and loss, including the balance brought forward from 1898, amounts to £88,186 12s. 5d., of which total £83,000 1s. 4d. was earned during the year." The balance of profit and loss was divided as follows: A dividend of 6 per cent. on the share capital, £60,000; redemption of capital account, £25,000; carried forward to 1900, £3,186 12s. 5d.—£88,186 12s. 5d. "The directors are of opinion that, so long at all events as any debentures of the company are outstanding, a fund should be formed to meet the yearly exhaustion of the grounds and to redeem the capital expended on machinery and plant which will be of but little value when the grounds are completely exhausted. The board therefore propose to form a redemption of capital account and to credit this account with £25,000 out of the earnings of the year under review."

The appellant company contended that the nitrate grounds not being situate in England they could not be assessed under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts, and that the Crown could only assess, and had in fact only assessed, the appellants under Schedule D, case 1, in respect of profits produced by a trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern partly carried on in England and partly abroad, according to the case of San Paulo Railway Co. v. Carter, 44 W. R. 336, [1896] A. C., p. 31, and Bank of Mexico v. Apthorpe, 39 W. R. 564, [1891] 2 Q. B. 378; they contended that the facts showed that part of the expenses of the trade or business is the purchase or acquisition of raw material, which is worked up into the finished article for the purposes of sale and produces a profit, and that the profits ought to be ascertained on the same principle as those of any other business which consists in the purchase and working up of any raw material so as to produce profit, and that, in estimating the balance of the appellants' profits and gains, a deduction ought to be made for the actual cost of the raw material worked up in the year as being a disbursement or expense, being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the appellants' trade. It was further contended that the fact that the stock of raw material required for a series of years was purchased at one operation could make no difference in principle, and the case of a wine merchant laying in a stock to ripen for sale was referred to as being analogous.

The surveyor contended (inter alia) that the deduction claimed was inadmissible, inasmuch as the cost or value of the nitrate grounds was treated in the company's balance-sheet as a capital asset, and that any deduction therefrom or depreciation thereof must necessarily be a capital charge, and that the appellants' claim was in effect a claim for exhaustion of capital. He referred also to the case of the Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, and specially to the terms of the Lord President's judgment in the First Division, 1 Tax. Cas., pp. 307-9.

The commissioners considered the provisions of the Income Tax Acts, and, inter alia, the following cases, viz.: Miller v. Fairie, 16 Sc. L. R. 189; Forder v. Handyside, 24. W. R. 764, 1 Ex. D. 233, 1 Tax. Cas. 65; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Banks, 18 Sc. L R. 85, 1 Tax. Cas. 487; Knowles v. McAdam, 26 W. R. 114, 3 Ex. D. 23, 1 Tax. Cas. 161; Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315, 1 Tax. Cas. 287; Watney & Co. v. Musgrave, 28 W. R. 491, 5 Ex. D. 241, 1 Tax. Cas 272; Gillat and Watts v. Colquhoun, 33 W. R. 258, 2 Tax. Cas. 76. There was no evidence as to the proportion of the purchase-money or consideration applicable or attributable to the "caliche" as distinguished from the nitrate grounds and other subjects of purchase, nor was there any evidence as to the cost or quantity of the raw material or of the number of years it would take to exhaust the nitrate fields. The commissioners disallowed the claim of the appellant company, and confirmed the assessment.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Bremner, for the company.

S. A. T. Rowlatt (Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., with him), for the Crown.

The following cases were also cited in addition to those referred to in the special case during the argument: Secretary of State for India v. Scoble and Others, 51 W. R. 580, [1903] 1 K. B. 494, [1903] A. C. 299; Addie & Sons, 1 Tax. Cas. 1; City of London Contracts Corporation (Limited) v. Styles, 2 Tax. Cas. 239; Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Co. v. Kinment, 2 Tax. Cas. 516; Tennant v. Smith, 3 Tax. Cas. 158.

The argument, as will be seen from the judgment, turned on the question whether the undertaking of the company ought to be regarded as that of a manufacturing company, or one whose business consisted in working the nitrate grounds in the same way as minerals are worked by a mining company. In the former case the company would be entitled to deduct in respect of the caliche—the raw material they manufactured the nitrates of soda and iodine from, and by the sale of which they derived their profits—consumed each year from their property, which was thus year by year being exhausted and decreased in value.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I have to deal with an appeal by the Alianza Co. from an assessment to income tax, and the ground of the appeal is that they were improperly disallowed a deduction which they claimed from the amount at which they were assessed in respect of the cost price to them of material called caliche which they consumed in the course of the manufacture of nitrates, upon the sale of which nitrates there are substantial profits and from which their profits come.

The business which the company carry on appears to be this: They are the owners of certain property in Chile called at one place in the case "nitrate grounds," but which I understand comprise a tract of country upon which there is a sort of deposit of this substance called caliche, the valuable part of which consists in these nitrates. The nitrates have to be extracted by a process which I may call a process of manufacture. The plaintiffs are owners of this tract of country, and their business consists in digging up this stuff, carrying it for a considerable distance on a private railway of their own, and then dealing with it in such a way as to extract the valuable products. It is one of those cases in which the process necessarily exhausts the material, and in all cases where you have to ascertain for the purpose of rating the annual value of the annual income of an undertaking which necessarily consumes, in the course of its working, the stock upon which it starts, you always have a problem of considerable difficulty. It arises in the case of mines, quarries, and brickfields, and, for a slightly different reason, in the case of cemetery companies and so forth which have been dealt with in the same way. In most cases you have some conventional rule by which you have to go. In the case of income tax you have the Income Tax Acts, and if they deal with the case and if they provide a mode of dealing with it, that mode is the one which you must follow. Now, income tax is somewhat peculiar in some respects. An income is assessed in the same way and on the same basis whether it is permanent income or whether it is a temporary income. In some cases that is rather hard on a man. A man's earnings are dealt with for the purpose of income tax exactly as an income from some permanent investment such as Consols or something else which does not come to an end, and the income is ascertained according to that which is actually received in a year, apart from the question whether or not it is permanent. I think that circumstance affords the solution of difficulties which otherwise it would be extremely difficult to solve in reference to the mode in which you assess such an undertaking as a mine. The mineowner starts with his stock of coal or mineral in his mine and he works it out. In the course of time, if he has a leasehold interest in it, his term comes to an end, it very often is so, but even if he has not a leasehold interest, in course of time his seam of coal gets exhausted. It is quite clear that in the case of a mine in this country the mineowner pays income tax upon what he gets out of the mine, less, of course, the current expenses of getting it, but without any allowance for the original cost price to him of acquiring the mine. So with other undertakings of a similar character. All of those are assessed under Schedule A, and Mr. Danckwerts' argument is that, although that is the case when the properties are assessed under Schedule A, yet it is not the case when they are assessed under Schedule D. In the case of properties assessed under Schedule A it is property in the United Kingdom, and the assessment is upon the annual value of the property. The words are: "For and in respect of the property in all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages in the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual value thereof" so much. The annual value is taken in those cases by a considerable number of decisions—including at least one in the House of Lords—to be measured by what you can get out of the property irrespective of any charge for having acquired the property in the first instance. A coal mine pays upon the coal brought to bank and sold, less the expenses in getting it there and any royalties, if it happens they are working upon royalties, but without regard to any sum that would have been paid in the first instance for the acquisition of the mine.

Now in the case of properties abroad Schedule A does not apply, but Schedule D does, and that schedule is in these words: "For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom"—this company for the purposes of this case is admitted to reside here—"from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains

Ex parte THE BANKRUPT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Claim by bankrupt to inspect the record of the minutes of the committee of inspection —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 80.

A bankrupt has no right to inspect the records of the minutes of his committee of inspection, and in the absence of exceptional circumstances the court will not give him leave to do so.

Application by the bankrupt for an order that he be permitted to inspect all records of minutes of the committee of inspection in his bankruptcy, and copies of letters addressed to creditors and others by the trustee.

On the 9th of May, 1904, the bankrupt applied to the official receiver for leave to inspect a record of the minutes of a meeting of the committee of inspection held on the 23rd of February, 1899.

The official receiver, in reply, gave the bankrupt the required permission, but pointed out that the bankrupt had no legal right to inspect the minutes.

The bankrupt, not finding what he wanted in the minutes of the 23rd of February, 1899, made further application to the official receiver for leave to search the entire record of minutes, letters, and other papers needed.

The official receiver refused to grant leave, and the inspector-general in bankruptcy declined to interfere with the official receiver's decision.

The bankrupt thereupon served notice of the present motion upon the official receiver.

The bankrupt appeared in person, and stated that he wished to search the minutes in order to obtain material for making certain charges against the trustee who had obtained his release from the Board of Trade some considerable time previous to the application.

Muir Mackenzie and Francke, for the official receiver.—The bankrupt has no right to inspect the minutes of the committee of inspection. The trustee is required by section 80 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to keep proper books containing a record of the proceedings of the committee of inspection, and that section goes on to say, "Any creditor of the bankrupt may, subject to the control of the court, personally or by his agent inspect such books." Thus no right is given to the bankrupt by statute to inspect these records, and it would be entirely contrary to the practice, and would establish an extremely dangerous precedent, to allow him to do so. A bankrupt with free right of access to the minutes of his committee would be able to discover their intentions as to proceedings against himself or his friends and to take steps to frustrate them.

BIGHAM, J.—I think this application must be refused. It is apparently against the practice of the court to permit inspection of this kind, and the affidavit of the bankrupt does not satisfy me that there are any exceptional circumstances which ought to induce me to depart from the ordinary practice. I rather gather that the object of the application is to enable the bankrupt to formulate some sort of charge against the trustee, and I do not think that I ought to depart from the practice of the court to enable the bankrupt to take that course.

Application refused.

COLLS v. HOME AND COLONIAL STORES. (a.)

Easement — Light — Prescription — Extent of right — Right for ordinary purposes.

The owner or occupier of a dominant tenement is entitled to the uninterrupted access through his ancient windows of a quantity of light, the measure of which is what is required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind, and in these cases the question to be considered is whether the obstruction complained of amounts to an actionable nuisance. The actual user will neither increase or diminish the right.

Warren v. Brown, 50 W. R. 97, [1902] 1 K. B. 15, overruled.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), 50 W. R. 227, [1902] 1 Ch. 302, which reversed a decision of Joyce J.

The action was brought to restrain the defendant (the present appellant) from erecting on the site of 41, Worship-street any building so as to darken, injure, or obstruct any of the ancient lights of the respondents.

The facts are given very fully in the report in the court below and shortly in the judgment of Lord Davey.

The Court of Appeal held that there was a substantial interference with the respondents' ancient lights so far as related to two windows on the ground floor of their buildings, and granted a mandatory injunction requiring the appellant to pull down anything erected in breach of the terms of injunction.

The question turned on the amount of light which "ancient lights" gives to the dominant tenement, and the whole question is discussed at length in their lordships judgments.

Bray, K.C, and Leigh Clare (Nutter with them), for the appellant.

Haldane, K.C., and Hughes, K.C. (W. E. Vernon with them), for the respondents.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, which was tried before Joyce, J., the learned judge gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to prove any actionable wrong. although he found that the erection of the buildings of which the plaintiff complained had appreciably diminished the light which the plaintiff had previously enjoyed. The Court of Appeal, as I understand their judgment, thought this was wrong, and ordered a mandatory injunction to pull the premises down so as to restore all the light that had been previously enjoyed. If this principle should be sanctioned by your lordships, it would be for the first time that, in this House at all events, such a principle had been determined. I do not deny that authorities may be found for it, some of which have been cited at the bar; but I do not think that the exact question which is now in debate has ever been brought before this House until now.

The question may be very simply stated thus: After an enjoyment of light for twenty years, or, if the question arose before the Prescription Act, for such a period as would justify the presumption of a lost grant, would the owner of the tenement in respect of which such enjoyment had been possessed be entitled to all the light without any diminution whatsoever at the end of such a period? If that were the law it would be very far-reaching in its consequences, and the application of it to its strict logical conclusion would render it almost impossible for towns to grow, and would formidably restrict the rights of people to utilize their own land. Strictly applied, it would undoubtedly prevent the erection of many buildings which have hitherto been admitted to be too far removed from others to render any obstruction of light to be actionable; but if the broad proposition which underlies the judgment of the Court of Appeal be true, it is not a question of forty-five degrees, but any appreciable diminution of light which has been enjoyed (that is to say, has existed uninterruptedly) for twenty years constitutes a right of action, and gives a right to the proprietor of a tenement that has had this enjoyment to prevent his neighbour building on his own land. I do not think this is the law. The argument seems to me to rest upon a false analogy, as though the access to and enjoyment of light constituted a sort of proprietary right in the light itself. Light, like air, is the common property of all, or, to speak more accurately, it is the common right of all to enjoy it, but it is the exclusive property of none. If the same proposition against which I am protesting could be maintained in respect of air, the progressive building of any town would be impossible. The access of air is undoubtedly interfered with by the buildings which are being built every day round London. The difference between the town and country is very appreciable to the dweller in cities when he goes to the open country or to the top of a mountain or even a small hill in the country; but would the possessor for twenty years of a house on the edge of a town be at liberty to restrain his neighbour from building near him because he had enjoyed the free access of air without buildings near him for twenty years? No doubt this is an extreme case, but it is one of the extreme cases which tries the principle.

The truth is that, though there were objections to ask a jury whether the enjoyment talis qualis was such that they might presume a lost grant when nobody supposed that such a grant was ever really made, yet it gave the opportunity of considering what was the extent of the supposed grant; and if anything so extreme as I have just supposed were claimed, no jurymen in their senses would have affirmed such a grant. The statute upon which reliance is placed in this case illustrates the danger of attempting to put a principle of law into the iron framework of a statute. The statute literally construed by the use of the words "the light" would mean all the light which for twenty years has existed in the surroundings of the tenement which has enjoyed it; yet, singularly enough, there has been a complete uniformity of decision upon the construction of the statute that it has made no difference in the right conferred, but is only concerned with the mode of proof; but though I quite concur with this construction, which is supported by an overwhelming body of authority, yet I cannot but think the language of the statute has led to some of the decisions which your lordships are now called upon to review. Certainly, in the older decisions which have been brought to your lordships' notice in counsel for the appellant's very able argument, the proposition which, as I have said, underlies the judgment now under appeal finds no place.

Lord Hardwicke, long ago, in 1752—Fishmongers Company v. East India Company, 1 Dick. 163—dealing with this very question, the alleged obstruction to light, laid down what I believe to be law to-day. "It is not sufficient," he said, "to say that it will alter the plaintiff's light, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city, and here there will be 17ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance." Lord Cranworth, in Clarke v. Clark, 14 W. R. 115, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 16, adopted the same test, and his observation, though a subsequent decision of his seemed to throw doubt upon it, has received the assent of some of the most learned judges who ever sat upon the English bench. I think that the whole subject has been confused by certain decisions which are dependent on the facts proved, and were incautiously reported as laying down principles of law, when they were, in my view, only intended to be findings of fact in that particular case. At all events, I am prepared to hold that the test given by Lord Hardwicke is the true one, and I do not think a better example could be found than the present case to show to what extravagant results the other theory leads.

The owner of a tenement on one side of a street forty feet wide seeks to restrain his opposite neighbour from erecting a room which, when erected, will not then be of the same height as the house belonging to the complaining neighbour; and the only plausible ground on which the complaint rests is that on the ground floor he has a room not built in the ordinary way of rooms in an ordinary dwelling-house, but built so that one long room goes through the whole width of the house to a back wall, which has, however, no window at the back or sides, and which was therefore, at the back of it, too dark for some purposes without the use of artificial light even before the building on the other side of the street was erected. I think that no tribunal ought to find as a fact that the building is a nuisance; and, altogether apart from the inappropriateness of the remedy by injunction, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has no cause of action against the defendants. The test of the right is, I think, whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance, and, as it appears to me, the value of the test makes the amount of right acquired depend upon the surroundings and circumstances of light coming from other sources, as well as the question of the proximity of the premises complained of. What may be called the uncertainty of the test may also be described as its elasticity. A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise as if he lived in the country and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell, and noise may give a cause of action, but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and whether in each case it amounts to a nuisance which will give a right of action.

I have not thought it necessary to enter into a discussion of the authorities, because I think it has been most carefully and accurately done by Wright, J., in Warren v. Brown, 49 W. R. 206, [1900] 2 Q. B. 722. Of course it must be taken that the foundation of this judgment rests upon the finding of fact of Joyce, J., that the buildings of the defendant had not so materially interfered with the light previously enjoyed by the plaintiff as to amount to a nuisance. It follows that, in my judgment, the case of Warren v. Brown was rightly decided by Wright, J., and ought to have been affirmed by the Court of Appeal. It was, however, reversed, in accordance with the same views which guided that court in the case now under review.

For the reasons I have given, I have to move that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, and the judgment of Joyce, J., restored, and that the respondents pay to the appellant the costs both here and below.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—The right of a person who is owner or occupier of a building with windows in it, privileged as ancient lights, in regard to the protection of the light coming to those windows is a purely legal right. It is an easement belonging to the class known as negative easements. It is nothing more or less than the right to prevent the owner or occupier of an adjoining tenement from building or placing on his land anything which has the effect of illegally obstructing or obscuring the light of the dominant tenement. This right in early times was vindicated by an action on the case for nuisance, in which damages might be recovered and judgment had for removal or abatement of the nuisance: Baten's case, 9 Co. Rep. 53 b. In Aldred's case, 9 R 57 (b) Lord Coke says that an action lies for nuisance done to light as one of the three essential requisites of habitation. "An action lies," he says, "for hindrance of the light, for the ancient form of the action was significant, sc. quod messuagium horrida tenebritate obscuratum fuit." It was not every diminution of light that would support such an action. The form of the action itself shows that. In later times when an action for the protection of ancient lights came to be regarded rather as an action for disturbance of an easement than an action grounded on nuisance—as an action to prevent the infringement of a right rather than an action to redress a wrong—the necessity of showing the gravity of the injury complained of was not so obviously apparent. Still the principle was the same, and it must always be the same. "It is not sufficient," as Lord Hardwicke observed in Fishmonger's Company v. East India Company "to say it will alter the plaintiff's lights . . . the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance."

Probably the most satisfactory statement of the rule to be applied in all cases of ancient lights is to be found in Back v. Stacey, 2 C. & P. 465, and Parker v. Smith, 5 Car. & P. 438. Back v. Stacey was an issue directed by the Lord Chancellor to try two questions—first, whether the ancient lights of the plaintiff in his dwelling-house in Norwich had been "illegally" obstructed by a building of the defendant; and secondly, if so, what damage the plaintiff had sustained in respect of the injury. So that if the jury had found that the obstruction complained of was an illegal obstruction the damages would have gone to the whole of the injury and not merely to the loss sustained up to the date of the writ. It was contended there that, as it was evident that the quantity of light previously enjoyed had been diminished, the plaintiff was at any rate entitled to a verdict on the first issue, any obstruction of ancient lights being illegal. But according to the report, "Best, C.J., told the jury, who had viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient lights had undergone. It was not sufficient, to constitute an illegal obstruction, that the plaintiff had, in fact, less light than before; nor that his warehouse, the part of his house principally affected, could not be used for all the purposes to which it might otherwise have been applied. In order to give a right of action, and sustain the issue, there must be a substantial privation of light, sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) on the premises, as beneficially as he had formerly done. His lordship added that it might be difficult to draw the line, but the jury must distinguish between a partial inconvenience and a real injury to the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the premises." Back v Stacey was determined in 1826. Parker v. Smith was heard during the sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1832. It is, I think, the earliest reported case dealing with the question of light after the passing of the Prescription Act, which came into operation on the first day of Michaelmas Term, 1832. It was tried before Tindal, C.J. The marginal note states accurately, I think, the effect of the decision in these words: "That diminution of light and air which the law recognizes as the ground of an action against a party who builds near another's premises, is such as really makes them to a sensible degree less fit for the purposes of business or occupation." It does not seem to have been suggested either by the counsel or the judge that the Prescription Act had made the slightest alteration in the nature of the right to light or the principle on which the question of an alleged infringement of that right ought to be determined.

To these two cases I would only add the case of Wells v. Oddy, 7 Car. & P. 410, before Parke, B., in 1836. In his charge to the jury the learned judge said that he entirely adopted the law as laid down by Tindal, C.J., in Parker v. Smith. And then, after reading a passage from Parker v. Smith, he concluded his address to the jury by saying: "The question, therefore, which I shall leave to you is, whether the effect of the defendant's building is to diminish the light and air so as sensibly to affect the occupation of the plaintiff's premises, and make them less fit for occupation." So much for the right at law.

Courts of equity had no original jurisdiction in the matter. Their province was simply to grant an injunction in aid of the legal right where there was danger of irreparable mischief or where an injunction was required to prevent multiplicity of actions. Under Lord Cairns's Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. 27) the court was empowered, in all cases in which it had jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction. The Act commonly known as Sir John Rolt's Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 42) provided that in all cases in which any relief or remedy within the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was sought, whether the title to such relief or remedy was or was not incident to or dependent upon a legal right, every question of law or fact cognizable in a court of common law on the determination of which the title to such relief or remedy depended should be determined by or before the same court. These Acts are superseded by the Judicature Acts, and now the High Court has all the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and of the several courts of law. But still, so far as the right in question is a legal right, the court in the exercise of its jurisdiction must be guided by the principles established at law. And those principles, in my opinion, are still to be found most clearly and most concisely exhibited in the cases before Best, C.J., and Tindal, C.J., to which I have already referred.

Although the question thus stated appears tolerably simple, it cannot be disputed that the reported cases of questions of light in recent times are not altogether consistent. There seem to be two divergent views, neither of which, I think, is absolutely accurate. The extreme view on one side is that the right which is acquired by so-called statutory prescription is a right to a continuance of the whole or substantially the whole quantity of light which has come to the windows during a period of twenty years. This view is conspicuous in Calcraft v. Thompson, 15 W. R. 387, before Lord Chelmsford, L.C., and in Scott v. Pape, 34 W. R. 465, 31 Ch. D. 554, where Cotton, L.J., speaks of a "cone of light," and Bowen, L.J., of "a specific quantity of light" as the measure of the plaintiff's right. The extreme view on the other side is that the right is limited to a sufficient quantity of light for ordinary purposes.

I think this divergence of view comes from a difference of opinion, consciously or unconsciously entertained, as to the meaning and effect of the provisions of the Prescription Act, 1832; and, if I am not mistaken, it may be traced to certain expressions, not perhaps sufficiently guarded, which are to be found in judgments delivered in this House in the case of Tapling v. Jones, 13 W. R. 617, 11 H. L. C. 290. In that case Lord Westbury, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Chelmsford all assume that a period of twenty years' enjoyment of the access and use of light to a building creates an absolute and indefeasible right immediately on the expiration of the period of twenty years. No doubt section 3 says so in terms, but section 4 must be read in connection with section 3; and if the two sections are read together it will be seen that the period is not a period in gross, but a period next before some suit or action wherein the claim or matter to which such period may relate shall have been or shall be brought into question. Unless and until the claim or matter is thus brought into question, no absolute or indefeasible right can arise under the Act. There is what has been described as an inchoate right. The owner of the dominant tenement of twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment is in a position to avail himself of the Act if his claim is brought into question. But in the meantime, however long the enjoyment may have been, his right is just the same, and the origin of his right is just the same as if the Act had never been passed. No title is as yet acquired under the Act. This point seems to have been much discussed shortly after the Act was passed. It was finally settled in a series of cases at common law, beginning, I think, with Wright v. Williams, 1 M. & W. 77, and including Richards v. Fry, 7 Ad. & E. 698, and Cooper v. Hubbuck, 12 C. B. N. S. 456, in which there is an interesting consroversy between Willes, J., and Williams, J., on the question whether the twenty years' uninterrupted enjoyment under the third section is the period of twenty years before any suit or action, or twenty years before each suit or action in which the point may from time to time arise. The former construction, in which Erle, C.J. and Byles, J., concurred with Willes, J., eventually prevailed.

The question is of little or no practical importance. But the construction established by the series of decisions to which I have referred, in accordance with the express language of the statute, goes, I think, a long way to show that the view taken by James, L.J., Mellish, L.J., and Lord Selborne as to the effect of the Act is absolutely correct, and that the qualification suggested by Bowen, L.J., in Scott v. Pape is not well founded. It certainly would be strange if the court had been compelled to hold that the Prescription Act confers upon a person whose right is questionable, at least to this extent that it has been actually brought into question, a higher and a larger right than that possessed by a person whose prescriptive claim to the enjoyment of light is so clear as to be beyond all question. I have, therefore, no doubt that the Prescription Act has not in the slightest degree altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of the right of access of light or the principle on which it is to be determined in any particular case whether the right has been infringed. Now, if this be so, it seems to me, in accordance with the opinion expressed by James and Brett, L.JJ., in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino, 28 W.R. 544, 14 Ch. D. 213, and by many other judges, that the direction given by Best, C.J., in Back v. Stacey is the direction which a court exercising the functions of both judge and jury ought to keep steadily in view.

Having come to this conclusion, I do not propose to trouble the House with any comments upon the mass of cases by which in comparatively modern times the question has been elucidated or obscured. It is enough, I think, to refer to what was said in Kelk v. Pearson, 19 W. R. 665, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 809, City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, 22 W. R. 172, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 212, and Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino. Speaking for myself, I doubt very much whether it is a profitable task to re-try actions which depend simply on questions of fact or to review and endeavour to reconcile or distinguish a number cases that naturally enough contain some statements which, taken by themselves and apart from the context, may seem to be contradictory, but which must all proceed upon the same principle. It would only be another link in the embarrassing chain of authority, or, if I may venture to say so, only another handful of dust to be cast into one scale or the other when the claims of opposing litigants come to be weighed in the balance. I think there is much good sense in the observations of Brett, L.J., in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino. "To my mind," said his lordship, "the taking some expression of a judge used in deciding a question of fact as to his own view of some one fact being material on a particular occasion, as laying down a rule of conduct for other judges in considering a similar state of fact in another case, is a false mode of treating authority. It appears to me that the view of a learned judge in a particular case as to the value of a particular piece of evidence is of no use to other judges who have to determine a similar question of fact in other cases where there may be many different circumstances to be taken into consideration."

If I may trespass for a few minutes longer, I would rather spend the time in making one or two practical suggestions. I do not put them forward as carrying any authority. But they may possibly be of use to those who have to try such questions as this, if and so far as they appear to be consistent with good sense.

It will be observed that in Back v. Stacey the learned judge told the jury, who had viewed the premises, that they were to judge rather from their own ocular observation than from the testimony of any witnesses, however respectable, of the degree of diminution which the plaintiff's ancient light had undergone. Now, a judge who exercises the functions of both judge and jury cannot be expected to view the premises himself, even if he considers himself an expert in such matters. But I have often wondered why the court does not more frequently avail itself of the power of calling in a competent adviser to report to the court upon the question. There are plenty of experienced surveyors accustomed to deal with large properties in London who might be trusted to make a perfectly fair and impartial report, subject, of course, to examination in court if required. I am not in the least surprised that the plaintiffs in the present case objected to a report from a disinterested surveyor; but, in my opinion, the court ought to have obtained such a report for its own guidance.

Then, with regard to giving damages in addition to or substitution for an injunction—that, no doubt, is a delicate matter. It is a matter for the discretion of the court, and the discretion is a judicial discretion. It has been said that an injunction ought to be granted when substantial damages would be given at law. I have some difficulty in following out this rule. I observe that in some cases juries have been directed to give one shilling damages as a notice to the defendant to remove the obstruction complained of. And then, if the obstruction was not removed, in a subsequent action the damages were largely increased. In others a substantial sum has been awarded, to be reduced to nominal damages on removal of the obstruction. But the recovery of damages, whatever the amount may be, indicates a violation of right, and in former times, unless there were something special in the case, would have entitled the plaintiff, as of course, to an injunction in equity. I rather doubt whether the amount of the damages which may be supposed to be recoverable at law affords a satisfactory test. In some cases, of course, an injunction is necessary—if, for instance, the injury cannot fairly be compensated by money; if the defendant has acted in a high-handed manner; if he has endeavoured to steal a march upon the plaintiff or to evade the jurisdiction of the court. In all these cases an injunction is necessary, in order to do justice to the plaintiff and as a warning to others. But if there is really a question as to whether the obstruction is legal or not, and if the defendant has acted fairly and not in an unneighbourly spirit, I am disposed to think the court ought to incline to damages rather than to an injunction. It is quite true that a man ought not to be compelled to part with his property against his will, or to have the value of his property diminished, without an Act of Parliament. On the other hand, the court ought to be very careful not to allow an action for the protection of ancient lights to be used as a means of extorting money. Often a person who is engaged in a large building scheme has to pay money right and left in order to avoid litigation, which will put him to even greater expense by delaying his proceedings. As far as my own experience goes, there is quite as much oppression on the part of those who invoke the assistance of the court to protect some ancient lights which they have never before considered of any great value, as there is on the part of those who are improving the neighbourhood by the erection of buildings that must necessarily to some extent interfere with the light of adjoining premises.

The common form of injunction which has been in use since the case of Yates v. Jack, 14 W. R. 618, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 295, is not, I think, altogether free from objection. I think it would be better that the order, when expressed in general terms, should restrain the defendant from erecting any building so as to cause a nuisance or illegal obstruction to the plaintiff's ancient windows, as the same existed previously to the taking down of the house which formerly stood on the site of the defendant's new buildings. If the action is brought to a hearing before the defendant's new buildings are completed, and there seems to be good ground for the plaintiff's apprehensions, an order, I think, might be conveniently made in that form, with costs up to the hearing, and liberty to the plaintiff within a fixed time after completion to apply for further relief by way of mandatory injunction or damages as he might be advised.

With the present case I may deal very briefly. It cannot be disputed that some diminution of light is caused by the defendant's buildings, but such as it is I think it is exactly what Best, L.C.J., described as partial inconvenience rather than serious injury. I am satisfied that if the case had been tried at law before the question was so much embarrassed by the multiplicity of decisions no jury would have given any damages.

Perhaps I ought to add a word about Warren v. Brown, which is referred to in both the judgments below. I cannot say that that case is quite satisfactory to my mind either as dealt with in the court of first instance or in the Court of Appeal. In the court of first instance the learned judge who tried the case found a special verdict which is not very easy to understand. The room in which the light had been materially diminished "in its present state is," he says, "better lighted than the ground-floor front rooms in many of the principal streets." I do not see what bearing that fact had on the question at issue. Then, instead of keeping in view the direction which judges over and over again have said ought to be kept in view, the learned judge embarks on an inquiry to determine which of two extreme views is correct. I doubt whether either the one or the other can be accepted as a safe guide without qualification. The Court of Appeal, in their turn, instead of dealing with the facts of the case before them, combat a particular view which, rightly or wrongly, they attribute to Wright, J. I do not think Warren v. Brown helps one much.

I think the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of opinion that the finding of the learned judge who tried this action as to the facts of this case is borne out by the evidence and I accept his finding as the basis of my judgment. After describing the dimensions of the room on the ground floor of the plaintiff's premises which is used as an office, Joyce, J., says: "It is, I think, the result of the evidence that it has ordinarily, if not always, been the practice to make use of the electric light in the back part of the room, and a most extraordinary amount of light from the windows in Worship-street would be required to enable the use of the electric light in the back part of the room to be dispensed with, even on ordinary days. Practically, I think it may be taken that the use of electric or some other artificial light is now and always must be necessary in order to light the back part of the room, even in the daytime. There is no evidence to show that such an extraordinary amount of light has been enjoyed or acquired for anything like the period of twenty years." And the learned judge sums up his finding in these words: "Apart from any question with respect to the back part of the plaintiff's premises and to the extraordinary light required if it be possible to be obtained so far back in the absence of illumination by electric light, the plaintiff's premises would still, in my opinion, after the erection of the defendant's building be well and sufficiently lighted for all ordinary purposes of occupancy as a place of business. For all ordinary days they have amply sufficient light—at present they have abundance of light, and are in my opinion unusually well lighted. If, as it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs, they are entitled to the full amount of light now enjoyed without appreciable diminution, the plaintiffs would have a good cause of action upon the erection of the defendant's building, though it might perhaps be doubted whether the diminution that would be caused by the defendant's building if and when erected is sufficiently serious to entitle the plaintiffs to an injunction." On these findings the learned judge, following the judgment of Wright, J., in Warren v. Brown, which had not then been reversed by the Court of Appeal, held that the action failed and must be dismissed. The Court of Appeal reversed this judgment. The legal grounds of their judgment are contained in a single sentence. "If ancient lights," says Cozens-Hardy, L.J., "are interfered with substantially, and real damage thereby ensues to tenant or owner, then that tenant or owner is entitled to relief." By the expression "interfered with substantially" I understand the Lord Justice to mean

"if the amount of light having access to the premises by means of the ancient lights is substantially diminished." This proposition appears to me to assume or imply that the owner of the dominant tenement is entitled to have the full amount of light which has gained access to the tenement by the ancient windows during the previous twenty years maintained without substantial diminution. The "real damage" may be occasioned by an alteration in the internal structure of the dominant tenement which has been made within the period of twenty years, or its adaptation within that period to some special use for which an extraordinary amount of light is required, but nevertheless, if the proposition be sound, the owner or occupier of the tenement is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the light required for his altered premises or for the special use to which he has put them. In perfect consistency with this view of the law, Vaughan Williams, L.J., expressed a doubt whether the rule of forty-five degrees can any longer be applied even as a rough measure.

The question for this House to determine is whether this view of the law is correct, or, in other words, what is the true nature and extent in English law of the easement of light. It must be regretfully admitted that the numerous decisions on this subject in the courts are not easily reconcilable and are not infrequently contradictory. No judgment of this House has been referred to, except that in the case of Tapling v. Jones, the decision in which does not directly affect the point now before your lordships. I do not propose to travel through the long catena of authorities. They were copiously referred to at the bar, and the principal cases are stated and carefully analyzed in the judgment of Wright, J., in Warren v. Brown.

It will be found that in the earlier authorities the obscuration of light to a tenement having ancient lights is dealt with on the footing of a nuisance. In Aldred's case the "hindrance of light" in the same category as the nuisance of fouling the air by pigsties. In Fishmongers Company v. East India Company, 1 Dick. 164, Lord Hardwicke said: "As to the question whether the plaintiffs' messuage is an ancient building, so as to entitle them to the right of the lights, and whether the plaintiffs' lights will be darkened, I will not determine it here, for if it clearly appeared that what the defendants are doing is what the law considers as a nuisance, I would put it in a way to be tried. . . . But I am of opinion that it is not a nuisance contrary to law; for it is not sufficient to say it will alter the plaintiffs' lights, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city; and here there will be 17ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance. It is true the value of the plaintiffs' house may be reduced by rendering the prospect less pleasant, but that is no reason to hinder a man from building on his own ground." Consistent with this view is the direction of Best, L.C.J., to the jury in the oft-quoted case of Back v. Stacey. The learned judge said: "It was not sufficient to constitute a legal obstruction, that the plaintiff had, in fact, less light than before; nor that his warehouse, the part of his house principally affected, could not be used for all the purposes to which it might otherwise be applied. In order to give a right of action, there must be a substantial privation of light, sufficient to render the occupation uncomfortable, and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) on the premises, as beneficially as he had formerly done." In Clarke v. Clark Lord Cranworth stated the question thus: "Whether the obstruction complained of is such as to deprive the complaining party of such a supply of light and air as he might reasonably calculate on enjoying." After saying that the plaintiffs' rooms were rendered less cheerful, he adds: "But I cannot think that this is such an obstruction of light as to amount to a nuisance. . . . What the plaintiff was bound to show was that the buildings of the defendant caused such an obstruction of light as to interfere with the ordinary occupations of life." In Robson v. Whittingham, decided in the following year, Knight-Bruce and Turner, L.JJ., expressed themselves as entirely satisfied with Lord Cranworth's judgment, and Turner, L.J., accentuated his approval by saying that he thought this class of cases had been carried too far before the decision in Clarke v. Clark was pronounced. Nothing that I can say will add to the respect and authority with which the opinions of those two learned and experienced judges must command with your lordships.

It has been thought that the third section of the Prescription Act, 1832, altered substantially the previously existing law as to ancient lights, and had the effect of conferring on the owner of the dominant tenement, by twenty years' enjoyment, an absolute and indefeasible right to the full amount of the light enjoyed during that period. And it must be admitted that the language of the section lends some plausibility to that opinion. It is, however, not consistent with the language of Lord Cranworth in Clarke v. Clark, and the point was expressly determined by James and Mellish, L.JJ., in Kelk v. Pearson, decided by them in the year 1871. James, L.J., there says: "I am opinion that the statute has in no degree whatever altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of this right. The nature and extent of the right before that statute was to have that amount of light through the windows of a house which was sufficient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of that house as a dwelling-house, if it were a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house, if it were a warehouse, shop, or other place of business. That was the extent of the easement—a right to prevent your neighbour from building upon his land so as to obstruct the access of sufficient light and air, to such an extent as to render the house substantially less comfortable and convenient." The statute, in fact, has only altered the conditions or length of user by which the right may be acquired, but not the nature of the right. In the case of City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, Lord Selborne expressed his complete adherence to the view of the law taken in the case of Kelk v. Pearson, correcting some impressions which might have arisen from the language used in some former cases by some learned judges. This doctrine, however, has not been unchallenged. In an Irish case of Mackey v. Scottish Widows Society, Ir. R. 11 Eq. 541, decided in 1877, Christian, L.J., criticized in vigorous language the judgments of James, L.J., and Lord Selborne, and held that the right is to an average maximum of the light which nature has been shedding upon the window for twenty years before the defendant interrupted it. It is also difficult to reconcile the language used by Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ., in the case of Scott v. Pape, or the language of the Queen's Bench judges in Moore v. Hall, 26 W. R. 401, 3 Q. B. D. 178, with the decisions in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, though the authority of those cases was not in terms questioned by them.

I regard the decisions in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant as complimentary to, and on the same lines with, Lord Cranworth's judgment in Clarke v. Clark. And so regarding it, I entirely approve of it. Romer, L.J., however, in delivering the judgment of the court in Warren v. Brown, seems to have taken a different view of the effect of Kelk v. Pearson. He says: "Since the case of Kelk v. Pearson it is impossible to hold properly that the statutory right is not interfered with merely because after the interference the house comes up to a supposed standard as to what a house ordinarily requires by way of light for purposes of inhabitancy or business"; and he quotes some words used by Mellish, L.J. I must remark that the particular point which was under discussion in Warren v. Brown, and in another form in the present case, was not before the court in Kelk v. Pearson. There was no question there of a claim for protection in the use of an extraordinary amount of light required for some special purpose, or required by some unusual peculiarity in the internal structure of the building. And I regard what was said by Mellish, L.J., as directed to the arguments addressed to the court in that case. According to any standard short of holding that the right is to all the light which has come through the window, the right to light has a ragged edge to it, and it is impossible to assert that any man has a right to a fixed amount of light ascertainable by metes and bounds. I do not think that Mellish, L.J., intended to differ from James, L.J., and in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, when James, L.J., repeated the substance of what he had said in the earlier case, Mellish, L.J., according to the report, contented himself with a simple concurrence.

I must advert for a few moments to an impression which has been entertained by some distinguished judges, and was the subject of argument at the bar, to the effect that within the space of a few months Lord Cranworth overruled himself. The judgment in Clarke v. Clark was delivered on the 25th of November, 1865, and that in Yates v. Jack was delivered on the 24th of March, 1866. It was thought by Lord Chelmsford in Calcraft v. Thompson that the effect of the later case was to hold the dominant tenement entitled to the whole light that had previously been enjoyed, and Wood, V.C., in Dent v. Auction Mart Co. to a certain extent shared the same impression. There is not a hint in the judgment in Yates v. Jack which indicates that Lord Cranworth thought that he was departing from the law as laid down in his earlier judgment. Both cases were decided and probably reported before Robson v. Whittingham, 14 W. R. 291, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 442, but the Lord Justices, as we have seen, adopted Clarke v. Clark as an authority which had their approval. And if the question at issue in Yates v. Jack be looked at, it will be seen that the argument to which Lord Cranworth's judgment was directed was that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to have the ordinary quantity of light because the business which he was carrying on required a diminished quantity only. That was the argument to which Lord Cranworth could not accede. So understood, and reading it by the light of Clarke v. Clark, I do not dissent from the language used by Lord Cranworth in Yates v. Jack: "The right conferred by the statute 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71 is an absolute indefeasible right to the enjoyment of the light without reference to the purposes for which it has been used."

We were told, and my experience at the bar confirms it, that the order made in Yates v. Jack has been adopted as a common form of order in cases of this description. I think this is unfortunate. It was a very proper order to make in that case, and in nineteen cases out of twenty, or perhaps ninety-nine out of one hundred, where no question arises such as that in the present case, it would be sufficient and appropriate. But it is an erroneous proceeding to deduce an absolute rule of law from the form of order made in a particular case.

In Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie, 15 W. R. 614, L. R. 4 Eq. 421, Malins, V.C., held that a person could not, by using the dominant tenement for a period less than twenty years for a special purpose requiring an extraordinary amount of light in excess of what was required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business, entitle himself to protection for such extraordinary requirements, and thereby impose an additional restriction on his neighbour's use of his own land. In that case, as in the present one, it was not proved that the extraordinary amount of light had been used for twenty years. "No man," said the Vice-Chancellor, quoting the words of another judge, "could, by any act of his, suddenly impose a new restriction upon his neighbour." In their judgment in Warren v. Brown, 50 W. R. 97, [1902] 1 K. B. 15, the Court of Appeal dissented from this decision, and their opinion was a logical conclusion from the views which they expressed as to the nature and extent of the easement. I do not concur with the opinion of the Court of Appeal, for I think that the case of Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie was rightly decided. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that it would be contrary to the principles of the law relating to easements that the burden on the servient tenement should be increased or varied from time to time at the will of the owner of the dominant tenement. The easement is for access of light to the building, and if the building retains its substantial identity, or if the ancient lights retain their substantial identity, it does not seem to me to depend on the use which is made of the chambers in it, or to be varied by any alteration which may be made in the internal structure of it. I do not propose to discuss at length the question how far a variation in a tenement will destroy an easement appurtenant to it. The law on that subject is as old as Luttrell's case, 4 Co. 86*a*.

In the case of Martin v. Goble, 1 Camp. 320, a malthouse had been converted into a workhouse, and it was held that the house was entitled to the degree of light necessary for a malthouse, not for a dwelling-house. That case has been the subject of much criticism, and I think that some judges have thought that the language of the Lord Chief Baron had a wider scope than it was intended to have. Following the suggestion of Wood, V.C., it may be supported on the ground that (to use the language of Luttrell's case) the alteration affected the substance and not only the quality of the tenement. But while agreeing that a person does not lose his easement by any change in the internal structure of his building or the use to which it is put, and that regard may be had not only to the present use, but also to any ordinary uses to which the tenement is adapted, I think it is quite another question whether he is entitled to be protected at the expense of his neighbour in the enjoyment of the light for some special or extraordinary purpose. It is agreed on all hands that a man does not lose or restrict his right to light by non-user of his ancient lights or by not using the full measure of light which the law permits. If that measure be by common law or by the statute the whole amount of light which has had access to his windows, cadit quæstio. But if this view of the law be not accepted, you must introduce that "supposed standard" which Romer, L.J., repudiates. If the actual user is not the test where the use falls below the standard of what may reasonably be required for the ordinary uses of inhabitancy and business, why (it may be asked) should it be made a test where the use has been of a special or extraordinary character in excess of that standard? It does seem to me unreasonable to hold that where a man for his own convenience or profit converts two or more rooms of his house into one without making provision for lighting them, or converts a portion of his house into a photographic studio, or puts it to some similar purpose, he can suddenly call upon his neighbour to leave him a supply of light which is rendered necessary only by such alterations, and thereby impose what is in substance and in truth an increased burden on his neighbour. If the action be brought a month before the change it would be dismissed. If it be brought a month afterwards an injunction would be granted. I am of opinion that the courts have gone too far in this question of lights, and have imposed undue restrictions on persons in the exercise of their lawful right to build on their own land.

In the second argument before your lordships the leading counsel for the respondents contended that his clients had for more than twenty years enjoyed the access of light over the appellant's land to their ground floor office in its present condition. I believe that all your lordships are agreed with Joyce, J., that there is no proof to support such a contention. The fact relied on was not put in issue at the trial, and the evidence was not directed to it. If the plaintiffs had intended to claim and rely on a special easement of that description, it was for them to state their claim and prove the facts to support it. It is unnecessary to say, therefore, whether such a claim would be good in law. Malins, V.C., thought it could be sustained if the special user was had with the knowledge of the owner of the servient tenement. I will only say that I see some difficulties in the way, and reserve my opinion.

I must apologise for the length at which I have trespassed on the attention of the House. According to both principle and authority, I am of opinion that the owner or occupier of the dominant tenement is entitled to the uninterrupted access through his ancient windows of a quantity of light, the measure of which is what is required for the ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business of the tenement according to the ordinary notions of mankind, and that the question for what purpose he has thought fit to use that light, or the mode in which he finds it convenient to arrange the internal structure of his tenement, does not affect the question. The actual user will neither increase nor diminish the right. The single question in these cases is still what it was in the days of Lord Hardwicke and Lord Eldon—whether the obstruction complained of is a nuisance. I do not myself think that this rule is difficult of application in practice. In the majority of cases no such questions as those which have been raised in Warren v. Brown and the present case occur. The experience of surveyors who are practically conversant with this matter are entitled to great respect. As Mr. Vigers states in his evidence, they have adopted a working rule for the purpose of advising those who consult them and settling differences by negotiation. The rule of forty-five degrees is not, of course, a rule of law, and is not applicable to every case. But I agree with Lord Selborne (City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, 22 W. R. 172, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 212) that it may properly be used as primâ facie evidence.

For these reasons I think that the appeal should be allowed, and the decree of Joyce, J., restored, with costs here and below.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I agree with the judgment of Lord Davey.

Lord LINDLEY.—Joyce, J., who was asked to grant an injunction before the defendant's buildings had been erected, considered that, although the buildings would sensibly diminish the plaintiffs' light, the diminution would not materially affect their comfort or convenience, and would not be sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to any relief, and he dismissed their action. The Court of Appeal, however, took a different view, and granted a mandatory injunction ordering the defendant to pull down part of his building which had been completed after the injunction had been refused. Hence this appeal.

The language of section 3 of the Prescription Act, 1832, shows that in order to acquire a right to light there must be: First, access and use of light, not access alone. Access here is understood to refer to free passage of light over the servient tenement: see per Fry, L.J., in Scott v. Pape, and per Kay, J., in Cooper v. Straker, 40 Ch. D. 21. Secondly, such access and use must be to and for some dwelling-house, workshop, or other building: as to which see Harris v. De Pinna, 31 Ch. D. 238. Thirdly, such access and use must be actually enjoyed therewith. Fourthly, such enjoyment must be without interruption for twenty years. Fifthly, if all these are proved, the right to the access and use of light so enjoyed becomes absolute and indefeasible, unless it can be explained by some deed or writing.

Pausing here for a moment, it will be observed that the statute does not in terms confer a right to light, but rather assumes its acquisition by use and enjoyment, and declares it to be "absolute and indefeasible." Again, it will be observed that nothing is said about enjoyment as of right; and notwithstanding section 5 of the Act, which refers to enjoyment as of right, it was early decided that as regards light claimed under section 3 enjoyment as of right need not be alleged or proved; and that the right, whatever it may be, is acquired by twenty years' use and enjoyment without interruption and without written consent: see Truscott v. Merchant Taylors Company, 11 Ex. 855, and Frewen v. Phillips, 11 C. B. N. S. 449; Simper v. Foley, 2 J. & H. 555, and Harbidge v. Warwick, 3 Ex. 552. This was not so under the old law.

As regards use and enjoyment there are some instructive decisions on unfinished and uninhabited houses, and on windows kept closed by shutters. These decisions show that a right to light may be acquired in respect of a house which has stood for twenty years without being occupied or even finished so as to be fit for occupation; and that the fact that shutters have been closed for some months at a time does not prevent the acquisition of a right to light through the windows: see Courtauld v. Legh, 17 W. R. 466, L. R. 4 Ex. 126; Cooper v. Straker; Collis v. Laugher, 43 W. R. 202, [1894] 3 Ch. 659; and Smith v. Baxter, 48 W. R. 458, [1900] 2 Ch. 138. These decisions did not, however, turn upon or settle with any precision the amount of light to which a right is acquired by twenty years' user. Nor is the statute clear upon this point. At one time it appears to have been considered that in all cases the size and situation of the aperture through which light had come for twenty years formed both the maximum and minimum measure of the right acquired, without reference to the use and enjoyment of the light which had so come. This view was based on some observations made by Lord Westbury in Tapling v. Jones, and on Lord Cranworth's judgment in Yates v. Jack, which I will notice presently. Lord Chelmsford took the same view in Calcraft v. Thompson. But this view was emphatically negatived by the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Kelk v. Pearson, City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, and Leech v. Schweder, 22 W. R. 633, L. R. 9 Ch. 463. In Moore v. Hall, 26

W. R. 401, 3 Q. B. D. 178, however, Mellor and Manisty, JJ., adopted the interpretation thus repudiated, but it does not appear that they were aware of the repudiation. Kelk v. Pearson shows that in ordinary cases a person does not necessarily acquire a right to all the light which he has had for twenty years. He may have had more than he reasonably required either for domestic or business purposes; and in that case his right is limited to the amount of light reasonably required.

There can be no doubt that Lord Cranworth's language in Yates v. Jack and the form of injunction granted have been regarded as authorities for the view that in all cases the statute confers a right to all the light which has come to a window for twenty years; and there are passages in the judgments of Cotton and Bowen, L JJ., in Scott v. Pape which support the same view. This is to be regretted, as it has tended to unsettle the rule laid down in Kelk v. Pearson. The decision in Yates v. Jack did not, however, really go so far as has been supposed, for the plaintiff's windows were darkened to such an extent as to render the house much less convenient for purposes of business than it was before. The case did not turn on the mere fact that some diminution of light was proved. The plaintiff's right to light was clearly infringed, whether the measure of the light to which he was entitled was all that had come through his windows, or only so much as was reasonably necessary for business purposes. If these facts are borne in mind, nothing will be found in the actual decision which conflicts with the views previously expressed by Lord Cranworth in Clarke v. Clark, and adopted by the Court of Appeal in the cases already mentioned.

The common form of injunction in these cases is that adopted in Yates v. Jack and Dent v. Auction Mart Co., 14 W. R. 709, L. R. 2 Eq. 238. It is to restrain the defendant from erecting any building so as to obstruct the free access of light to the ancient windows of the plaintiff as such access was enjoyed previously to the taking down of the house which formerly stood on the site of the defendant's new buildings. This form is framed upon the supposition that the plaintiff has established his right to the amount of light which he in fact enjoyed before the obstruction complained of. But it by no means follows from the form that every one is entitled to an injunction who can prove that he has been deprived of some of the light which he in fact had before it was interfered with. He may have had more than he can acquire a right to use and enjoy in future. I am, however, under the impression that this inference has been drawn, and that the form has been regarded as strengthening the view of the law repudiated in Kelk v. Pearson. So to regard the form is, in my opinion, a mistake. The doctrine laid down in Back v. Stacey, as I understand it, is the same as that laid down, although in somewhat different language, by the Court of Appeal in Kelk v. Pearson and City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, and must, I think, be taken as finally established and as good sound law which this House should adopt, notwithstanding the observations in the Irish case of Mackey v. Scottish Widows Co. That doctrine, as stated in City of London Brewery Co. v. Tennant, is that, generally speaking, an owner of ancient lights is entitled to sufficient light according to the ordinary notions of mankind for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house as a dwelling-house if it is a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house if it is a warehouse, a shop, or other place of business. The expressions "the ordinary notions of mankind," "comfortable use and enjoyment," and "beneficial use and occupation," introduce elements of uncertainty; but similar uncertainty has always existed, and exists still, in all cases of nuisance; and in this country an obstruction of light has commonly been regarded as a nuisance, although the right to light has been regarded as a peculiar kind of easement. If a more absolute standard had been adopted in all cases certainty would, no doubt, have been gained; but the consequences would frequently have been very oppressive to the owner of the servient tenement, and far more so than under the old law. The owner of the servient tenement could have done nothing on his own land which in fact diminished the light acquired by his neighbour, even if all of it was not wanted for comfortable enjoyment or business purposes. It would follow that the owner of a piece of vacant land opposite to a house in an ordinary street could not build upon it at all after twenty years. The adherence to the old but uncertain standard of comfort and convenience avoids the danger of oppression and extortion, and renders it necessary to take a wider view of each case, especially when an injunction is asked for.

The decision in Kelk v. Pearson has a far-reaching effect. If there is no absolute right to all the light which comes to a given window, no action will lie for an obstruction to that light unless the obstruction amounts to a nuisance. If there is no right of action, à fortiori, there is no right to an injunction to prevent a permanent diminution of light unless it amounts to a nuisance. But in considering what is an actionable nuisance regard is had, not to special circumstances which cause something to be an annoyance to a particular person, but to the habits and requirements of ordinary people, and it is by no means to be taken for granted that a person who wants an extraordinary amount of light for a particular business can maintain an action for a diminution of light if only his special requirements are interfered with. [See, as to nuisances to persons carrying on delicate trades or requiring more comfort or freedom from annoyance than ordinary people, Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315; Crump v. Lambert, 15 W. R. 417, L. R. 3. Eq. 409; and Eastern and South African Telegraph Co v. Cape Town Tramways Co., 50 W. R 657, [1902] A. C. 381; and as to the character of the neighbourhood see St. Helens Smelting Co. v. Tipping, 11 H. L. C. 642.]

The expression "right to light" is sanctioned by the Prescription Act, and is convenient; but its use is apt to lead to error and to forgetfulness of the burden thrown on the servient tenement. This burden, however, ought never to be lost sight of in considering the extent of the right claimed in respect of the dominant tenement. But the adoption of the more flexible standard of comfort and convenience has introduced difficulties of a serious nature, especially when dealing with places of business; and it is not surprising that different views on this subject should have been taken, and that the decisions upon it should be inconsistent with each other. That they are inconsistent is apparent from the careful review of them by Wright, J., in Warren v. Brown.

In applying the rule laid down in Kelk v. Pearson it is impossible to avoid considering how much light is left and where it comes from. But the question to be decided is not how much light is left, but whether the plaintiff has been deprived of so much as to constitute an actionable nuisance. If he has, it is no defence to say that he has as much light left as most other people: see Dent v. Auction Mart Co. Too much weight may have been given by Wright, J., to the amount of light left in Warren v. Brown, and this explains the reversal of his decision by the Court of Appeal. There is no rule of law that if a person has forty-five degrees of unobstructed light through a particular window left to him he cannot maintain an action for a nuisance caused by diminishing the light which formerly came through that window: Theed v. Debenham, 24 W. R. 775, 2 Ch. D. 165. But experience shows that it is, generally speaking, a fair working rule to consider that no substantial injury is done to him where an angle of forty-five degrees is left to him, especially if there is good light from other directions as well. Cotton, L.J., pointed this out in Ecclesiastical Commissioners v. Kino; see also Parker v. First Avenue Hotel Co., 21 Ch. D. 282.

As regards light from other quarters, such light cannot be disregarded; for, as pointed out by James, V.C., in Dyers Company v. King, 18 W. R. 404, L. R. 9 Eq. 438, the light from other quarters, and the light the obstruction of which is complained of, may be so much in excess of what is protected by law as as to render the interference complained of non-actionable.

I apprehend, however, that light to which a right has not been acquired by grant or prescription, and of which the plaintiff may be deprived at any time, ought not to be taken into account.

The purpose for which a person may desire to use a particular room or building in future does not either enlarge or diminish the easement which he has acquired. If he chooses in future to use a well-lighted room or building for a lumber room, for which little light is required, he does not lose his right to use the same room or building for some other purpose for which more light is required. Aynsley v. Glover, 23 W. R. 147, L. R. 18 Eq. 544, L. R. 10 App. 283, is in accordance with this view. But if a room or building has been so built as to be badly lighted, the owner or occupier cannot by enlarging the windows or altering the purpose for which he uses it increase the burden on the servient tenement. Martin v. Goble, where a malthouse was turned into a workhouse, may, I think, be upheld on this principle, and the observations of Wood, V.C., on Martin v. Goble in Dent v. Auction Mart Co. support this view. There was in fact no substantial interference with the light to which they were entitled.

Coming now to the present case, I am clearly of opinion that no injunction, and certainly no mandatory injunction, ought to have been granted. Joyce, J., was asked for an injunction and he refused it, and, in my opinion, quite rightly. He came to the conclusion that, although there would be a sensible diminution of light and some inconvenience to the plaintiffs, yet they had not established by twenty years' user a right to all the light which they had had, and that the obstruction complained of would not amount to an actionable nuisance, and so infringe the plaintiffs' right. The Court of Appeal, taking a different view of the amount of light to which the plaintiffs were entitled, reversed this decision, and ordered a partial demolition of the buildings erected by the defendant. For the reasons already given, I have come to the conclusion that this was wrong.

I should stop here, were it not that I feel very strongly that in any view of the case it was not one for a mandatory injunction. I am convinced that, even if the plaintiffs have a cause of action, the damages which could properly be awarded them would be very small, and to grant a mandatory injunction in such a case as this would be unduly oppressive and not in accordance with the principles on which equitable relief has been usually granted: see Curriers Company v. Corbett, 2 Dr. & Sm. 355, Robson v. Whittingham, 14 W. R. 291, L. R. 1 Ch. App. 442, and National Provincial Plate Glass Insurance Co. v. Prudential Assurance Co., 6 Ch. D. 757, in all of which an injunction was refused, although the plaintiff's legal right had been infringed. In Warren v. Brown the Court of Appeal only gave damages. The present case is eminently one in which damages would be an adequate remedy, even assuming that the plaintiffs could prove a small nuisance for which some damages could be properly given; and where that is the case an injunction, and especially a mandatory injunction, ought not to issue. The doctrine that where a legal right is continuously infringed an injunction to protect it ought to be granted is subject to qualification, as was carefully explained by Jessel, M.R., in Aynsley v. Glover, and more recently by the Court of Appeal in Shelfer v. City of London Electric Lighting Co., [1895] 2 Ch. 388.

The result of the foregoing review of the authorities is not altogether satisfactory. The general principle deducible from them appears to be that the right to light is in truth no more than a right to be protected against a particular form of nuisance, and that an action for the obstruction of light which has in fact been used and enjoyed for twenty years without interruption or written consent cannot be sustained unless the obstruction amounts to an actionable nuisance; and this often depends upon considerations wider than facts applicable to the particular case. There are elements of uncertainty which render it impossible to lay down any definite rule applicable to all cases. First, there is the uncertainty as to what amount of obstruction constitutes an actionable nuisance; and secondly, there is the uncertainty as to whether the proper remedy is an injunction or damages. But, notwithstanding these elements of uncertainty, the good sense of judges and juries may be relied upon for adequately protecting rights to light on the one hand, and freedom from unnecessary burdens on the other. There must be consideration for both sides in all these controversies.

In this case the Court of Appeal have, in my opinion, gone too far, and the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs here and below.

LOGAN v. BANK OF SCOTLAND AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service—Scottish corporation—Branch office in England—"Statutory provision regulating service of process"—Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 77), s. 3—Ord. 9, r. 8.

The plaintiff, who was resident in Scotland, issued a writ in England against the Bank of Scotland in respect of a cause of action which arose in Scotland. The bank was incorporated by an Act of the Parliament of Scotland, where its head office was, but neither in that Act nor in any subsequent Act relating to the bank was there any provision as to service of process on the bank. The writ was served on the manager of the London branch of the bank at the London office.

Held, that the bank was in the same position as a foreign corporation carrying on business within the jurisdiction, and could be served here under ord. 9, r. 8, there being no "statutory provision regulating service of process," the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, only applying to process issued from the courts of Scotland.

Appeal by the plaintiff from an order made by Bruce, J., at chambers, affirming an order of the master's setting aside the service of the writ of summons on the Bank of Scotland in London.

The facts are fully set out in the judgment. The writ was an ordinary writ for service within the jurisdiction, and was served upon the London manager of the Bank of Scotland at their branch office in the City of London. The Bank of Scotland was a Scottish corporation, having its head office in Edinburgh, with a branch in the City of London. The bank entered a conditional appearance, and took out a summons to set the service aside. The master and judge at chambers set it aside.

By ord. 9, r. 8, "In the absence of any statutory provision regulating service of process, every writ of summons issued against a corporation aggregate may be served on the mayor or other head officer, or on the town clerk, clerk, treasurer, or secretary of such corporation. . . ."

James Dunbar (Eric Dunbar with him), for the plaintiff.—The Bank of Scotland, having a branch here, is domiciled and carries on business here as well as in Scotland, and can therefore be served with a writ. The bank is a foreign corporation, and can be sued here as it carries on business here: Newby v. Von Oppen, 20 W. R. 383, L. R. 7 Q. B. 293; Lhoneux v. Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, 34 W. R. 753, 33 Ch. D. 446; Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte, 37 W. R. 703, 23 Q. B. D. 519; La Bourgogne, [1899] A. C. 431. The cases of Wood v. Anderston Foundry Co., 36 W. R. 918, and Watkins v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 37 W. R. 670, 23 Q. B. D. 285, were cases of companies formed under the Companies Act, 1862, section 62 of which contains "statutory provision regulating service of process," within the meaning of ord. 9, r. 8. The service was therefore regular and ought not to have been set aside.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and A. M. Bremner (Stair C. Agnew with them), for the Bank of Scotland.—The cases relied upon by the plaintiff are cases of foreign corporations carrying on business here. A Scottish corporation is not in the same position for this purpose as a foreign corporation. The policy of the Legislature is to place Scottish and Irish corporations on a different footing from foreign corporations, because there are courts in Scotland and Ireland under the Crown with equal authority with the courts in England: see ord. 11, rr. 1 (e), 2. Moreover, ord. 9, r. 8, only applies "in the absence of any statutory provision regulating service of process." The Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882, regulates service of process, because by section 3 it allows service of a citation on a person by registered letter; and by section 7 "person" includes a corporation. In Palmer v. Caledonian Railway Co., 40 W. R. 562, [1892] 1 Q. B. 823, Fry, L.J., said: "It is to be observed that the rule of the general order that provides for service upon corporations aggregate provides a particular mode of service in the absence of any statutory provision. I read that to mean any provision of a statute passed by the Imperial Parliament, whether it relates to service in this country or any other place which is subject to the Imperial Parliament." Therefore ord. 9, r. 8, does not apply. [They also referred upon this point to Watkins v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., and Buckley on the Companies Act (8th. ed.), p. 227]. Further, a company carries on business where its head office is situate: Jones v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., 17 Q. B. D. 421, 34 W. R. Dig. 150. It resides where its head office is. The Bank of Scotland is not resident in this country. The plaintiff, too, is resident in Scotland, and the cause of action arose there. Residence of a corporation for this purpose depends upon whether the cause of action arose here. A foreign corporation may have a residence here in respect of business transacted here. The Bank of Scotland has a residence here only for the purpose of its business carried on here. The bank, therefore, was not resident here in respect of this transaction, which was a purely Scottish one. There was therefore no jurisdiction to serve the bank here.

They also referred to Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Actien Gesellschaft, &c., Co., 50 W. R. 226, [1902] 1 K. B. 342.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—STIRLING, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of Bruce, J., made in chambers, affirming an order of the master, setting aside the service of the writ on the defendant bank. The writ is by James Bowie Logan (described as residing at Inverary, in the county of Argyll) against the bank (described as of Bishopsgate-street, in the City of London), James Scott (described as of 36, Great Tower-street, in the City of London), Robert Young and George Anderson* (both described as of Edinburgh), and claims damages for fraudulent conversion and misrepresentation in floating a firm of James Young & Sons into a limited liability company, and for fraudulent misrepresentation alleged to be contained in a prospectus of James Young & Sons (Limited) issued by the defendants. The writ was served on the 2nd of May, 1904, on the manager in London of the London branch of the Bank of Scotland, at 19, Bishopsgate-street, where the defendants have a large office with the name Bank of Scotland displayed on brass plates on the outside and at the entrance, and where they carry on the business of bankers with a large staff. The bank was incorporated in 1695 by an Act of the Parliament of Scotland, which is stated to have been recognized and confirmed by various Acts of the Imperial Parliament. None of these Acts contain any provision as to service of process on the bank. The principal office is at Edinburgh, and there all the board meetings are held. The cases of Newby v. Von Oppen, Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte, and La Bourgogne show that a foreign corporation, which carries on business in England, may be sued here, and that the writ may be served on the proper officer of the corporation here in accordance with ord. 9, r. 8. For the purposes of this rule a Scottish corporation is a foreign corporation; but it is contended that there exists in the language of the rule "statutory provision regulating service of process," in accordance with which service ought to have been made at the head office of the bank. Undoubtedly such statutory provision exists in some cases, as, for example, in the case of railway companies, into whose constitution the provisions of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, have been incorporated (see Palmer v. Caledonian Railway Co.); and also in the case of companies formed under the Companies Act, 1862: see Watkins v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co. In both these cases the statutes provided for service at the head office of the company, and it was held that service at a branch office within the jurisdiction was irregular, the proper course being to obtain leave to serve the writ at the head office out of the jurisdiction under order 11. No such statute applicable to banking companies has been brought to our notice. The statute relied on was 45 & 46 Vict. c. 77, entitled "An Act to amend the law of citation in Scotland"; but when that Act is examined and read in connection with the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act (34 & 35 Vict. c. 42), referred to in the preamble, it is found to relate exclusively to process issued from the courts of Scotland, and to contain no provision applicable to the service of process issuing from an English court. It seems to us that this Act does not constitute a statutory provision regulating the service of process within the meaning of the rule. It was also said that the right to serve a foreign corporation carrying on business in England exists only when the cause of action has arisen in England, and therefore does not exist in the present case, inasmuch as the cause of action arose in Scotland. It is difficult to see why this should be so. If a foreigner is found within the jurisdiction, he may be served with a writ, although the cause of action did not arise in England; and it is not easy to see why there should be a difference as to the right to serve a foreign corporation which is found to have a place of business and to be trading in this country, and which is therefore to be treated as resident here. Further, the decided cases do not support this contention. In Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte the action was brought on a contract made in Paris, and in La Bourgogne the cause of action was a collision on the high seas. Lastly, it was said to be contrary to the policy of the law that actions of this kind should be brought in England when they might be brought in the Scottish courts, within whose jurisdiction the defendant bank has its head office, and the defendants Young and Anderson, as well as the plaintiff, reside. In support of this contention reference was made to ord. 11, r. 2. This rule relates to service out of the jurisdiction, and must receive careful attention when any application for that purpose is made to the court, as, for example, if leave should be sought to serve the defendants Young and Anderson out of the jurisdiction. No such rule applies where service is made within the jurisdiction. If the defendants Young and Anderson were found within the jurisdiction, the plaintiff would be entitled to serve them with the writ as of right, and without any leave obtained from the court; and in the circumstances of this case the plaintiff also, in our opinion, is entitled to serve the defendant bank as of right and without leave. We therefore think that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the orders made by the master and the judge should be discharged.

Younger, K.C., and Bischoff.—The court can vary its orders from time to time: Engel v. South Metropolitan Brewing and Bottling Co., 40 W. R. 282, [1892] 1 Ch. 442. This court heard an appeal direct from the registrar, In re Strand Wood Co., [1904] 2 Ch. 1, 52 W. R. Dig. 26, but the point now raised was not taken. It is understood that there Buckley, J., refused to hear an application to discharge the registrar's order, on the ground that the proper course was to go direct to the Court of Appeal. This appears to be the learned judge's usual practice. The matter is now governed by rule 7 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903. The result is that the registrar is authorized to determine any matter which can be determined in chambers, unless the judge specially directs to the contrary.

THE COURT consulted Buckley, J., and

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court: We are of opinion that when a matter has been before the registrar in chambers, and he has made an order granting or refusing the application made to him, those who desire to question the order should move before the judge to discharge it. We ought not to entertain an appeal direct from the order of the registrar upon an interlocutory matter disposed of by him in chambers. Buckley, J., will entertain a motion for this purpose. There has been some misapprehension, for Buckley, J., informs us that it has not been his practice to refuse to entertain motions to discharge orders made by the registrar in chambers. We make no order on this appeal, and we leave the costs of it to be dealt with by Buckley, J.

Held, that the £110 was not paid to the purchaser in respect of any interest that he had in the land, but on the basis that he had no interest in it. Consequently the action must fail.

Decision of Farwell, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported [1904] 1 Ch. 658).

On the 14th of June, 1901, the defendant Fowler agreed to sell to one Green certain freehold premises known as Oakleigh Lodge, Sunbury, for £2,850, the purchase to be completed on the 29th of September following. Green paid £300 to the defendant as a deposit in part payment of the purchase-money, and was let into immediate possession of the premises.

On the 8th of March, 1902, the defendant gave Green formal notice rescinding the agreement and forfeiting the deposit, and on the 29th of May, 1902, Green commenced an action of Green v. Fowler, against the defendant claiming return of the deposit, to which the defendant counterclaimed for specific performance.

On the 1st of July, 1902, the plaintiff Ridout, in an action in the King's Bench Division of Ridout v. Green, recovered judgment against Green for £55 and costs and such costs were subsequently taxed at £100 7s.

On the 8th of August, 1902, Ridout was appointed receiver in his action of Ridout v. Green (upon first giving security in the usual way) to receive the rents, profits, and moneys receivable in respect of Green's interest in the premises, Oakleigh Lodge, Sunbury.

On the 9th of August, 1902, Ridout served Fowler with notice of his receivership order of the 8th of August, 1902, and also duly registered it under the Land Charges Registration and Searches Act, 1888, and the Land Charges Act, 1900.

On the 16th of January, 1903, an order was made by consent in the action of Green v. Fowler, by which the contract of the 14th of June, 1901, was rescinded, and Green on payment to him of £110 delivered up possession of the premises to Fowler. Ridout completed his security as receiver in May, 1903, and then commenced the present action against Fowler, claiming a declaration that by virtue of the order of the 3rd of August, 1902, and under the circumstances, he was entitled to a lien or charge upon the said premises for securing payment to him of the said sum of £155 7s. and interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum from the 1st of July, 1902; and he also claimed payment by the defendant of said sum of £155 7s., and interest as aforesaid.

Farwell, J., held that Green was never possessed of any estate in the land on which Ridout's order by way of equitable execution could have operated. He also held that, Ridout not having perfected his security as receiver till after the compromise, had no claim in respect of the £110. He accordingly dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bramwell Davis, K.C., and Crossfield, for the appellant.—On payment of the deposit Green acquired an interest in the property: see Rose v. Watson, 12 W. R. 585, 10 H. L. C. 672, and Whitbread v. Watt, 50 W. R. 442, [1902] 1 Ch. 835. This interest was bound by the order for equitable execution, and the £110, having been paid in order to purchase this interest of Green, ought to belong to the present plaintiff, and the fact that he had not perfected his security at the date of the compromise makes no difference.

W. F. Webster, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—It has been said that the agreement under which the £110 was paid to Green was an "act of oblivion." But we cannot shut our eyes to the facts of the case. It was said that on proof of the existence of the contract for the purchase of the property, the payment of the deposit and the lapse of the time fixed for completion without the purchaser completing or offering to pay the balance of the purchase-money, Green, having paid the deposit, would be entitled to judgment in an action for the return of the deposit, because the onus would be on the defendant in such action to prove the reason for the non-completion of the contract. I cannot agree. I think that, wherever the onus originally was, on proof of the above facts there would be sufficient to throw upon the purchaser the onus of proving the cause of non-completion. The plaintiff, who has obtained this order for the appointment of a receiver and has registered it, says that he is entitled to have the £110 which was paid to Green under the agreement between him and Fowler treated as the purchase-money of an interest which Green had in the land. If the plaintiff had proved that Green had an interest in the land, and that the £110 was paid for that interest, the plaintiff would have been entitled to succeed in this action. But he has not proved that. So far from proving that the £110 was paid as the price of an interest which Green had in the land, it is plain that the settlement took place on the basis that Green had no interest at all, that he was in default and had no right to a return of the deposit. The vendor desired to regain immediate possession of the property, and the £110 was the price paid to get Green out of possession. In my opinion the appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. The plaintiff has entirely failed to prove that the £110 was paid by Fowler to Green in respect of any interest which he had in the property. On that short ground the appeal must fail.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

In re CLABBON (AN INFANT). (a.)

Poor Law—Pauper infant—Legacy—Cost of maintenance—Statute of Limitations—Poor Law Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 103), s. 16.

Where a pauper infant was chargeable to the guardians of the poor, and became entitled while so chargeable to a legacy under a will,

Held, that the guardians were not limited to the recovery of the cost of one year's maintenance by section 16 of the Poor Law Act, 1849, but could recover the amount expended in maintaining the infant during a period of six years.

Adjourned summons.

The infant, Frederick William Clabbon, who was born on the 9th of October, 1889, became chargeable to the Guardians of the Poor in St. Mary, Islington, on the 29th of June, 1897, and remained so chargeable up to the date of this summons.

Under the will of his grandfather, William Clabbon, the said infant became entitled to a legacy and a share in residue, amounting together to a sum of £270.

This summons was taken out by the clerk to the guardians of St. Mary, Islington, suing as the next friend of the said infant, asking that a sum of £83, being the amount disbursed by the said guardians in maintaining the said infant during a period of six years immediately preceding the date of this summons, might be paid to them by the executor of the said will, who had been made a respondent.

The question to be decided was whether the guardians could recover the cost of maintenance for the full term of six years or whether they were limited to the recovery of the cost of one year's maintenance under section 16 of the Poor Law Act, 1849. That section provides as follows: "When any pauper shall have in his possession or belonging to him any money or valuable security for money, the guardians of the union or parish within which such pauper is chargeable may take and appropriate so much of such money, or the produce of such security, or recover the same as a debt before any local court, as will reimburse the said guardians for the amount expended by them, whether on behalf of the common fund or of any parish, in relief of such pauper during the period of twelve months prior to such taking and appropriation, or prior to such proceeding for the recovery thereof, as the case may be."

Davey, for the applicant.—An infant must pay for necessaries supplied to him during his minority (In re Rhodes, 38 W. R. 385, 44 Ch. D. 94), and the common law right to recover debts so incurred during a period of six years is not limited by section 16 of the Poor Law Act, 1849. The remedies given by that section to guardians of the poor are in addition to, and not in substitution of, their common law rights.

West Ham Union v. Pearson, 62 L. T. 638, 38 W. R. Dig. 49, was also cited.

Paterson, for the executor.—The right of guardians to recover expenses in respect of maintenance of a pauper is limited by the section to a period of one year. They have a statutory duty to provide for paupers and cannot exercise the common law right: In re Webster, 27 Ch. D. 710, and In re Newbegin, 36 Ch. D. 477.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This case is covered by the authorities that have been cited. I do not agree that a pauper who gets relief to keep him alive takes that relief as a right, so that he cannot subsequently be sued if he acquires money, as has happened in the present case. The question was decided in West Ham Union v. Pearson, 62 L. T. 638, 38 W. R. Dig. 49, where Fry, L.J., said: "The question is whether the defendant is liable for these expenses, expenses which were properly incurred for the benefit of the defendant. I think he is so liable, and I base my decision, not upon the Lunacy Acts, but simply upon the common law liability on the part of the defendant to repay the expenses necessarily incurred for the benefit of the defendant himself." And in that case Mathew, L.J., concurred; he said: "It has been abundantly proved here that this man was not in a fit state to protect himself, that these expenses were necessaries, and that, therefore, the defendant is liable for them."

At common law an infant is liable for necessaries for six years. The question is whether section 16 of the Poor Law Act, 1849, limits such liability to one year. It is difficult to imagine why it should, and the words of the statute do not bear that construction. The section provides two additional remedies—first, it gives guardians additional security on any property a pauper may have; and secondly, a right to recover expenses in a summary manner. It does not touch their common law rights. It would require special words to limit those rights.

If it had not been for the dictum of Chitty, L.J., in In re Newbegin, 36 Ch. D. 477, the question would not have been open to doubt, but the dictum there was not necessary for the point to be decided in that case; the case was decided under another Act of Parliament and it is not binding on me. The result is that the executor must pay to the guardians the sum asked for by this summons.

In re GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS (LIMITED). HUMMEL v. GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS (LIMITED). (a.) Company—Debenture—Series—Transfer of some debentures to company—Subsequent transfer by company—Validity.

A limited company duly issued a series of debentures, each of which was to rank pari passu with the others. Certain of these debentures were, for value, transferred to the company itself, and afterwards re-transferred, likewise for value, by the company to other persons.

Held, that the debentures so dealt with did not rank pari passu with the other debentures of the same series.

Further consideration.

This was the further consideration of an action brought by the plaintiffs on behalf of themselves and all other holders of first mortgage debentures of George Routledge & Sons (Limited), against the company.

The company was registered on the 9th of November, 1889.

By article 5 (f) of their articles of association their objects, among other things, were to issue first mortgage debentures for an aggregate sum of £75,000, carrying interest at £5 per cent., and if necessary or desirable at any time to renew any of such first mortgage debentures; but the company was not to have power at any time during the existence of any first mortgage debenture so created, or any first mortgage debentures issued in renewal thereof, to grant any mortgage or charge of any kind which should have priority over or rank with the mortgage or charge created by such first mortgage debentures.

By article 107 (7) the directors were empowered from time to time to borrow for the purposes of the company such sums of money as they might think proper, and they might secure the repayment of any moneys so borrowed and the interest thereon by mortgage of the whole or any part of the company's property including capital, whether called up or not, or after the registration of the company, by the issue of mortgage or other debentures, or bonds, or upon such other security and upon such terms as they might think fit, and, in particular, might after the registration of the company create first mortgage debentures for an aggregate sum of £75,000, carrying interest at £5 per cent. which should have priority over all other mortgages or securities of the company.

On the 7th of January, 1890, the company issued 750 first mortgage debentures to secure the aggregate sum of £75,000 with interest at 5 per cent. Each debenture purported to charge by way of floating security the undertaking of the company, and all property, whatsoever or wheresoever, present and future, of the company with the payment of the principal money and interest.

The conditions subject to which the debentures were issued were stated to be, amongst others:

(1) The debenture was one of a series of like debentures limited to the sum of £75,000 issued or to be issued by the company. The debentures of the said series were to rank pari passu as a first charge on the property and assets of the company, without any preference or priority over one another, and such charge was to be a floating security, but so that the company was not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge in priority to the said debentures.

(3) The company was to keep a register of the holders for the time being of the debentures.

(4) Every transfer was to be in writing under the hand of the registered holder. The transfer and the debentures were to be delivered at the office of the company, and thereupon the transfer was to be registered.

(5) The registered holder was for all purposes to be regarded as exclusively entitled to the benefit thereof, and the company was not to be bound to enter on the register notice of any trust or to recognize any right in any other person.

(10) The company was, on the 1st of October, 1896 and on the 1st of October in every subsequent year, to redeem one-tenth of the debentures.

(15) The company might at any time prior to the 1st of October, 1896, postpone for a period not exceeding five years the commencement of the redemption of the debentures.

At various dates after the issue of the debentures, but all prior to the 1st of October, 1896, the company bought in the market sixteen of this series of debentures, whereby the aggregate sum of £1,600 had been secured. These debentures were transferred to the company in the usual way.

Subsequently, but at dates prior also to the 1st of October, 1896, the company, for value received, purported to transfer these same debentures to persons who were now the holders of them.

At the trial of the action it was admitted that the plaintiff and all other the holders of mortgage debentures of the company of the same issue as the plaintiff's debentures were entitled to a charge upon the undertaking of the company.

Judgment to that effect was accordingly pronounced on the 9th of August, 1900. Certain accounts and inquiries were by the judgment ordered to be taken and made.

By his certificate, dated the 23rd of February, 1904, the master certified that he had, in the third part of the first schedule thereto set forth the names of certain claimants to hold debentures of the issue of the 7th of January, 1890 (being the holders of the above-mentioned sixteen debentures). He reserved, however, for the consideration of the court, the question whether these claimants, or any of them, were entitled to be treated as the holders of these debentures.

It was admitted that the assets of the company charged by the debentures of this series were not sufficient to pay the amounts secured by them in full.

The plaintiffs took out a summons asking that the action might be heard on further consideration, and that an order might be made in theterms of accom-accompanying minutes.

The minutes contained a declaration that the respondents, the claimants of the sixteen debentures, were not entitled to be treated as holders of first debentures of the company in respect of the debentures claimed to be held by them.

J. K. Young (Astbury, K.C., with him), for the plaintiffs.—The debentures held by the respondent debenture-holders are bad. A mortgagor cannot set up his own incumbrance against any other incumbrancer: Watts v. Symes, 1 D. M. & G. 240, 244; Otter v. Lord Vaux, 5 W. R. 188, 6 D. M. & G. 638. It is only where "the owner of an estate pays charges on the estate which he is not personally liable to pay" that the question whether those charges are to be kept alive for his benefit can arise: Thorne v. Cann, [1895] A. C. 11, 18, 43 W. R. Dig. 121 (per Lord Macnaghten); Adams v. Angell, 5

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ch. D. 634, and Thorne v. Cann, where it was held that the charges were kept alive, were cases of purchasers of property subject to charges not created by them. That is not this case. The conditions subject to which these debentures were issued do not relieve the holders from equities attaching to them. The position of the respondent debenture-holders is that of purchasers of a chose in action with notice of a defect in title, if, indeed, notice is required at all. Again, the subsequent transfers of the debentures by the company cannot be treated as a re-issue, for the company had no power to re-issue debentures before the 1st of October, 1896, and would be prevented from so doing by the conditions relating to redemption. The plaintiffs are not estopped from disputing the validity of the debentures held by the respondent debenture-holders: Mowatt v. Castle Steel and Iron Works Co., 34 Ch. D. 58, 35 W. R. Dig. 82.

Earle, for certain of the respondent debenture-holders.—In the present case there never was any intention that merger should take place. [BUCKLEY, J., referred to Ashburner on Mortgages, p. 475.] Thorne v. Cann and Liquidation Estates Purchase Co. v. Willoughby, 46 W. R. 589, [1898] A. C. 321, are strongly in my favour. [BUCKLEY, J.—In neither case was the person who paid off the charge liable to pay the debt.] Secondly, assuming that the original debentures had merged, the company, which had power to issue debentures of the series in question, purported to give debentures; although those debentures may be bad in point of form, the holders are equitable mortgagees, and ought to be allowed to rank pari passu with the debenture-holders represented by the plaintiffs: In re Queensland Land and Coal Co., 42 W. R. 600, [1894] 3 Ch. 181.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Ashworth James, for other respondents in the same interest.—The company had power to issue debentures to secure £76,000. Supposing that they had issued a debenture to secure a loan, and had, on paying off the loan, recovered possession of it; if they had re-issued it, such re-issue would have been valid. Why should the position be altered because they have employed different machinery—viz., that of transfer and retransfer? The mere fact that the debentures contain a covenant to pay is not fatal to the contention that the security was intended to be kept alive. In this respect the case is not, in principle, different from Capital and Counties Bank v. Rhodes, 51 W. R. 470, [1903] 1 Ch. 631. It would be contrary to Stevens v. Mid-Hants Railway Co., 21 W. R. 858, 8 Ch. App. 1064, that we should lose our security.

Arthur Sims, for other respondents in the same interest.

BUCKLEY, J.—I should have thought that this case was unarguable. I have heard argument upon it, and I am still of opinion that it is unarguable. The company had power to issue debentures to secure sums up to the aggregate amount of £75,000, each debenture ranking pari passu with the others. The debentures are in the usual form. There is a covenant to pay the principal when it becomes due, and in the meantime to pay interest on the same. There is also a charge by way of floating security on the undertaking and assets of the company. Amongst the conditions there is one that a register of debenture-holders shall be kept, in which every transfer is to be entered. What has happened is this. The company issued all the debentures, and the names of the debenture-holders were entered. Subsequently, the company bought in the market some of its own debentures. Upon those purchases this took place. The debenture-holder executed to the company itself a transfer in common form—"I of in consideration of the sum of £ paid to me by Geo. Routledge & Sons (Limited) (hereinafter called the transferee) do hereby bargain, sell, assign, and transfer to the transferee the debenture of and in the undertaking called Geo. Routledge & Sons (Limited)." The debenture, having been delivered at the office of the company for registration, was then stamped on the back with a rubber stamp which bore the words: "This bond was transferred 18 , from to ." This form was filled up in the case of each transfer. In the case of the debenture which is before me there is a record of its transfer from Edward Kinder to G. W. Davis, and from G. W. Davis to the company in 1893. Then they made an entry in the register of holders of debentures—"Geo. Routledge & Sons (Limited) are the registered holders of this debenture." Now, what is the effect of this transaction? The company has become the assignee of its own debt, and has become bound to pay itself £100 and interest; and it has also become the assignee of its own undertaking to pay its own debt, and of a charge upon its own property to secure the payment. The result, to my mind, is that the debt is absolutely gone; a man cannot be the assignee of his own debt and a mortgagee of property of which he is also mortgagor. And, inasmuch as the debt is gone, the security is also gone.

Subsequently the company transferred these debentures. The transfer, again, is in the common form. The debenture was again stamped on the back, "This bond was transferred October 28th, 1903, from Geo. Routledge & Sons (Limited) to W. F. Narraway and C. Gow," and their names were put on the register in respect of the debenture. To my mind that operation had no effect; W. F. Narraway and C. Gow were transferees of nothing. There was no debt in existence, and no security in existence at the date of the transfer to them.

A second argument is raised on this question. It is said, and quite truly, that when the person who took the transfer from the company paid his money for it, he thought that what was being transferred to him was a debenture forming part of the £75,000 series. But it is also said that the company was bound to give effect to that which was the real bargain between the parties by issuing to him a new debenture, if this transaction did not result in giving him such a security. Was there such a contract? To my mind there was not. To take an example. Suppose it to be a condition of this issue that a debenture is not to be assignable free from equities. A transferee of such a debenture has got that to which there are attached equities subsisting at the date of the transfer, as between the company and the debenture-holders. He will get something to which equities are attached, equities, that is to say, which are attached to the debt. The contention of the respondents must be, not that he is necessarily an assignee of the debt, but that he is a person who, if he does not get that which is nominally assigned to him, is entitled to get a new thing which is to be free from equities. But he has not bargained for that. He has made a bargain by which he is to get something which has become a dead thing. It is true that he has not paid his money in that expectation, but that is all that he has got. There is no contrast between him and the company, except that he is to get an assignment of this debenture. The second ground on which the argument for the respondent is put therefore fails.

I agree that if there is a contract that a person is to have a loan on the terms that the lender is to have a binding security, and he does not get that which he has contracted to have, he has the right to be placed in the same position as if he had got it. But this loan was different. It was not made on the terms that there should be issued to the lender a particular security, but that there should be transferred to him something which was not a security, something which the company had not got, and could not, therefore, transfer to him. I think that these debentures ceased to be securities, and I declare, therefore, that they do not rank pari passu with the other debentures of the same issue.

RAINBOW v. HOWKINS. (a.)

Auctioneer—Public auction—Sale of chattel of value exceeding £10—No signed "note or memorandum" of contract—Action for refusal to deliver—Liability of auctioneer—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 4.

The defendant, who was an auctioneer, was instructed by the owner of a pony to put it up for sale at a public auction with a reserve price of £25. At the auction the defendant put the pony up for sale and disclosed the owner's name, but, forgetting his instructions as to the reserve price, orally announced that the pony would be sold without reserve. The plaintiff bid fifteen guineas, and being the highest bidder the pony was knocked down to him. The defendant made no note or memorandum in writing of the sale in his book. Immediately after the sale the defendant discovered and informed the plaintiff that he had made a mistake in offering the pony for sale without reserve, and he thereupon put it up for sale again, when it was bought in for seventeen guineas. In an action brought by the plaintiff for the delivery up of the pony, or, alternatively, for damages for breach of warranty of authority by the defendant to sell it without reserve,

Held, (1) that the value of the pony being more than £10 the action failed by reason of the absence of a written memorandum or note of the sale in accordance with section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893; and (2) that there had been no breach of warranty of authority to sell the pony without reserve, as, the principal's name having been disclosed, there was a contract binding on the principal on which he could, but for the non-compliance with section 4, have been successfully sued by the plaintiff.

Warlow v. Harrison, 8 W. R. 95, 1 E. & E. 309, distinguished.

Appeal by the plaintiff from his Honour Judge Ingham sitting at the county court of Rugby, in the county of Warwick. The plaintiff in his action claimed from the defendant, an auctioneer, the delivery up of a pony sold to the plaintiff by the defendant at an auction held by him at Rugby Cattle Market on the 21st of September, 1903, which the plaintiff alleged was wrongfully detained by the defendant. Alternatively the plaintiff claimed £26 5s. and damages for its detention; and in the further alternative he claimed £20 damages for breach of warranty of authority by the defendant to sell the pony "without reserve."

At the trial the plaintiff gave evidence that he attended the auction held by defendant, where the pony, the subject-matter of this action, was not catalogued but was advertised in an advertisement issued by the defendant. The auctioneer, forgetting instructions by his principal to sell subject to a reserve, orally advertised to the public assembled at the auction that he was offering the pony without reserve, and that it would be sold without reserve to the highest bidder. He disclosed the name of the vendor. The plaintiff bid fifteen guineas, and being the highest bonâ fide bidder, the auctioneer knocked the pony down to the plaintiff. After the lapse of a few minutes the auctioneer, discovering that he made a mistake in offering the pony for sale without reserve, put it up again and himself bid it up to seventeen guineas. The plaintiff denied that his attention was called to any conditions of sale by the auctioneer, and no evidence was called by the defendant to show that such conditions were exhibited.

The reserve price upon the pony was £25. The plaintiff tendered to the defendant the purchase price of the pony, which tender was refused. Before bringing his action the plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for delivery up of the pony, but he refused to do so.

The defendant pleaded the statutory defence under section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, that the pony being of a value greater than £10, and there being no note or memorandum in writing of the contract of sale, the plaintiff had no right of action.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, holding that section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was a good defence to the first part of the plaintiff's claim, and with regard to the claim for breach of warranty of authority to sell, that, the principal having been disclosed, the defendant was not personally liable.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

J. C. Gordon, for the appellant.—Section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, does not apply to a claim for breach of warranty of authority to sell, it only relates to direct sales: see Warlow v. Harrison, 8 W. R. 95, 1 E. & E. 309, per Martin, B., at p. 317. The defendant, by putting up the pony for sale without reserve, contracted that the sale should be without reserve, and the plaintiff being the highest bonâ fide bidder has a right of action against the defendant for breach of that contract. Further, by section 58, sub-section 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, a sale by auction is complete when the hammer falls, and any subsequent dealing by the auctioneer with the article that has been sold is wrongful, and an action in tort for the wrongful detention can be maintained by the purchaser against the auctioneer.

Pritchett, for the defendant.—The judgment of the county court judge was right. Warlow v. Harrison does not apply here. In that case, as is pointed out in Mainprice v. Westley, 6 B. & S. 420, the name of the vendor was not disclosed to the purchaser, but in the present case the name of the vendor was given, and but for the absence of a written memorandum of the sale the vendor could be successfully sued by the plaintiff, but he cannot sue the auctioneer. Further, there has been no breach of warranty of authority to sell on the part of the defendant.

He cited the following cases: Gadd v. Houghton, 24 W. R. 975, 1 Ex. D. 357; Howard v. Sheward, 15 W. R. 45, L. R. 2 C. P. 148; Collen v. Gardner, 21 Beav. 540; Saffron Walden Building Society v. Rayner, 28 W. R. 681, 14 Ch. D. 406; Manser v. Black, 6 Hare 443; and Franklyn v. Lamond, 4 C. B. 637.

Gordon replied.

plaintiff's appeal fails. The claim is put in two ways: Firstly, for delivery of a pony or payment of £26 5s.; secondly, in the alternative, £20 damages for breach of warranty of authority of auctioneer to sell the pony "without reserve." We are of opinion, on the authority of Woolfe v. Horne, 25 W. R. 728, 2 Q. B. D. 355, which is a more recent decision than Mainprice v. Westley, cited to us by the defendant's counsel, that an action for the wrongful refusal to deliver a chattel sold at public auction may, in some circumstances, at least, successfully be brought against the auctioneer, although the principal's name is disclosed to the buyer at the time of the sale. We see no material distinction between the facts in Wolfe v. Horne and the facts in the present case, except that in that case, apparently, no question of a statutory defence arose in regard to the requirement which existed at the date of that action under section 17 of the Statute of Frauds and exists now under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 4. In the present case the chattel is of a value exceeding £10, and the statutory defence is relied upon by the defendant. It is not suggested that there was any signed memorandum or note within the meaning of the statute. The case of the plaintiff, therefore, so far as it consists of a claim for the refusal to deliver the chattel in accordance with the alleged contract of sale fails; not because an auctioneer whose principal is disclosed cannot be sued for the refusal to deliver the chattel sold, but because the purchaser, by reason of the Sale of Goods Act, cannot maintain an action in respect of the contract.

There remains for consideration the claim for damages for the alleged breach of warranty of authority to sell. In our judgment this also fails. There was—apart from the point arising under the Sale of Goods Act, s. 4—a contract of sale binding upon the defendant's principal. The hammer had fallen; and, as between the plaintiff, as the highest bidder, and the auctioneer's principal, the right of the plaintiff could not have been defeated by the principal showing that the auctioneer was authorized by him to sell only subject to a reserved price. The defendant, the auctioneer, had an apparent authority, which his principal, if he had been sued by the plaintiff, would not have been allowed, in point of law, to repudiate after a sale had been concluded by the hammer being knocked down, upon the ground that his private instructions had been contravened by the auctioneer in selling "without reserve" Warlow v. Harrison was cited to us by the plaintiff's counsel. But in that case the auctioneer never made a contract, as he refused to accept the plaintiff's bid, although it was the last genuine one; and therefore he never did effect a contract between his principal and the plaintiff. Here the answer to the plaintiff's claim on the ground of breach of warranty or misrepresentation of authority is that there was none. The defendant's principal was as much bound as if he had made the bargain himself; but the action fails for a totally different reason—viz., the want of a signed contract.

Whether an action would lie against the auctioneer for failing to make an entry in his book which would bind his principal, we do not stop to inquire. No such point, as constituting a ground of claim, was made at the trial, and it is not open to the plaintiff. We have dealt with the only questions which arose upon the present appeal.

FRASER v. FRASER. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Referring order to master—Right of appeal—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14, r. 7.

Where an order is made under ord. 14, r. 7, referring an action to a master for trial, no appeal lies from his decision.

Appeal from decision of a master in an action referred to him under ord. 14, r. 7.

The action was brought to recover commission on sale of shares.

The action was, by consent, under ord. 14, r. 7, ordered to be referred to a master for decision.

The master directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiff for £800.

The defendant then appealed to the Court of Appeal, who dismissed the appeal on the ground that no appeal lay to them, but expressed no opinion as to whether an appeal lay from the order of a master.

The defendant then appealed to the Divisional Court on the ground that the finding was against the weight of evidence.

By ord. 14, r. 7, it is provided "Upon the hearing of the application, with the consent of the parties, an order may be made referring the action to a master or the action may be finally disposed of without appeal in a summary manner."

Trevor Lloyd, for the plaintiff.—No appeal lies from the master. He is an arbitrator, and his decision is therefore final.

Hume Williams, for the defendant.—The master is here in the nature of a referee, and therefore an appeal lies to this court. Rule 6 of order 40 provides that, "Where at a trial by a referee he has directed that any judgment be entered, any party may move to set aside such judgment on the ground that upon the finding as entered the judgment so directed is wrong." And by rule 6 (a), rule 6 is made to apply to "a reference to any officer of this court . . . under an order of this court." That includes a reference to a master under ord. 14, r. 7. It would materially restrict the scope of order 14 if parties who consented to its being referred to a master lost their right of appeal thereby.

Trevor Lloyd replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I think in this case that the meaning of the rule is that the master was to be in the position of arbitrator. I am strongly pressed with the fact that, before the Judicature Act, there was for many years a well-known practice of referring actions to Queen's Bench masters with the consent of parties, and in those cases the master undoubtedly acted as an arbitrator, and there was no appeal. I cannot think that it was intended by the words of this rule to destroy the old practice. Mr. Hume Williams relies upon the words in ord. 40, r. 6 (a) which provides that rules 2 and 6 "shall apply to a reference to any officer of the court . . . under an order of the court." And rule 6 is to the effect that where a referee has directed that any judgment be entered any party may move to have the judgment set aside "on the ground that upon the finding as entered the judgment so directed is wrong." That only allows an appeal where the judgment is not in accordance with the finding; and does not allow any appeal from the finding itself, which is what is desired here. Those rules are not inconsistent with the view that there is no appeal from a master under ord. 14, r. 7, on a question of fact. Without saying that the judgments of the Court of Appeal in Fraser v. Fraser, [1904] 1 K. B. 56, are an authority on this point, the language they used show that they inclined to the view that there was no appeal at all.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think that any a priori argument as to whether there should or should not be a right of appeal is quite beside the mark, as any reference under ord. 14, r. 7, is made by consent. I think this case must be regarded as an ordinary reference. The phrase "that the action be referred" is a very old one, and was ordinarily understood as meaning that the action was to be dealt with by an arbitration. Why it should not have that meaning here I do not know. This view of the case was that taken by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., and apparently also by Mathew, L.J., in Fraser v. Fraser, [1904] 1 K. B. 56.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. The phrase "that an order may be made referring the action to a master," had, I think, a well-understood meaning when this rule was framed, and I cannot for my part see any difficulty in supposing that it was intended to be treated in that well-recognized sense, viz.—that he was to be treated as an arbitrator, and no appeal lies from his decision. It is said that the words "without right of appeal" in the second limb of the rule exclude the idea that a decision of a master upon a reference under the first limb is also to be without appeal. I think there are two answers to that. In the first place, if the words "without right of appeal" were not in the second limb there would have been the ordinary right of appeal to the judge. In the second place, if our view is correct that the words "referring the action to a master" in themselves imported that there was no right of appeal, to have introduced the words "without right of appeal" in the first limb would have been misleading, as suggesting some new kind of reference with limitations not heard of before.

POLLEY v. FORDHAM. (a.)

Justices — Illegal distress — Action against magistrate issuing warrant—Statutory limitation for commencement of action—Act from which time begins to run—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1 (a).

In an action for illegal distress against a magistrate, the six months within which the action must be brought, as provided by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, begins to run from the date of the levy on the premises and not from the date of the conviction, the distress being the act complained of.

Appeal from the Shoreditch County Court.

On the 11th of February, the plaintiff, John Polley, was summoned for not having two of his children vaccinated and was in each case fined 20s. and costs. Distress was levied on the 17th of April, and on the 27th of April the distress was paid out by the plaintiff under protest. On the 8th of July, 1903, the conviction was (by consent) quashed by this court on the ground that the summonses were issued more than eighteen months after the birth of the children. The plaintiff, on the 26th of August, brought an action in the County Court against the magistrate who had convicted him, for £50 for illegal distress. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, being of opinion that the plaintiff was barred by section 1 (a), of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, as the injury was suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the conviction on the 11th of February, which was more than six months before action brought.

By the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1, "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance of, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect. . . . (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or in a case of a continuance of injury or damage within six months next after the ceasing thereof."

Kingsbury, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge was wrong. The injury to the plaintiff was the distress and not the conviction: Brittain v. Kinnaird, 1 B. & B. 432. Section 3 of the Justices' Protection Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), shows that the conviction and distress are quite separate acts.

Robertson, for the defendant.—The real injury to the plaintiff was the conviction. The distress was only a ministerial act. Section 3 of the Justices' Protection Act, 1848, supports this view.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I express no opinion as to what may be the eventual result of this action. All we have to do is to see whether the plaintiff's right of action is barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1 (a). That section provides a statutory limitation, and must therefore be construed strictly. The words on which the defendant relies are as follows: "(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of." The act complained of here was not, in my opinion, the conviction. The act complained of was the trespass to the plaintiff's premises by the levying of the distress.

Section 3 of the Justices' Protection Act, 1848, is only for the purpose of protecting a justice who has issued a warrant upon a conviction apparently legal by some other justice which subsequently turns out to be without jurisdiction, and the Act provides that the action, if any, must be brought against the justice who made the original order. I think it would require clear and distinct words to say, with regard to a statutory limitation, that the period is to run, not from the date of the real cause of action, the entry on the premises, but from some order of anterior date under the authority of which that entry was made. I think, therefore, the case must go back to the county court judge.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think the act complained of is distress and nothing else. No such action was ever heard of as an action for making an order without jurisdiction. If the order is not followed by consequences against individuals it comes to nothing. Actions for illegal distress of one sort or another were at one time very common, but they were always actions of trespass. The form of the complaint used to be that the defendant had wrongfully entered the house or premises of the plaintiff and had done so and so. Then any question which arose about the warrant, conviction, or order on which the erroneous proceedings by way of distress and entry were founded, was raised on a defence setting up that it was justified because of the warrant and the conviction or order on which the warrant was founded. But the action itself was not for erroneous exercise of jurisdiction, but was for making a distress and breaking and entering a man's premises when there was no right to do so. No such action as that suggested by the respondent will be found in Bullen & Leake or Chitty on Pleading, or in any of the books of precedents.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Ex parte THE BANKRUPT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Practice—Claim by bankrupt to inspect the record of minutes of committee of inspection—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 80—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 12, 16, 285, 292.

Neither by the Bankruptcy Act nor the Bankruptcy Rules has a bankrupt the right to inspect the record book kept by his trustee under section 80 and rule 285; and therefore the court will not give leave for such inspection, nor take notice of the circumstances on which the application is based.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 30, [1904] 2 K. B. 760), affirmed.

Appeal from a decision of Bigham, J. (reported ante, p. 30, [1904] 2 K. B. 760), refusing to make an order to permit the bankrupt to inspect the record book kept by the trustee in the bankruptcy, and containing minutes of the meetings of the committee of inspection and copies of letters and other papers, which the trustee, on obtaining his release, had handed over to the official receiver.

The bankrupt had been prosecuted and convicted for an offence under the Debtors Act, 1869, and was anxious to clear his character by taking proceedings against persons who, he alleged, had been guilty of perjury, as he hoped the inspection would enable him to prove.

The official receiver had allowed him as a favour to inspect the minutes of one meeting of the committee, but, on that proving insufficient, had denied him inspection of the whole series, and the learned judge had held that the circumstances did not warrant a departure from what appeared to be the established practice.

The following are extracts from the Bankruptcy Act and Rules:

Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 80: "The trustee shall keep, in manner prescribed, proper books, in which he shall from time to time cause to be made entries or minutes of proceedings at meetings, and of such other matters as may be prescribed, and any creditor of the bankrupt may, subject to the control of the court, personally or by his agent inspect any such books."

Bankruptcy Rules, 1886:

"Rule 12. All proceedings of the court shall remain of record in the court, so as to form a complete record of each matter, and they shall not be removed for any purpose, except for the use of the officers of the court, or by special direction of the judge or registrar, but they may at all reasonable times be inspected by the trustee, the debtor, and any creditor who has proved, or any person on behalf of the trustee, debtor, or any such creditor."

"Rule 16. All office copies of petitions, proceedings, affidavits, books, papers, and writings, or any parts thereof required by any trustee or by any debtor, or by any creditor, or by the solicitor of any such trustee, debtor, or creditor, shall be provided in the High Court by the senior bankruptcy registrar, and in a county court by the registrar; and shall, except as to figures, be fairly written at length, and be sealed and delivered out without any unnecessary delay, and in the order in which they shall have been bespoken."

"Rule 285. The official receiver, until a trustee is appointed, and thereafter the trustee, shall keep a book to be called the 'record book,' in which he shall record all minutes, all proceedings had, and resolutions passed at any meeting of creditors, or of the committee of inspection, and all such matters as may be necessary to give a correct view of his administration of the estate, but he shall not be bound to insert in the record any document of a confidential nature (such as the opinion of counsel on any matter affecting the interest of the creditors), nor need he exhibit such document to any person other than a member of the committee of inspection."

"Rule 292. Upon a trustee resigning, or being released or removed from his office, he shall deliver over to the official receiver, or, as the case may be, to the new trustee, all books kept by him, and all other books, documents, papers, and accounts in his possession relating to the office of trustee."

The bankrupt appeared in person in support of his appeal.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—We have read the appellant's affidavit. It appears to raise questions of perjury which cannot be gone into here. When one looks at the Act of Parliament and the rules, it is manifest that the appellant has no right to inspect the record book, and that is the only matter before us; we cannot go into any of the circumstances. If the appellant wishes to inspect the records of the court he can apply for office copies under rule 16.

ROMER and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ASHTON GAS CO. (a.)

Company—Gas company—Statutory maximum dividend—Payment free of income tax.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Income tax payable by a company is payable out of its profits and is part of the profits. Where, therefore, a company is precluded from dividing its profits among its shareholders in excess of a statutory maximum rate, it cannot pay a dividend at that rate free of income tax.

Decision of Buckley, J. (52 W. R. 347), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported 52 W. R. 347).

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the court below, and the following short statement is sufficient for the purposes of this report:

The action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Corporation of Ashton-under-Lyne, and by that corporation (the corporation being large consumers of the company's gas, and interested with other consumers in the price of gas in the borough being reduced), for "a declaration that, according to the true construction of the Ashton Gas Acts, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. cci.) and 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. clxxxvi.), and in particular of sections 16 and 17 of the Act of 1877, the profits divisible in any year among the shareholders of the company ought to be calculated as inclusive and not exclusive of the amount payable for that year in respect of income tax on the profits to be divided."

By section 16 of the Act of 1877, "Except as in this Act provided, the profits of the company to be divided among the shareholders in any year shall not exceed the rate of £10 per cent. per annum (which rate is in this Act referred to as the 'standard rate of dividend') on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorized by Parliament and paid up."

By section 17, "The standard price to be charged by the company for gas supplied by them shall be 3s. 8d. per 1,000 cubic feet. Provided that the company may increase or diminish such standard price subject to a decrease or increase in the standard rate of dividend as defined by this Act, to be calculated as follows: For every penny charged in excess or in diminution of such standard price in any year the standard rate of dividend shall for such year be reduced or increased by 5s. in the £100 per annum."

Buckley, J., came to the conclusion that the dividend to be paid to the shareholders ought to be calculated as including the income-tax payable in respect thereof.

The gas company appealed.

Haldane, K.C., and Cann, for the appellants.

Danckwerts, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The arguments used and cases cited on behalf of the appellants were similar to those used in the court below.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think the judgment of Buckley, J., is quite right. The matter depends, as he points out, upon sections 16 and 17 of the Ashton Gas Act, 1877. Section 16 says: "Except as in this Act provided the profits of the company to be divided among the shareholders in any year shall not exceed the rate of £10 per cent. per annum (which rate is in this Act referred to as the standard rate of dividend) on the ordinary share capital or stock of the company authorized by Parliament and paid up." Then section 17 is "The standard price to be charged by the company for gas supplied by them shall be 3s. 8d. per 1,000 cubic feet. Provided that the company may increase or diminish such standard price subject to a decrease or increase in the standard rate of dividend as defined by this Act, to be calculated as follows." Then it gives the rates.

The real question that we have to determine in this case is whether in estimating what has been paid as the standard rate of dividend, the income tax which has been paid by the gas company must be included as part of that which goes to make up the 10 per cent. standard rate of dividend. It really was not denied in argument that that which has to be divided amongst the shareholders is the profits of the company, and it is not denied that the income tax is part of the profits of the company, and not something to be deducted before you arrive at the profits. Buckley, J., puts that so plainly that I cannot add anything to it. He says: "A sum which is an expense which must be borne whether profits are earned or not must no doubt be deducted before arriving at profit. But a proportionate part of the profits payable to the Revenue is not a deduction before arriving at, but a part of the profits themselves. I refer to Lord Blackburne's judgment in Last v. The London Assurance Corporation."

No doubt it is quite true to say that if you have regard to the provisions of the Finance Acts with reference to income tax under Schedule D, the income tax in a case like this is assessed on the profits of the company, but still the fact that it is so, and that that is the mode of collecting the income tax, in no way negatives the proposition that the company is paying the income tax on behalf of the shareholders amongst whom the profits, as I have pointed out, after payment of income tax are distributed.

One or two suggestions have been made against this conclusion. Buckley, J., has pointed out that not only was there nothing outside the provisions of the Act preventing the company in such a case from deducting the rateable proportion of the income tax from the dividend paid to each shareholder, but he goes on to say that section 54 of the Act of 1842 makes a positive provision to that effect. I did not understand counsel for the appellant to deny that if you take section 54 by itself there are not included amongst the persons who are to allow the deduction members who are receiving the dividend, and Buckley, J., goes on, after pointing out that that is so, to deal with the provisions of section 60, the third clause of which was much relied on by counsel for the appellant, and he comes to the conclusion that there is nothing in that third clause which is inconsistent with the application of section 54. The thing that was relied on by counsel as entitling him to deal with section 60 as if it created a special code distinct from the provisions in section 54 was that in the enumeration of the persons who were to allow the reduction you had persons who had no interest in the profits of the company whatsoever, or persons who might have no interest—that is to say, creditors—and that you do not find in that section words which you find in section 54, which are "persons," "corporations," or "companies," having "any share, right, or title, in or to such profits or gains." But Buckley, J., came to the conclusion, and I agree with him, that there is nothing in section 60, clause 3, which is inconsistent with the application of section 54 to the present case. Counsel for the appellants called the two sections 54 and 60, both of them, indemnity sections. I do not think that section 54 is an indemnity section in the same sense that section 60 is. I think it does apply to the present case, and that the shareholders are bound by it to allow this deduction, and it necessarily follows from that that the income tax which is paid by the company is income tax paid on behalf of the shareholders. But it is not necessary to rest upon section 54 as showing conclusively that the income tax is paid by the company on behalf of the shareholders or to rely even on the practice which the receipt put in shows to my mind conclusively. The certificate given by the officers of the company for the shareholder to use when he goes to ask for a repayment of amounts paid by him by way of income tax runs: "I hereby certify that income tax on the profits of the company of which this dividend forms a part has been or will be duly paid by me to the proper officer for the receipt of the taxes." That seems to me to be as plainly as possible a recognition that the money is to be paid on account of the shareholders. But, as I say, putting aside section 54 and putting aside the practice of this company, it still remains that there is nothing in the Act of Parliament which prohibits the company doing this—that is, prohibits the company treating the amount which they paid on account of income tax as paid on behalf of the shareholders. Under those circumstances it seems to me that by the general rule of law one ought so to treat the payments. The dividends are dividends on the profits, the sums paid for income tax are part of those profits, and it seems to me that apart, therefore, from any special provision in the special Act, and apart from any practice which may have existed, that if this came up as a new question immediately after the Act of Parliament had been passed one would equally have been justified in coming to the conclusion that the income tax was paid on behalf of the shareholders out of the profits. Under those circumstances I think that if the dividend is paid up to the full standard rate of 10 per cent. free of income tax the shareholders would be receiving more than the standard rate. I think, therefore, this appeal fails and ought to be dismissed with costs.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree with what my lord has said and with the judgment of Buckley, J. I will only add a very few words. I must say, speaking for myself, that the case appears to me to be a reasonably clear one on principle. If such a company as we have to deal with pays income tax on its profits, that income tax, as has been pointed out, is payable out of the profits, and is part of the profits, and if the profits after deducting the income tax have subsequently to be distributed among the members of the company, that income tax is not payable again by those members so far as they receive their share of the profits, because the income tax is to be taken as having been paid out of their profits and on their behalf. If, for example, a company such as this had preference shareholders as well as ordinary shareholders, and the preference shareholders were only entitled to receive out of the profits a fixed sum, say 5 per cent., then where income tax is paid by the company out of its profits it must be treated as paid in respect of so much of the profits going to the preference shareholders in respect of their 5 per cent., and, according to my mind, it is clear on principle in such a case that the preference shareholders would have to have deducted from the dividend warrants payable to them the income tax on the 5 per cent. which had been previously paid on their behalf by the company. The same principle of course applies to the shareholders in the present case, who are restricted by the provision of the Act so that they are only to share a limited amount of the profits. Section 16 of the special Act in this case makes perfectly clear what I should otherwise have gathered even without that section, that what the members of the company in respect of their maximum dividend are to receive is clearly so much of the profits of the company. Section 16 says that the profits of the company to be divided amongst the shareholders in any year shall not exceed a rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and so forth. That shows that what the shareholders have to receive are, in any point of view, profits. On those profits which they receive they would have had to pay income tax directly themselves if it had not been paid by the company. As a matter of fact the tax has been paid by the company, and therefore in that respect the shareholders are free from the obligation of paying income tax on the portion of their profits which they have received by reason of the payment in respect of those profits by the company generally. It appears to me that that simple view really decides this question, and I am clearly of opinion that the appeal entirely fails.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I so entirely agree with every word of the judgment of Buckley, J., as well as what has fallen from my lord and Romer, L.J., that I do not think I ought to add anything on my own behalf.

In re HOARE & CO. (LIMITED AND REDUCED) AND In re COMPANIES ACTS, 1867 AND 1877. (a.)

Company—Reduction of capital—Deterioration in value of securities and assets—Reserve account—Proposed scheme—Part of preferred and deferred ordinary shares to be written off, and part also of the reserve account—Sanction of court—Jurisdiction—Discretion—Practice—Companies Acts, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 13) and 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.

The directors of a brewery company, incorporated as a limited company, acting under powers in that behalf contained in the articles, had for many years reserved, out of the profits of the company which they might have distributed in dividends, a reserve account, the amount of which, however, they did not keep separately invested, but treated as general assets of the company to be dealt with in the ordinary course of business; and this system of procedure was authorized by the articles. The company afterwards incurred a loss owing to depreciation in the value of its tied public-houses. The company thereupon resolved to reduce the share capital, and applied to the court to sanction, under the Companies Act, 1877, a scheme for reduction of capital, whereby the company proposed to attribute the loss, between the reserve account and the capital account, though not in rateable proportions; the reserve account (although a small part of it was to be still retained) being debited with more than its rateable proportion of the loss, and the capital account with less than its rateable proportion of the loss.

Held, that the court had jurisdiction to, and would, sanction such scheme.

Decision of Buckley, J., reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., refusing to sanction a scheme for the reduction of the capital of the company, which it was alleged was necessary by reason of the profits of the company having greatly decreased, partly owing to the very heavy writings down for bad and doubtful debts incurred in consequence of the very heavy fall in the value of licensed property, and for depreciation in value of such securities and loss.

(a.) Reported by A. R. TAYLOUR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts were as follows:

Hoare & Co. (Limited) was incorporated in the year 1894 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, as a limited company, the registered offices of which were by the memorandum of association of the company situated in England. The object of the company was to carry on the businesses of brewers, maltsters, and hop merchants, and other businesses connected with brewing and breweries, also to lend or advance money to such parties and on such terms as might seem expedient, and in particular to customers of and persons having dealings with the company, and other objects set forth in the memorandum of association.

The original capital of the company was by the memorandum and articles of association fixed at £1,000,000, divided into 60,000 preference shares of £10 each, 36,000 preferred ordinary shares of £10 each, and £4,000 deferred ordinary shares of £10 each.

Clause 12 of the articles of association provided as follows: "The 60,000 preference shares shall confer the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up thereon, and shall rank both as to dividend and capital in priority to all other shares in the capital; nevertheless the company may at any time, as provided by clause 50 hereof, with the sanction of a general meeting, create and issue 20,000 additional preference shares of £10 each ranking in all respects pari passu with the said 60 000 preference shares. . . . The said 36,000 preferred ordinary shares shall confer the right to a fixed cumulative dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the amounts for the time being paid up or credited as paid up thereon and shall rank both as regards dividend and capital in priority to the said deferred ordinary shares. The surplus profits from time to time available for dividend shall be applicable to the payment of dividend on the said deferred ordinary shares as hereinafter provided."

The rights in winding up were defined in clause 161 of the company's articles of association in the following terms: "In the event of a winding up, the surplus assets shall be applied (i.) In paying off the capital paid up on the preference shares at £120 per cent. and any arrears of dividend to the time of such payment; (ii.) in paying off the capital paid upon the preferred ordinary shares at £100 per cent., and any arrears of dividend to the time of such payment; and (iii.) the surplus shall belong to the holders of the deferred ordinary shares in proportion to the number of such shares held by them respectively." Provision was made in paragraph 8 of clause 119 for a reserve fund, whereby certain powers were conferred on the company's directors, and amongst other powers a power in the following terms: "(8) Before recommending any dividend to set aside out of the profits of the company such sums as they think proper as a reserve fund to meet contingencies or for equalizing dividends, or for repairing, improving, and maintaining any of the property of the company, and for other purposes as the directors shall in their absolute discretion think conducive to the interests of the company and (subject to clause 4 hereof) to invest the several sums so set aside upon such investments as they may think fit, and from time to time deal with and vary such investments and dispose of all or any part thereof for the benefit of the company; and to divide the reserve fund into such special funds as they think fit, and to employ the reserve fund or any part thereof in the business of the company and that without being bound to keep the same separate from the other assets."

In May, 1896, the capital of the company was, by a resolution of a general meeting of the company, increased to £1,200,000 by the creation of 20,000 new 5 per cent. cumulative preference shares of £10 each, to rank in all respects pari passu with the then existing preference shares.

In June, 1897, the capital of the company was further increased to £1,950,000 by the creation of 7,500 new shares of £10 each, to be called A cumulative preference shares, and in regard thereto it was resolved that the following provisions should have effect: (i.) "The said new shares shall carry a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the capital for the time being paid up thereon. . . . (ii.) The said new preference shares shall rank for dividend next after the 80,000 existing preference shares and in priority to the ordinary shares for the time being of the company, whether preferred ordinary or deferred ordinary. (iii.) The said new preference shares shall in a winding up be entitled to rank as regards repayment of capital next after the 80,000 existing preference shares and in priority to the ordinary shares, whether preferred ordinary or deferred ordinary, but the said new preference shares shall not be entitled to any further participation in surplus assets."

All the company's shares had been issued and fully paid up. Since its incorporation the company had out of profits paid considerable dividends, and it had built up, pursuant to paragraph 8 of clause 119 of its articles of association, a reserve fund of £292,612 18s. 1d., made up of the following items: (1) Premiums received for leases, £48,737 18s. 1d.; (2) premiums received on issue of preference shares, £252,000; (3) general reserve fund, £50,000; total on the last two items, £302,000; but less dividends paid to October 7th, 1903, viz.: Preference shares £30,000, "A" preference shares £28,125, equals £58,125. A sum of £292,612 was thus arrived at. The general reserve fund consisted of undistributed profits, which had accumulated since 1896. In addition to the above, £2,365 17s. 8d., part of the profits for the year ending the 7th of January, 1903, and £29,116 19s. 11d., the profits for the twelve months ending the 7th of January, 1904, had not been distributed. The assets of the company consisted to a large extent of tied public-houses, both freehold and leasehold, and loans advanced on the security of public-houses. It appeared from the balance-sheets of the company (copies of which were set forth in an affidavit of A. L. Wigan, one of the directors of the above-named company) that for some time past the profits of the brewery had gradually decreased, and there had been a long and continuous fall in the value of assets of this description. The company, therefore, had their breweries, licensed houses, &c., valued by experts, and in the result it was ascertained that such assets show a net depreciation of £591,707 13s. 10d., and that capital of that amount had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets. No appreciation of any other of the company's assets had occurred in any way to compensate for such loss. In the affidavits of one of the firms of experts on tied houses and loans thereon, and the said A. L. Wigan, it was deposed that to the best of their judgment and belief the loss was a permanent and not merely a temporary one. Advice of counsel was then taken, and as a result several meetings were held of the preference and A preference shareholders, and an extraordinary general meeting of the company was held, when it was determined by the directors that it was advisable in the interest of the company and of all the shareholders to deal with the loss as follows: '(i.) £396 000 to be written off by extinguishing a corresponding amount of the preferred ordinary shares and of the deferred ordinary shares; (ii.) £195,707 13s. 10d. to be met by writing off the like amount part of the reserve funds of the company." The whole of the preferred ordinary and deferred ordinary shares were held by four shareholders. Clause 53 of the company's articles of association provided that the company might from time to time by special resolution reduce the capital by paying off capital or cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets, or reducing the liability on the shares or otherwise as might seem expedient. By special resolution of the company unanimously passed and confirmed at these meetings it was resolved that the capital of the company be reduced to £1,554,000, and that such reduction be effected by cancelling the whole of the preferred ordinary shares and the capital paid up thereon as being capital lost or unrepresented by available assets, and by cancelling the sum of £9 per share in respect of each of the deferred ordinary shares as being capital lost or unrepresented by available assets and by reducing the nominal amount of such deferred ordinary shares to £1 per share, and also for altering the articles of association by making the same accord with the altered capital. This was unanimously agreed to by the preference and A preference shareholders. The form of the minute proposed to be registered was as follows: "The capital of Hoare & Co. (Limited) is £1,554,000, divided into 80,000 preference shares of £10 each, 7,500 A cumulative preference shares of £10 each, and 4,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, instead of the former capital of £1,950,000, divided into 80,000 preference shares of £10 and 7,500 A cumulative preference shares of £10 each, and 36,000 preferred ordinary shares of £10 each, and £4,000 deferred ordinary shares of £10 each."

The company presented a petition to the court, praying for the reduction of its capital on the terms and conditions set out above, and also that the words "and reduced" to the company's name might be dispensed with altogether.

Buckley, J., after stating that in his opinion the court could not sanction a reduction on the terms proposed, held that the decision of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., in In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 846, 49 W. R. Dig. 24 (and which went to the Court of Appeal, where the point was not touched on: 50 W. R. 71, [1901] 2 Ch. 746), was on an exactly similar point, and he agreed with the learned Lord Justice that sums of this kind, i.e., the reserve fund, must be taken into consideration in order to find out the loss. He accordingly refused to sanction the scheme and dismissed the petition.

The company appealed.

Neville, K.C., Eve, K.C., and Martelli, for the company.—The question is whether the Legislature has determined the matter and said that the capital could not be reduced unless the reserve fund was used. [ROMER, L.J.—The question is whether the loss ought to be distributed rateably between the reserve fund and the capital.] The learned judge said that so long as the company had assets available they could not reduce. [ROMER, L.J.—I do not think this is a question under the Act of 1877 at all, for the purposes of the Act as far as the reserve fund is concerned, the Act has nothing to do; for reserve fund is not capital, it is the balance only that must suffer loss.] [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The real difficulty depends on the application of the fund.] Here the shareholders elected to reserve a part of the profits they might have divided, and they handed it over to the company. [ROMER, L.J.—Has there been any loss in trading?—No. Then it is all capital loss?—Yes.] Evidence was produced showing the resolutions, and the fact that every shareholder had been consulted and consented to the scheme.

They referred to In re Hæmatite Steel Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 846, 49 W. R. Dig. 24, 50 W. R. 71, [1901] 2 Ch. 746; In re Direct Spanish Telegraph Co., 35 W. R. 209, 34 Ch. D. 307.

ROMER, L.J.—The only question which we have to consider in this case is one of principle, or it may be called one of law—viz., whether the court has jurisdiction in such circumstances as arise here to sanction this scheme for the reduction of capital owing to the loss that has occurred on capital account. I think we have. The question arises in a case where there was a reserve fund properly set apart by the company under the provisions of its articles. Now, that reserve fund was one which was properly created—that is to say, it was a fund which at the time it was created arose from the fact that there were available assets, after deducting all liabilities of every kind, including the amount which is represented by the share capital, which might have been applied as the company thought fit without thereby doing any violence to the provisions of the Companies Acts, or to the articles of the company; in other words, the surplus which was carried to the reserve fund represented what might have been properly applied at the time, if the company had so thought fit, in paying further dividends to the shareholders, and no person could have complained if they had done so. It was therefore a reserve fund properly created, and that reserve fund could have been dealt with by the company in accordance with the provisions of its articles if they thought fit. They might have utilized it in payment of or in equalizing subsequent dividends, or if they had chosen they might have applied it in making good lost capital, or have applied it to any purpose they thought fit within the objects of the company. That was the condition of the reserve fund, and the circumstances under which it was created. Now what does such a fund as that represent? To my mind it in no wise represents the capital account properly so called. Let me test it in this way. In this case the company might, if they had thought fit, have taken assets and set them apart to represent the reserve fund, and might have kept those assets wholly apart from all the other accounts of the company. They might have kept the assets representing the reserve fund strictly to answer that reserve fund, and not have dealt with them in any way as part of the general assets of the company. So long as they did that, it is clear to my mind that the assets representing the reserve fund could not be properly called in itself a capital account or a capital asset. But in this case the company did what they had power to do, and what is often done in similar cases—namely, they did not set apart special assets to represent the reserve fund, but they allowed the matter to rest in account, and the assets generally to be dealt with by the company in the ordinary way of business, whether those assets might be said so far to represent the reserve fund, or whether they represented the capital account and the other liabilities of the company. Now, what happened in that state of things was this. After some subsequent trading it was found that there was a great loss of assets, so great that after taking the liabilities properly so called of the company apart from the reserve fund and the capital account, there was insufficient to pay the reserve fund and to meet the capital liability. In that case, what ought to be done with regard to the loss? Ought it to be attributed wholly to the capital account or wholly to the reserve fund, or ought it to be treated as apportioned? In my opinion, under the circumstances of the case, the loss ought to be treated as apportioned between the reserve fund and the capital account properly so called—that is, the share capital. In the present case the company propose to do more than that. They propose to attribute more than its due proportion of the loss of assets to the reserve fund than they do to the capital account. In my opinion that was a matter they were not absolutely bound to have done, but certainly they had a right to do, and so far, I think, no complaint can be made of their not wiping out the whole of the reserve fund, but treating a certain part of the assets as representing the reserve fund as written down by them. That leaves a certain amount of assets to represent the share capital after deducting the ordinary liabilities of the company—that is to say, the current debts, and the debenture stocks and so forth. Then, when we see what assets there are to meet the share capital, it is clear there has been a great loss of the capital, and accordingly we are asked under the Acts of Parliament to sanction a scheme for the reduction of the share capital. In my opinion the court has undoubted jurisdiction to deal with a scheme so framed, and to sanction it if it thinks fit. I quite agree that the court is not bound in such a case as this to sanction the scheme. I can well understand cases in which the court will say: "No, we will not sanction any reduction of the capital so long as you keep anything by way of reserve fund." I can conceive circumstances under which the court might justly say: "This is a case where we think no reserve fund ought to be allowed to remain, and we will not sanction the scheme in so far as any reserve fund is allowed to remain." But the court undoubtedly, to my mind, has jurisdiction to sanction such a scheme, whereby a proper part, as indicated previously by me, of the reserve fund is allowed to exist, and in the circumstances of this case I think the court ought to allow the small proportion of the reserve fund, which according to the scheme is provided for, to remain as a reserve fund. I think, therefore, that in this case not only has the court jurisdiction to sanction the scheme, but that under the circumstances it ought to do so. I may only add that in this case there is no question as to the rights of creditors, and it is a case where all the shareholders are unanimous in approving of the scheme. Under these circumstances I think the court ought to approve of the scheme.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am inclined to think that that is right. I asked Romer, L.J., to deliver judgment first because in a matter of this sort I knew that he would put it much more clearly than I could myself, but at the same time I consider it my duty to state for myself the principles upon which I understand we are acting in the present case.

Now, the particular statute under which we are acting is the Companies Act of 1877, and we have to see, before we can sanction the reduction of capital, whether the case comes within the words of the third section of this Act—that is to say, whether there is any lost capital, or any capital unrepresented by available assets. I regard those two things as alternatives, and not as if the latter were exegetical. We have to see whether there is any lost capital, and to what extent. The difficulty which Buckley, J., had in this case was that he was not satisfied that there was lost capital to the extent which was alleged in the petition, and his doubt arose from the existence of this reserve; I do not use the words "reserve fund" because it is not true in fact to say that there was any reserve fund at all. If there had been any reserve fund in this case, and if the reserve fund was a fund which appropriated this sum which might be paid in dividends, but which the company did not think it prudent to distribute in dividends at the moment, but would retain in hand ready to distribute in dividends if they thought fit, unless the company by a proper resolution determined to do otherwise with it, I should have said that, under such circumstances, if you have a loss, as you have a loss in this case, by the reduction in market value of the tied houses, the whole of that loss was a loss which for the purpose of this statute as to reduction of capital ought to be written off capital properly so called entirely. We really have not to decide that in this case, because the facts do not raise such a case, but I do want to say before leaving that point that, as I understand it, however much capital you have lost at any given date, if your profit and loss account shows a profit balance, then to the extent of that profit balance you are entitled to distribute that money as dividend, notwithstanding the fact that you have lost capital which you have not replaced. Under those circumstances, so far as this undistributed money is to be considered, I think that even if it had arisen after the loss of capital, you could have appropriated it to the payment of dividend, and the whole of that loss then would be properly written off capital. When I heard counsel for the appellants argument the other day, I thought he was arguing upon that basis, and I quite expected a resolution to have been produced relating to the action of the board, showing that there had been some such appropriation. That is not the case here. What has been done is this. No fund has really been created. There has been no investment of this fund which might have been distributed as dividends at all. What has been done is exactly the same as if the balance of profit and loss—that is to say, the profit balance—had existed in sovereigns, and the directors had met together and had said: "We have such a sum that we could distribute, if we chose, now in dividends, but we think it wiser not to do so at present, and therefore we will carry this sum to a reserve." That is, to my mind, precisely the same as if they had said: "We will pour these sovereigns into the till." Now you have got those sovereigns in the till. It is not to my mind a true way of looking at those sovereigns to say: "Here is a fund consisting partly of these sovereigns and partly of the other items appearing upon the asset side of the balance-sheet, and we will treat the capital and the reserve as being two funds which are charged upon one security, that one security being the total of the assets, including therein all the asset side of the balance-sheet and the money which has been poured into the till." I do not think it would be right to regard the capital and that reserve fund as two funds charged upon one security. If it were so, and there was a loss, you get at the rateable proportion of the loss without any difficulty at all. Then, if you cannot do that, what is the proper thing to do? I suppose one has to say that, although the sum undistributed has not been segregated from the circulating capital, but has been poured into the till, nevertheless the power of the directors has not yet gone to do with the money as they may think best in the interests of the company. Supposing, for instance, there had been no scheme for reduction at all, what could the company have done? Could they have distributed this sum as a dividend? Theoretically I think they could. But ought they to do so? I think not. Then, as I understand, our conclusion in the present case is that what, as commercial men managing a commercial undertaking, ought to be done is to distribute the loss in proportion to the figures of the share capital and the reserve fund. As I understand from the figures in the present case, although that has not been done, the departure has only been in the sense of attributing too large a proportion of loss to the reserve fund and too small a proportion of loss to the share capital. Under these circumstances, there having been an undoubted loss of capital in this case, and as we think that loss has been properly allocated as a commercial matter between the share capital and the reserve fund, we may sanction this scheme.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree; but I wish to add a few words of my own. I think the leading idea of Buckley, J.'s, judgment was that you cannot reduce capital unless you find that the capital has been lost and is not represented by any fund, whether it is in the nature of capital or income. I cannot read the Act in that sense. I think if you prove that capital has been lost, you do not really want to consider whether it is unrepresented by available assets. Although capital may not be lost, it may still be unrepresented by available assets, and in that case there is power to reduce.

Some difficulty has been caused here by, what I agree with Vaughan Williams, L.J., in calling, the unhappy use of language by accountants. They will talk of "reserve fund" when there is no reserve fund. I think in this balance-sheet there is an exceptional degree of error. The reserve fund has been treated as though it were on the same footing as representing premiums received on leases. As I understand, that is an item that never could have been applied in payment of dividends. It is not part of the profits of the company. It was a capital item that never ought to have been treated on that footing at all. The other two items are items which really have been dealt with on the footing of article 119, sub-section 8, which says: [His lordship read a portion.] I do not read that clause in full. It authorizes the directors either to apply it for the equalization of dividends or for repairing, improving, and maintaining any of the property of the company, or in any other way conducive to the interests of the company, including, of course, the payment of debts and liabilities of the company. Then it goes on to say that the directors may "employ the reserve fund or any part thereof in the business of the company, and that without being compelled to keep the same separate from the other assets." We now know that that is exactly what has been done. I think we now know that the other items mentioned in this balance-sheet as part of the profits of the company, which might have been applied in payment of dividend, have never by any act of the directors or of the company been turned to any other capital purpose. That being so, these two large items being employed in the business of the company, and not kept separate from the company, we have to deal with a large loss—that is to say, the assets which represent, as I will call them, the next assets after payment of debts which represent the share capital and the reserve fund, are insufficient. How ought that to be dealt with? I adopt the view of Romer, L.J., on that point. I think that if the assets ought to represent both the share capital and the reserve fund, and they are not sufficient to do so, the proper course is to attribute the loss rateably between them; or, in other words, that we should not be justified in saying that a larger amount of capital has been lost than would be the result of working out the proportion in that manner. No doubt the whole of this reserve fund might have been applied to make good this loss of capital. The directors propose to take more than its proportionate share, but to leave what I may call a moderate reserve fund. That being so, it seems to me that we are entitled to say that it has been established in this present case that capital has been lost, and lost to the extent it is proposed to be written off by this order. I desire to say one word about the case of In re Barrow Hæmatite Steel Co., a decision of my own, which Buckley, J., referred to. In that case the reserve fund had not been taken into account at all. It was blended with the other assets, but not taken account of at all. I do not think that I meant to say more than that in considering the loss of capital you must have regard to the fact that the assets include a reserve fund, but not separately invested. If my language goes further than that, I certainly desire to qualify it in the sense I have now mentioned.

Scheme sanctioned and appeal allowed.

MERCER AND OTHERS v. DENNE. (a.)

Custom—Validity—Legal origin—Presumptions—Right of drying nets on seashore—Character of accreted land.

A custom affecting land is not bad for uncertainty because it is not invariable in every part, nor because the limits of the land affected by the custom are not defined more clearly than the limits of land comprised in a grant. So a custom is not unreasonable because it is prejudicial to the interests of a private individual if it is for the benefit of the commonwealth, for such benefit renders its lawful commencement reasonably probable; again, where the existence of a right for a long period has been proved, everything that is reasonably possible to be presumed in favour of that right should be presumed; and the party, seeking to defeat the right by reason of its inception within legal memory, has the onus of proving that it could not possibly have existed from time immemorial and have continued without interruption. Land accreted takes the character of the land to which it is added, and is subject to the same customs as affect such land: Thus, persons entitled by custom to dry nets on a piece of land adjoining the sea are, where gradual accretion has taken place, entitled to exercise that right on the land gained by accretion.

Action.

The plaintiffs were inhabitants of the parish of Walmer, and fishermen, the defendant being a landowner in the same parish. It was alleged in the statement of claim that there was in the parish of Walmer a piece of ground known as the "beach ground," which was covered with shingle, and was about eleven acres in extent, and was situate near the sea. It was further alleged that this beach ground had from time immemorial been open, and not enclosed, and that the inhabitants of Walmer who were fishermen were entitled by custom to dry their nets thereon by spreading their nets upon the surface thereof. The plaintiffs sought an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering in any way with the alleged custom. The defence was a denial of the custom and a plea that the alleged right was one only exercised by leave and license, and that for some considerable period the beach ground had not been suitable for drying nets on, that it was formed by gradual accretion, and was not any part of the foreshore, but that it formed part of some land of which the defendant was the owner and upon which it abutted, and the defendant claimed a right to build thereon or to use it as he thought fit.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

June 25.—FARWELL, J.—The plaintiffs claim a declaration that the inhabitants of Walmer carrying on the trade or business of fishermen are entitled as of right at all times necessary or proper for the purposes of their trade or business to spread and dry their nets on a piece of shingle or beach lying just above high-water mark between Walmer-place and Walmer Castle, and an injunction restraining the defendant from building on the premises so as to interfere with their right. The piece of land in question in this action is about 11 acres in extent, and is of little value except to the fishermen for drying their nets or to the defendant for building purposes—objects which are unfortunately inconsistent with one another. During the whole of living memory extending over upwards of seventy years in the case of the plaintiffs' witnesses (who were a body of honest and straightforward seafaring men, whose evidence appeared to me to be deserving of entire credit) and by reputation for many years before their birth, the inhabitants of the parish of Walmer who are fishermen have used this piece of ground for the purposes of drying their nets. The practice has varied somewhat during the last seventy years. There are three fisheries now practised at Walmer—the mackerel, the herring, and the sprat fisheries. The mackerel season is from May to July and in September and October, the herring fishery from October to Christmas, and the sprat fishery from November to March. Down to some thirty or thirty-five years ago herring nets and mackerel nets were cutched or tanned at the commencement of and in preparation for the fishery season, and were then spread out to dry on the piece of ground in question, and at the end of the season the boats were brought up close to this piece of ground and the nets were taken directly to it and spread out on it, or if the weather did not permit of that the nets were landed nearer the town and were then brought in carts to this piece of ground and spread out to dry before being put away for the winter, and this practice still remains with regard to the mackerel nets. Down to the same period the sprat nets were not spread on this piece of ground at all. About thirty or thirty-five years ago, the practice of oiling the herring nets instead of cutching them and of oiling the sprat nets came into use, and these nets were also spread on the same piece of ground to dry. The time required for drying after oiling is longer than was required for the earlier process, and sprat nets are now put on the land at a period during which no nets used to be put there so far as living memory goes. The fishermen have occasionally in former years dried their nets in different places along the beach, but this piece of ground in question is that which has always been used and to the extent of covering its whole area at times, and has been known to the fishermen and their forefathers and spoken of amongst them as their own ground. On these facts the plaintiffs claim to have established the existence of a custom for all inhabitants of Walmer being fishermen to dry their nets on this piece of ground at such periods as may from time to time be necessary for the due prosecution of their trade as fishermen according to the varying exigencies of the fishing industry and the requirements of improved nets. The defendant objects (1) that there is no reported case in which a custom for the fishermen of a parish to dry their nets on a particular piece of land has ever been decided, and that such a custom ought not now to be held good; and (2) that a custom for any variation from the ancient time or ancient kinds of nets is bad for uncertainty. I cannot find that the validity of a custom for the fishermen of a parish or town to dry their nets in a particular close has ever been expressly decided, but this is probably due to the fact that such validity has never been questioned. Although the case in the Year Book 8 Ed. 4, c. 18, which is translated by Holroyd, J., in Blundell v. Catterall, 5 B. & Ald. 295, is referred to as an authority on the point in several subsequent books, I think that the point was assumed, not decided, therein; and this is probably due to the fact stated by Professor Maitland in his admirable preface to the year-books now in course of publication by the Selden Society (vol. 17, p. xiv.), that the reports in year-books were "instructions for pleaders rather than the authoritative fixation of points of substantive law." The general law was announced, the point of interest to certain "sad and grave men" who reported what was the form of pleading. Thus Hale (de Portibus Maris, published by Mr. Hargrave in 1786), says at p. 86, "Look at the book of 8 Ed. 4, 18, for the custom of Kent, for fishermen to dry their nets upon the land, though it be the soil of private men," referring to the year-book as stating the existence of a well-known custom. In the case of Tanistry, Davis Rep. 78, it was stated at p. 89, by counsel as an instance of well known custom, "so to turn the plough on the headland of another in favour of husbandry and to dry nets on the land of another in favour of fishery and navigation." This passage is set out verbatim in Rolle's Abr., "Custom," F. 2) as a correct statement of the law. In Fitch v. Rawling, 2 H. Bl. 393, 398, Buller, J., in 1795, says: "With respect to the case Bro. Abr. Custom (pl. 46), where the custom was holden to be bad, not because it was for the fishermen of Kent to dry their nets on the plaintiff's land (which the case in Cro. Car. shows to be good), but either because the digging in the soil in order to pitch stakes to hang nets on was unnecessary or it tended to the disturbance of the inheritance." Here again I am unable to verify the reference, for Baker v. Brereman, Cro. Car. 418, appears to state only that inhabitants cannot prescribe for a profit à prendre in alieno solo "for fishermen to dry their nets for the public benefit or for easement," and I can find no other case in Cro. Car. on the subject. In Pain v. Patrick, 3 Mod. 289, the court, in holding that the custom in that case was well alleged, said (p. 294): "This may be as well alleged as a custom to turn a plough upon another man's land or for a fisherman to mend his nets there." In Bacon's Abr., "Custom," p. 566 (the first edition of which was published in 1736) this custom is given as good, "so a custom to dry nets upon the land of another; for this is in favour of fishing and navigation." I have failed to find the marginal reference which he gives as his authority—5 Co. 84—and which is also given by Tindal, C.J., in Lockwood v. Wood, 6 Q. B. 64, but the Lord Chief Justice treats the custom as of known validity in 1844. He says: "A custom which has existed from time immemorial without interruption within a certain place, and which is certain and reasonable in itself, obtains the force of a law and is in effect the common law within that place to which it extends, though contrary to the general law of the realm. . . . Thus a custom for all fishermen within a certain district to dry their nets upon the land of another might well be a good custom." In Tyson v. Smith, 9 A. & E. 421, the same Lord Chief Justice says: "Nor is a custom unreasonable because it is prejudicial to the interests of a private man, if it be for the benefit of the commonwealth, as the custom to turn the plough upon the headland of another in favour of husbandry or to dry nets on the land of another in favour of fishing and for the benefit of navigation." In Race v. Ward, 4 E. & B. 702, Lord Campbell, at p. 710, in speaking of the right of the inhabitants of a district by custom to go on the soil of another and take water, says that in 15 Ed. 4, 29 A., Catesby, J., treats it as good and likens it to a custom for all the fishermen, inhabitants in a particular vill, to dry their nets on a particular close. Although, therefore, I have failed to find any express decision, there are so many opinions in favour of the validity of the custom expressed by so many eminent lawyers that it would be impossible for me to disregard them, and on principle the custom is, in my opinion, good. A custom must be certain, reasonable in itself, commencing from time immemorial, and continued without interruption. It is not unreasonable because it is prejudicial to the interests of a private individual if it is for the benefit of the commonwealth, because such benefit renders its lawful commencement reasonably probable. As Lord Cranworth says in Salisbury v. Gladstone, 9 H. L. Cas. 301: "In truth, I believe that, when it is said that a custom is void because it is unreasonable, nothing more is meant than that the unreasonable character of the alleged custom conclusively proves that the usage, even though it may have existed immemorially, must have resulted from accident or indulgence and not from any right conferred in ancient times on the party setting up the custom." This has considerable bearing on Mr. Eve's argument that the custom alleged in this action is uncertain; his contention is, in effect, that the custom must be to dry nets not for the purposes of fishing generally, but at particular times and for particular fish. But this is to discard its kernel for its shell, and might result in making an arrangement that was in itself reasonable, because of public benefit, become actually injurious to public interests. If the fishermen of Walmer may dry their nets only on the condition of fishing for such fish and at such times and with such nets as the fishermen in the reign of Richard I. used, all improvements and progress are debarred. But there is neither authority nor principle for any such contention. A custom is not uncertain because it is not invariable in every part. Thus, a custom to pay a year's improved value for a fine on a copyhold is good, though the value is a thing uncertain, for the value may be at any time ascertained (Steph. Comm. 1, 66). Again, the very statement that a custom may be well laid in the inhabitants of a town shows that the number of persons entitled to enjoy it will vary from time to time. In Abbot v. Weekly, 1 Lev. 176, a custom for all the inhabitants of a vill to dance on the plaintiff's close at all times of the year was held good; and this was followed in Hall v. Nottingham, L. R. 1 Ex. D. 1, where it was held that a custom for the inhabitants of a parish to enter upon certain land of the plaintiff and erect a maypole thereon and dance round it and otherwise enjoy on the land any lawful and innocent recreation at any time of the year was held good. In Dyce v. Hay, 1 Macqueen, 312, Lord St. Leonards says that "there is no rule in the law of Scotland which prevents modern inventions and new operations from being governed by old and settled legal principles: Thus, when the art of bleaching came into use, there was nothing in its novelty which should exclude it from the benefit of a servitude or easement, if such servitude or easement on other legal grounds was maintainable. The category of servitudes and easements must alter and expand with the changes that take place in the circumstances of mankind. The law of this country, as well as the law of Scotland, frequently moulds its practical operation without doing any violence to its original principles. Mr. Upjohn, in his ingenious reply, pointed out that this is fully borne out by the case of Fitch v. Rawling, 2 H. Bl. 393, where a custom for all the inhabitants of a parish to play at all kinds of lawful games, sports, and pastimes in the close of A. at all seasonable times of the year was held to justify the defendants in playing cricket there, although it was reasonably certain that cricket was unknown until long after the time of Richard I. (see Strutt's Pastimes, ed. 1801, pp. 83-4), and that, if it came within the description of any of the newly imagined games in the reign of Edward IV., it was made illegal by the Act of 17 Ed. 4, c. 3, which was not repealed until the reign of Henry VIII. It is clear from that Act, and the Act of 12 Richard 2, c. 6, that the number and nature of the games that were lawful varied from time to time, but it has never yet been suggested that such variations rendered the custom to play all lawful games void for uncertainty, and I can see no reason for holding that a custom to dry nets at all times seasonable for fishing is bad, although the periods and numbers and sorts of nets may vary. During the trial the defendant desired to set up a plea that the beach in question, or a great part of it, had come into existence of late years and to contend that it followed therefrom that no custom to dry nets thereon could have existed for the requisite period. I accordingly allowed the trial to stand over, and gave both parties liberty to amend and to adduce further evidence. With regard to the plaintiffs' amendments, I am bound by and follow Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming, 19 C. B. N. S. 687, and Mounsey v. Ismay, 3 H. & C. 486. The defendant has amended by adding these allegations: "In and prior to the year 1799, and for many years subsequent thereto, the beach ground was below high-water mark, and subject to the flux and reflux of the tide, and until comparatively recent years was wholly unsuitable, and in fact incapable, of being used for the purposes alleged by the plaintiffs, and was formed by gradual accretion and the receding of the sea, and is now above high-water mark and does not now form any part of the seashore or foreshore," and I have had a considerable amount of evidence relating thereto. I have rejected a number of plans as inadmissible; but, as I was told that the case was likely to go to the Court of Appeal, I have taken evidence concerning them as though I had not excluded them, and I can only say that if I had not rejected them as inadmissible, I should have discarded them as worthless. I find the facts to be as follows: The beach in question is a ridge, which from time immemorial has acted as a barrier against the sea for the protection of the land behind it. That land is so low and level that but for the beach it must have been submerged, but it has never been so during historic times. This appears by the nature of the subsoil, as proved by the contractor, who excavated part of it to a depth of five feet in making sewers, and by the discovery of a Roman-British burying-place in the grounds of Walmer Lodge. I find also that the coast in this neighbourhood has, for the last century at any rate, been subject to fluctuations by way of increase by accretion and of decrease by demolition owing to the action of the winds. When the prevailing wind blows on shore for a cycle of years, the process of accretion goes on, but the prevailing winds alternate over long series of years, and consequently the actual line of high water varies according to the duration of such prevailing winds and their aggregate action. The actual ascertainment with certainty of high-water mark at a given date is a matter of difficulty and time, and cannot be effected by a mere survey. No ancient plans or maps can be relied on as showing high-water mark, and no charts prior to 1795. The two charts which have been put in are Spencer's of 1795 and Bullock's of 1844, both of which are trustworthy. Adopting these two charts, I find that in 1795 high-water mark was approximately in the same place as at present, that in 1844 the sea had advanced fifty or sixty yards, and that at the present time this amount of beach has been regained. The defendant has therefore proved that in 1844 a considerable portion of the beach in question (say, three acres) was below high-water mark and was, therefore, inappropriate for drying nets, and he argues that he has thereby shown that to the extent of that portion the custom must have commenced since the time of Richard I. A defendant may no doubt defeat a custom by showing that it could not have existed in the time of Richard I., but he must demonstrate its impossibility, and the onus is on him to do so if the existence of the custom has been proved for a long period, as was done, for instance, in Simpson v. Wells, L. R. 7 Q. B. 214, 20 W. R. Dig. 27, where the claim of a custom to set up stalls at the statute sessions for the hiring of servants was defeated by showing that such sessions were introduced by the Statutes of Labourers, the first of which was in the reign of Edward III. But no such impossibility is shown in the present case. If the beach was of its present extent in 1795, why am I bound to infer that it cannot have been the same in 1186 from the mere fact that between 1795 and 1844 the extent diminished and has since again increased? The mere non-user during the period that the sea flowed over the spot is immaterial, for it was no interruption of the right, but only of the possession, and "an interruption of possession only for ten or twenty years will not destroy the custom: 1 Bl Comm. 77; Co. Litt. 114*b*. Not only ought the courts to be slow to draw an inference of fact which would defeat a right that has been exercised during so long a period as the present unless such inference is irresistible, but it ought to presume everything that it is reasonably possible to presume in favour of such a right: see Goodman v. Corporation of Saltash, 31 W. R. 293, 7 App. Cas. 633. I see no reason why I should not presume that this beach was in substantially the same state in 1186 as now. The inland limit is fixed by geological considerations and the Romano-British burying-place; in the reign of Henry VIII. the Castle of Walmer was built as a defence for the coast; it must have been near but safely above high-water limit; and I see no reason from which I can necessarily infer any substantial difference in this piece of beach in 1186. It was next argued that the variations in the beach shown by the two maps of 1795 and 1844 and the present state of things render it impossible to define with sufficient certainty the land affected by the custom, and therefore render the custom bad for uncertainty. But it cannot be necessary to define the limits of land affected by a custom more clearly than those of land comprised in a grant; for this purpose I think that the same principle must apply, the difference between custom and prescription being only that the right to the former must be claimed by or in respect of a locality, and to the latter by a person or corporation, but the rules affecting the subject-matter are in each case the same, and I have no doubt that a grant of land which in fact adjoins the sea would be well defined by reference to high-water mark as one of its boundaries. It is said that it is uncertain whether this means high water as it was in 1186 or high water now, but I have evidence of usage and that the nets have been spread down to high-water mark for the time being. This is quite sufficient. Then it is said that it is unreasonable, because the sea may recede for a mile or more, as at Sandwich, and it is impossible to suppose that any such extent of ground could ever have been intended to be appropriated to such a custom. It is enough for me to say that as the event has not happened for upwards of 700 years I cannot see the unreasonableness. The period for ascertaining whether a custom is reasonable or not is its inception. The point is dealt with by Tindal, C.J., in 9 A. & E. 423: "But it is said that the number of these victuallers may be so large and the space occupied by each so great as that the whole portion of the common set out for the fair may be taken by them in exclusion of the rest. . . . But it is obvious that this is not an argument against the custom being reasonable in its commencement, or against the prescription of the fair being a reasonable prescription. It is an objection only as to the mode of exercising the right so claimed, whether under the custom or the prescription." I say in this case, as Lord Cranworth said in Salisbury v. Gladstone, "I find it impossible to say that such a custom as that here alleged might not have resulted from an agreement between the lord and his tenant before the time of living memory." But the plaintiffs have raised this further and interesting point—that, inasmuch as both sides agree that these three acres have arisen by small and imperceptible degrees these added acres are an accretion to the defendant's land and became subject to the same custom to which the land to which they were added was subject. There is no authority exactly in point, but I have come to the conclusion on principle and on the authority of an analogous case that this contention is well founded. Blackstone Comm. 2, p. 262, states the law to be that, "if the gain be by little and little, by small and imperceptible degrees, it shall go to the owner of the land adjoining. For de minimis non curat lex, and besides these owners being often losers by the breaking in of the sea or at charges to keep it out, this possible gain is therefore a reciprocal consideration for such possible charge or loss." In Attorney-General v. Chambers, 4 D & J. 68, Lord Chelmsford quotes this passage and proceeds: "I am not quite satisfied that the principle de minimis non curat lex is the correct explanation of the rule on this subject, because, although the additions may be small and insignificant in their progress, yet after a lapse of time, by little and little, a very large increase may have taken place which it would not be beneath the law to notice, and if the party who has the right to it can clearly show that it formerly belonged to him he ought not to be deprived. I am rather disposed to adopt the reason assigned for the rule by Alderson B., in the case of The Hull and Selby Railway Co., 5 M. & W. 327, viz.—'That which cannot be perceived in its progress is taken to be as if it never had existed at all.' And as Lord Abinger said in the same case, 'The principle as to gradual accretion is founded on the necessity which exists for some such rule of law for the permanent protection and adjustment of property.' It must always be borne in mind that the owner of lands does not derive benefit alone, but may suffer loss from the operation of this rule, for if the sea gradually steals upon the land he loses so much of his property, which is thus silently transferred by the law to the proprietor of the seashore." This reasoning applies with equal force to the persons entitled to exercise rights over a piece of land adjoining the sea. If it is washed away their rights are gone. If it increases, their rights ought to extend over the increased area. It is said that it would be absurd to apply this to a case where the sea has receded for a mile or more; but that is not this case. It is sufficient for me to say (following Alderson,

B.) that this accretion is to be treated as though it had occurred in 1186. If there was now a mile or more of such accretion, it would hardly be possible to find evidence of actual user over more than the fringe near the sea, and the extent of the custom could be limited by such user; or, even if any such user could be shown, the landowner's right of free enjoyment would only be limited by a reasonable exercise of customary rights, or it would probably be held unreasonable to insist on drying nets over a large tract of land. Further, I have the authority of the analogous case of Foster v. Wright, 4 C. P. D. 438, 28 W. R. Dig. 94. In that case the River Lune had gradually changed its bed. The plaintiff had a free fishery in the ancient river. The defendant owned lands which originally did not abut on the river, but had, by means of the alteration in the river bed, become the river bank. The question was whether the plaintiff's exclusive right of fishing extended over so much of the water as flowed over land which was identified as formerly part of the defendant's property, and it was held that it did. Lindley, J., at p. 448, said, "I am wholly unable to see upon what principle a change in the course of a river, so gradual that it cannot be perceived until after the lapse of a long interval of time, can affect the rights of those entitled to use it, whether for fishing or any other purpose; nor is there any authority for holding them to be affected thereby." And Lord Coleridge held that the plaintiff was entitled to a several fishery, and said, p. 449, "And such a fishery, I think, would follow the slow and gradual changes of a river, such as the changes of the Lune in this case." Further, the opinion of text-writers, dealing with the analagous cases of accretion to copyholds and wastes of manors, are to the same effect. Thus, Hall on the Sea Shore, p. 113; p. 789 of Mr. Stuart Moore's edition, concludes that the land which has accreted to the lord as freehold must be subject to the copyhold interest of the tenant of the land to which it has been added, or, if waste, to the local customs, commons, &c., prescribed for by the tenants in respect of such waste. Mr. Phear (Rights of Water, p. 43*n*) conjectures that "the land which gradual accretion gives to adjoining lands assumes their character—i.e., becomes freehold or copyhold—and in the latter case waste or tenanted accordingly." I hold, therefore, that the land which has been added by accretion takes the character of the land to which it has been added, and is subject to the same customs as affected such land. The result is that the plaintiffs succeed, and I grant the injunction as asked. The defendant must pay the costs of the action.

Practice — Costs — Taxation—Bill paid by executor—Application for taxation by creditor of testator—"Party interested"—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 39.

A creditor of a deceased person, out of whose personal estate an executor has paid, or is liable to pay, a bill of costs, is entitled to obtain taxation of such bill.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application under the Solicitors Act 1843, for the delivery and taxation of certain bills of costs.

Eliza Walters died on the 15th of November, 1902, having by her will, dated the 7th of June, 1886, appointed her husband, William Alfred Walters, sole executor. The will was proved on the 13th of December, 1902, by the said William Alfred Walters, who was then, and had been since 1885, an undischarged bankrupt.

The respondents to the present summons, Messrs. Roberts-Jones & Everett, acted for the executor in obtaining probate of the will, in the administration of the estate, and in the action next hereinafter mentioned.

On the 8th of May, 1903, the applicant, Henry Frazer, one of the creditors of the deceased, commenced an action against the executor for the administration of the estate.

On the 10th of July, 1903, a receiver was appointed in the action, and on the 25th of July, 1903, judgment for administration was pronounced.

In October, 1903, the defendant filed his accounts as executor in the administration proceedings. In his accounts of the disbursements allowances and payments made by him on account of the testatrix's funeral expenses end personal estate were three items mentioned as having been paid to the respondents, viz., (a) £98 11s. 10d., paid in December, 1902, for estate duty; (b) £93 13s. 8d., paid in April, 1903, for the costs of an attempted sale; and (c) £24 10s., paid in April, 1903, for the costs of conveyance of property.

On the vouching of these accounts, these items were referred to a master for taxation. The defendants failed to produce the bills of costs, and it subsequently appeared that none had been rendered.

On the 26th of November, 1903, the respondents informed the plaintiff's solicitors that they were no longer acting in the administration action. Their names, however, still, appear on the record as solicitors for the defendant.

The plaintiffs made several ineffectual attempts to obtain copies of the bills from the respondents. Under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that the defendant had in the meantime again been adjudicated bankrupt, the applicant, on the 23rd of April, 1904, obtained leave to issue the present summons.

The summons asked for the taxation of the bill of £93 13s. 8d. and for the delivery of the three bills of costs.

In an affidavit filed on behalf of the respondents it was stated that there had been an agreement in writing between the defendant and the respondents as to the amount of the costs, and that the sums in question had been paid more than twelve months before.

This point was not relied on at the hearing of the summons, and the only question argued was whether the applicant, as a creditor of the deceased, was a party interested under section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and as such entitled to tax the bills.

Peterson, for the applicant.—The respondents admit that they have received the amounts of these items, but there can be no "payment" under the Act, until bills of costs have been delivered: In re Street, 10 Eq. 165; In re Stogdon, 56 L. T. 355. A creditor of a deceased person, out of whose estate an executor has paid, or is entitled to pay, a bill of costs, is a "party interested in the property" within section 39, and as such is entitled to taxation. The reason is that he has rights against the property of the deceased. There is, however, no direct decision on the point. In In re Blackmore, 13 Beav. 154, 161, it was held that a residuary legatee was entitled to taxation under section 38 as being a party liable to pay. In In re Leadbitter, 27 W. R. 267, 10 Ch. D. 388, it was held that a bankrupt who has obtained his discharge, and who has become entitled to the surplus of his estate, all his creditors having been paid in full, is not entitled under section 39 to obtain the taxation of a bill of costs paid by his trustee in bankruptcy. The ground of that decision was that at the moment of payment the trustee in bankruptcy was not a trustee for the bankrupt. Thesiger, L.J., at p. 392, said that it was not necessary to determine exhaustively to what cases section 39 extends. The delivery of the three bills, apart from taxation, the applicant is entitled to obtain under section 40: Duffet v. McEvoy, 10 A. C. 300, 33 W. R. Dig. 238; In re Baylis, 44 W. R. 533, [1896] 2 Ch. 107.

Bailhache, for the respondents.—Apart from section 39 a third party, who is not liable to pay, has no right to tax a solicitor's bill: In re Jackson, 37 W. R. 282, 40 Ch. D. 495, 499. According to the interpretation of that section, given by Jessel, M.R., in In re Leadbitter, a creditor is not a "party interested" in the property; he is not "a party interested under the trust, deed, will, or intestacy." That case is cited as an authority on the present point in Poley on Solicitors, pp. 408, 409. The section must be construed strictly; a party interested, under a trust or deed is a beneficiary, under a will is a legatee, under an intestacy is a next-of-kin. A creditor is not in any of these categories. Provided the estate is solvent, he is not interested in the property at all; and in no case can he be said to have a greater interest in the property than the bankrupt had in In re Leadbitter; and yet in that case it was held that he was not a "party interested" within the section.

BUCKLEY, J.—The applicant in this case is a creditor for a person now deceased, whose estate is being administered under an order obtained by the applicant on the 25th of July, 1903. The application is for the delivery of three bills of costs of a firm of solicitors against the executor, who is the defendant in the administration action, and for the taxation of one of these bills. The question of the taxation of the other bills is left open.

The only point which I have to decide is whether the creditor is, within section 39 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, "a party interested in the property out of which" the executor has paid the bills. I think that he is a party interested. When a creditor is pursuing against the estate of a deceased debtor the remedies which he possesses for obtaining payment of his debts, he is enforcing against the executor a right which is enforceable in a court of equity—namely, to compel the executor to account for the property of the deceased, and to apply it in a due course of administration for the benefit of himself and others in a like case with him. He has no personal right against the executor, but he has a right against the property in the hands of the executor. He is, therefore, in my opinion, within section 39, as being interested in the property.

The argument on the other side is founded on some words which appear in the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Leadbitter. It is common ground that the decision in that case has nothing to do with the point now under discussion. The question there was whether in a bankruptcy the trustee in bankruptcy is a trustee for the bankrupt, and it was held that he is not, and that he is in the same position as regards the bankrupt as the assignee in bankruptcy under the earlier Bankruptcy Acts. Towards the bankrupt the trustee in bankruptcy is only a person who is bound to account to him for any surplus that may exist after all the debts have been paid in full. But in the course of his judgment Sir George Jessel says: "It has always been held that the words 'party interested' mean a party interested under the trust, deed, will, or intestacy." I asked counsel for the respondents to refer me to the cases where this "has always been held," and he was unable to do so. I cannot think that Sir George Jessel in using those words was attaching to them the meaning which was imputed to him in the argument which has been addressed to me. He used them by way of contrast to the position of a trustee in bankruptcy.

The preceding sentences are: "The simple question is whether a bankrupt, after his discharge, where the creditors have been paid in full, and, therefore, the surplus, if any, belongs to the bankrupt, has the right under the 39th section of the Solicitors Act to apply for the taxation of a bill of costs paid by the trustee in bankruptcy to the solicitor of a mortgagee of the bankrupt on the occasion of paying off the mortgage debt, which was done during the pendency of the bankruptcy and before the discharge of the bankrupt. I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that the bankrupt has no such right. The supposed right is given by the 39th section of the Solicitors Act, which says . . ." The Master of the Rolls read the section and went on to use the words in question. I think he meant to say that those words had no application to a trustee in bankruptcy, but did not mean to say that a creditor who was putting into operation the rights which he possessed to enforce his debt was not a person interested, because he does not take under the testator's will. It appears to me that a creditor of a deceased person who is looking to the property of that deceased person for the repayment of his debt is a party interested in the property out of which the executor has paid solicitors' bills, and is, therefore, entitled to obtain taxation of those bills.

HERTFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. NEW RIVER CO. (a.)

Highway—Bridges—Liability to repair—Statute—Construction—Statute of Bridges.

A statutory obligation to maintain a bridge which is part of a highway, imposed by a statute subsequent to the Statute of Bridges (22 Hen. 8, c. 5), is not necessarily a liability to repair the highway to the extent of three hundred feet from each end of the bridge, notwithstanding that the inhabitants of a county must repair to that extent where they are liable to repair at all, and notwithstanding that persons liable to repair by prescription or ratione tenuræ are bound to repair to a similar extent.

Action.

The plaintiffs, who were the County Council of Hertfordshire, asked for a declaration to the effect that the defendants, the New River Co., were bound to keep in repair certain bridges and approaches thereto, that carried the highway, and were situate within the county of Hertford, to the distance in every case of three hundred feet from the ends of each bridge. The defendants admitted a general liability to repair the bridges and their approaches, but did not admit a liability to repair in every case to the extent of three hundred feet from each end of the bridge, and alleged that the approaches were not uniform in length, but that in no case was that as much as three hundred feet, and claimed that the distance to be repaired depended in every case upon the length of the approach.

Eve, K.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the defendants.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question to be decided is whether the liability of keeping in repair the highway adjacent to the ends of the bridges in question to the extent of three hundred feet from the ends of each bridge attaches to the defendant company; or whether the obligation under which the defendant company labours is only to keep the approaches to the bridges in repair, the extent of the approaches being in each case a question of fact which must be determined hereafter. The liability of the defendant company to repair the bridges and approaches is admitted, but that the liability extends to a distance of three hundred feet from the ends of each bridge is disputed. The plaintiffs' contention is founded on the Statute of Bridges (22 Hen. 8, c. 5), which by section 7 provides for the repair of the ways adjoining the ends of public bridges to the extent of three hundred feet.

The defendant company is under its charter bound to maintain and repair well and sufficiently all the bridges of and belonging to the New River, such bridges being provided by the defendants for the public passage over the river at places meet and convenient: 3 Jac. 1, c. 18; 4 Jac. 1, c. 12. The plaintiffs contended, that the common law making a person cutting through a highway for his own benefit liable to make a bridge and approach, and to maintain them for the use of the public, the proper construction of the Statute of Bridges was to render such person liable to maintain the highway carrying the bridge for a distance of three hundred feet from each end of the bridge.

The statute of the defendant company (3 Jac. 1, c. 18, s. 6) in terms does not so provide, but the contention is that this construction is within the intendment of the statute and that the rule is applicable to all persons liable to repair whether by prescription, ratione tenuræ, or otherwise. There have been many cases on the construction of the statute; these cases decide that where the inhabitants of a county are liable to repair a bridge, they are also liable to repair three hundred feet at the ends of the bridge, and the same rule is applicable where the liability to repair arises by prescription or ratione tenuræ: citing R. v. West Riding of Yorks, 7 East 588; R. v. Inhabitants of Kent, 13 East 220; R. v. Kerrison, 3 M. & S. 526; R. v. Inhabitants of Isle of Ely, 15 Q. B. 827; R. v. Mayor of Lincoln, 8 A. & E. 65. The question of whether the rule applies where the liability is imposed by statute has arisen in two cases. In Nottinghamshire County Council v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co., 71 L. T. 430, the question was raised by special case stated, and the question submitted was whether in the circumstances the defendants were liable to repair the raised approaches which were respectively of the length of 180 feet and 174 feet. The Divisional Court held that the defendants were liable and that the approaches were part of the bridge. This decision is rather against the plaintiffs in the case at bar than in their favour, for if the defendants in the cited case were liable to repair the approaches for a fixed limit from each end of the bridge, there was no necessity to ascertain what those approaches were. The point arose again in Reg. v. Staffordshire and Worcestershire Canal Co., 65 J. P. 505, but there was no decision as to whether the Statute of Bridges applied, or whether the liability was for 300 feet on either side. In these circumstances the question must be determined by me. The case is not one of a common law, but of a statutory liability: 3 Jac. 1, c. 18, s. 6. In my judgment where a statute as modern as the reign of James I. empowers a company to cut a highway and imposes a liability on the company of making and maintaining a bridge, the word bridge is not necessarily a bridge as defined by the Statute of Bridges. It would be an extension of that statute for which there is no precedent if I were to hold that where a statute subsequent to that, has imposed an obligation to make and maintain a bridge it has ipso facto imposed an obligation to repair the roadway carrying the bridge for a distance of three hundred feet from each end. The declaration will be that the defendant company is bound to repair the bridges in question and the approaches thereto, including the roadways thereon, and in the latter so much of the highway at each end of the bridge as has been raised or otherwise interfered with by reason of the construction of the bridge, but not necessarily to the extent of three hundred feet from each end thereof.

UNDERGROUND ELECTRIC RAILWAYS CO. OF LONDON (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp—Conveyance on sale—Purchase-money partly in cash and partly by shares in new company—Part of share capital only issued—Estimated value of amount that might be raised by shares—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 56 (2), 57, 59 (1).

A company agreed to sell its undertaking to a new company in consideration of a definite sum payable partly in cash and partly in shares in the new company. It was further agreed that the profits of the new company in respect of each year should be applied, first, in paying a cumulative dividend of 5 per cent. upon any shares for the time being issued by the new company; and, secondly, in paying to the vendor company "as a further part of the consideration for the said sale such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital . . . in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company."

Held, that this latter sum, though forming part of the consideration, was of so uncertain a character that it could not be brought into account for the purpose of increasing the ad valorem duty payable in respect of the consideration for the sale.

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

On the 8th of July, 1902, an instrument was presented on behalf of the appellants, the Underground Electric Railways Co. of London (Limited), to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for their opinion as to the duty with which it was chargeable.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The instrument was an agreement entered into on the 25th of June, 1902, between the Metropolitan District Electric Traction Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the Traction Co.) and the Underground Electric Railways Co. of London (Limited), whereby the appellants were to acquire the whole of the undertakings of the Traction Co. The sum of £500,000 was to be paid in cash by the new company (the Underground Electric Railways Co.) to the Traction Co. on the completion of the purchase, and a further sum of £500,000 was to be paid in shares. The profits of the new company available for dividend in respect of each year were to be applied under clause 3 of the agreement (1) in payment of an accumulative dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on any shares issued by the new company; and (2) in paying to the Traction Co. or its assigns, "as a further part of the consideration for the said sale, such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5 000,000 in the new company as shall for the time being have been issued by the new company."

In assessing the duty payable by reference to section 59 (i.) of the Stamp Act, 1891, the commissioners computed the consideration for the property agreed to be sold as £1,947,583 18s. 5d., which consideration for the purpose of assessing the duty payable upon the instrument in question was, after making the deductions in the same section authorized, computed at £1,527,357 17s. 11d. This sum and the apportionment thereof, made for the purposes of the assessment, were admitted to be correct if the commissioners were right in including therein £780,000 under clause 3 (2) of the agreement.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sum contingently payable out of profits in each year under clause 3 (2) was, as therein expressed, "part of the consideration for the sale," and that so far as such sum was capable of ascertainment at the date of the agreement it was liable to an ad valorem duty at the rate of 10s. per cent.

The appellant company contended that such sum was incapable of ascertainment by reason of the remoteness of the contingency upon which the payments must be made. At the date of the agreement the whole of the ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 in the new company had been issued—namely, 500,000 shares of £10 each; and on 100,000 of such shares £5 per share had been paid up, and on the remaining 400,000 shares £2 per share had been paid up, such payments amounting together to £1,300,000. Upon this sum of £1,300,000 a dividend of £3 per cent. for a year would equal £39,000.

As the annual sum specified in clause 3 (2) of the agreement was in the opinion of the commissioners contingently payable, according to the terms of the agreement, either in perpetuity or for an indefinite period within the meaning of section 56 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891, the commissioners were of opinion that the duty fell to be charged upon the said annual amount multiplied by twenty in accordance with the provisions of that section, and accordingly assessed, together with other duty on the remaining part of the consideration, a duty of 10s. per cent. upon £39,000 multiplied by 20 = £780,000 = £3,900. The appellants, on the other hand, contended that this was not a periodical payment within the meaning of that section. With this part of the assessment the appellants expressed themselves dissatisfied and required the commissioners to state a case.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether this sum or, if not, any and what part of such sum was rightly included in the amount charged with duty as aforesaid, or, if not, whether any and what duty was assessable in respect of clause 3 (2) of the agreement.

Roskill, K.C., and Austen Cartmell, for the appellant company.—The additional consideration given by clause 3 (2) cannot, by reason of its uncertainty of amount, form a ground for ad valorem duty. Nor does it become liable to duty as falling within section 56 of the Stamp Act, 1891. That section deals only with definite ascertained sums payable periodically. Section 57 deals with money payable on a contingency, but it does not contemplate or provide for the contingency of the money itself. The sum to be paid is ascertained, although the payment is contingent on the happening of some uncertain event. The words in section 57 "either certainly or contingently" were inserted to prevent any such questions arising as were raised in Mortimore v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 H. & C. 838, 12 W. R. Dig. 126.

They cited also, on section 57, Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank, (1881) 8 R. 389; Swayne v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 48 W. R. 197, [1899] 1 Q. Roskill, K.C., replied.

CHANNELL, J.—The question turns on a sale, by what may be called the old company, of its property and assets to the new company, and was in consideration partly of certain definite sums of money, about which no difficulty arises, and partly of such a sum as should be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. in each year on the amount for the time being paid on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5 000,000 in the new company as should for the time being have been issued by the new company, as provided by clause 3 (2) of the agreement, which is in these terms: "Part of the consideration of the said sale shall be: (a) The sum of £500,000, which (subject to the provisions contained in sub-clause (b) of this clause) shall be paid in cash by the new company to the Traction Co. on completion of the purchase, together with interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on £250,000, part of such sum, calculated from the 25th day of March, 1902, up to the date of the passing of the final resolution for the winding up of the Traction Co., but in any event for not more than one calendar month from the date thereof. (b) The sum of £500,000, which shall be satisfied by the issue to the Traction Co. or its nominees of 100,000 ordinary shares of £10 each in the new company . . . and shall for all purposes be deemed to be paid up to the extent of £5 per share. . . . (2) The profits of the new company available for dividend in respect of each year shall be applied in the following order and manner—that is to say, (i.) in payment of a cumulative dividend at the rate of £5 per cent. up to the end of such year on the amount for the time being paid on any shares for the time being issued by the new company; and (ii.) in paying to the Traction Co. or its assigns, as a further part of the consideration for the said sale, such a sum as shall be equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. for such year on the amount for the time being paid up on such of the original ordinary share capital of £5,000,000 in the new company as shall, for the time being, have been issued by the new company." Now, it is with regard to the latter part of this clause that the question I have been asked to decide arises. The conclusion I have come to is that this sum, "equal to a dividend of 3 per cent.," is so uncertain as to be without any real basis of calculation. The sum is not payable on a mere contingency; there is not merely the uncertainty in respect to the amount of the earnings of the company, and therefore uncertainty as to the amount that would become payable by way of dividend, but there is what I may call a double contingency here, for there is the further uncertainty introduced as to the amount which might be paid up from time to time on the shares issued by the new company. This latter element of uncertainty comes in twice. It comes in under the first sub-clause of clause 3 of the agreement with regard to the payment of a cumulative dividend of £5 per cent. per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on the shares issued, and it comes in again under the second sub-clause of clause 3 as to the payment to the Traction Co. of a sum equal to a dividend of 3 per cent. on the amount for the time being paid up on the shares. Therefore this sum, which the new company has agreed to pay as part of the consideration, is too uncertain to be the subject of ad valorem stamp duty, and is incapable, if my view is right, of valuation within the class of cases that have been cited where an uncertain amount with a maximum is mentioned. There a maximum sum was mentioned, but it was uncertain whether the whole would become payable. I am inclined to think that in such a case that might possibly constitute a sum payable on a contingency within the meaning of section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891. It might be possible also, if there is a certain sum mentioned, to take sections 56 and 57 together and to make the sum liable to this taxation, even though the amount was payable, not only periodically within section 56, but also on a contingency within section 57. Here, however, the whole transaction seemed to me to have been made up of uncertainties, both as regards the dividend which it was said might be earned and the total amount which might be raised in shares up to a certain period. I cannot see either, any foundation for the suggestion that one might take the share capital paid up at the date of the deed. That is not the basis upon which the consideration was calculated. The amount of the capital paid then was a mere accident. I fail to see what right the Crown would have to place the limit on the capital at that time and say that it was so much, and that if the company could earn the full amount upon that, then the 3 per cent. would be taxable. If it was once admitted that in the case which I put forward in the argument, of the sale of a business in consideration of an agreement to pay to the vendor a share of the profits to be thereafter made, the amount would be so uncertain that it could not be dealt with by imposing an ad valorem stamp duty in respect thereof, it follows that in the present case, the consideration being equally uncertain an ad valorem duty cannot be imposed. No doubt, it forms part of the consideration for the transfer, and if it had been, as in the case I put forward, the sole consideration, I suppose the stamp duty would have been 10s. But here there is a much larger stamp duty payable in respect of the other part of the consideration, and I fail to see how this sum can be brought in to increase the ad valorem duty.

For the reasons I have given I think the Crown is not entitled to say here "There is so much due and payable under clause 3 (2)," and to claim stamp duty on that hypothetical amount. Therefore this appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the appellant company with costs.

Appeal allowed.

WIELAND v. BUTLER-HOGAN. (a.)

Public health—Justices——Unsound meat—Exposed or deposited for sale—No evidence that, at the time of seizure on butcher's premises, meat would be sold for the food of man—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 116, 117.

The mere fact of unsound meat being found on premises where, in the ordinary course of business, it would be exposed for sale for the food of man is, in the absence of evidence that the unsound meat was in fact intended to be exposed and offered for sale, insufficient to constitute an offence within section 117 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Mallinson v. Carr, 39 W. R. 270, [1891] 1 Q. B. 48, considered and distinguished.

Appeal from a decision of the justices sitting at Tottenham, before whom the appellant, a retail butcher, had been convicted and fined for having in his possession unsound meat intended for the food of man, contrary to the Public Health Act, 1875.

The special case stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, set out the following facts:

An inspector visited the appellant's shop at 194, Philip-lane at midday on Monday, the 12th of October, 1903. There was only one customer there, and the shop and premises were then undergoing the process of cleaning and being prepared for the business of the day. Upon an ice-safe being opened at the inspector's instance, it was found to contain a large quantity of meat perfectly sound, but part of a neck of mutton and some pieces of cooked meat, on separate dishes, showed signs of decomposition. The shop had been closed on the previous Saturday at midnight, when the unsold meat, which was all then sound and fit for the food of man, was put away in the ice safe. The appellant's ordinary course of business was to devote the whole of every Monday morning to the cleansing his shop, and then to open the ice-safe and examine the meat, when, if any was found to be unsound it was at once removed.

The justices were of opinion that the facts as above stated constituted an offence against the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 116, 117, and convicted the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the justices was right in law.

W. Clarke Hall, for the appellant.—The conviction is wrong because the facts do not show here either that the meat was exposed for sale when seized, nor deposited in any place for the purpose of sale, nor was it intended for the food of man. To constitute an offence there must be evidence showing that the meat was intended for the food of man at the time that it was seized. When the meat was placed in the safe on the Saturday night it was sound. It was to remain there until the shop had been cleaned on the following Monday, and would have been examined before it was placed for sale, and such as was unfit would have been removed. These facts distinguish this case from that of Mallinson v. Carr, 39 W. R. 270, [1891] 1 Q. B. 48, as in that case there was evidence of the vendor's knowledge of the state of the meat.

R. Cunningham Glen. — The fact of having unsound meat on premises where meat is sold for human food is of itself an offence. Therefore the onus of satisfying the justices that in the present case the unsound meat found in the ice safe was not intended for sale as food rests on the appellant. The justices having convicted the appellant, must be taken as finding that fact against the appellant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I do not think that the justices, in stating the case as they have, intended it to be understood that they disbelieved the evidence adduced on behalf of the appellant. That was shortly the case put forward by the respondent, and if it was open for me on the case as stated to accept that argument the conviction would have to stand. I think that the justices meant to state as a proved fact that the meat had not been dealt with on the Monday, and that while accepting the appellant's evidence as truly stating the facts, they had come to the conclusion that an offence under the section in question had been committed. On the facts there is no evidence that the appellant intended to sell the meat in the safe which had turned off, or that the meat which was unsound was deposited in the safe for sale at the time of seizure. I am clearly of opinion that on the facts there is no evidence that the meat was intended for sale. I quite agree with Mr. Clarke Hall that the decision in Mallinson v. Carr, which at first sight would seem to be against the appellant, proceeded in fact on the assumption that the butcher had retained the meat after he had knowledge that it had gone bad. That distinguishes that case from the present and there being no evidence here that the appellant knew that any of the meat in the safe was bad, the decision is in his favour and not against him.

For this reason I think the justices have come to a wrong decision on a point of law and the appeal must be allowed.

DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ., agreed.

Appeal allowed; conviction quashed.

GOERTZ & CO. (LIMITED) v. BELL. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Person resident in the United Kingdom — Company registered abroad — Business carried on from London—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule D.

A company, registered abroad, but not registered in the United Kingdom, which in fact carries on its business through a board of directors from a head office in London is resident within the United Kingdom, and is assessable to income tax under section 2, Schedule D, paragraph 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1853, upon the whole of the profits of its business, wheresoever those profits are made.

This was an appeal upon a case stated against the decision of the Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London, raising the question whether a foreign company registered abroad, but not registered as a joint stock company in the United Kingdom, and having an office in London from whence the business of the company was directed and controlled by a board of directors, could be held to be resident within this country for the purpose of the Income Tax Acts.

The case stated the following facts:

The appellant company was registered as a joint stock company at Pretoria, in the South African Republic, in December, 1897, according to the laws then subsisting in that republic. The company had never been registered in the United Kingdom as a joint stock company. The head office of the company was to be either in London or elsewhere on the continent or in Johannesburg, or at such other place elsewhere with such branch or branches in the republic and elsewhere as the directors may from time to time determine. The objects for which the company was formed were (inter alia) to take over the business of a German company, to carry on the business of merchants, dealers in stocks, financial and general agents, and to acquire mining and other properties, real and personal, in South Africa. By the articles of association the head office of the company was to be either in London, or elsewhere in Europe, or in the South African Republic as the directors thought fit to determine. All the meetings of the company were to be held in Johannesburg, but the directors might meet in Berlin, London, Johannesburg, Paris, or elsewhere. The business of the appellant company consisted in the purchase and prospecting of lands with mining possibilities, or the obtaining of options over such lands with the view to the formation and flotation of companies for the purpose of working the same and the making of a market for the shares of the subsidiary companies in London, Berlin, Paris, and Johannesburg, and dealing in and selling such shares and other shares, principally of South African companies. The working capital of the subsidiary companies was found by the appellant company either alone or in conjunction with others as a syndicate, in agreed proportions. The nominal share capital of the subsidiary companies was either taken as a whole by the appellant company or distributed pro rata among the members of the syndicate. The working capital of the subsidiary companies was almost invariably subscribed by a syndicate which usually consisted of capitalists and financiers carrying on business in Europe and South Africa. No prospectuses were issued by the subsidiary companies, but a market was made and the shares then distributed and dealt in and gradually realized on the stock markets of London, Paris, Berlin, and Johannesburg. The profits made by the appellant company were directly obtained (inter alia) by the sale and realization of shares in such subsidiary companies. Some additional sources of profit by the company were interest on money lent, dividends on shares held by it, agency fees from other companies, and the like. The bulk of the company's capital was invested in South African shares and in mining properties in South Africa. The company's interest outside South Africa only stood at about £5,000, and half of that amount was invested in America and Western Australia. On the 31st of December, 1899, the value of the shares and debentures in other companies held by the defendant company amounted to £719,365. The value of claim holdings, participations, and interests amounted to £224,395. The value of the temporary advances against securities amounted to the sum of £144,520. Such advances were made in London to the extent of £37,900, and in Paris to the extent of £106,619. The amount of cash on deposit accounts and in hand amounted to £326,884, and was held in London to the extent of £171,819, in Berlin to the extent of £123,301, in Paris to the extent of £9,205, and in Johannesburg to the extent of £22,557. The evidence produced showed that with regard to the purchase and sale of shares by the company, 56¾ per cent. of the purchases of shares, and 49 per cent. of the sale of shares by the company were carried out in London during the years in question.

The transactions of the affairs of the company were effected as follows: With regard to the general meetings of the company, the first general meeting of the company was held in 1899, in Johannesburg. No other general meeting was held till the end of the year of assessment by reason of the South African war. The second general meeting was held in London in June, 1901, subsequent to the year of assessment. With regard to the directors' meetings, the directors' minute-book kept in London, which was the only minute-book of the company, was produced in evidence, and contained a number of items and minutes of resolutions relating to the affairs of the company which, in the opinion of the commissioners, showed that almost every transaction of importance affecting the management, control, and direction of the company was dealt with, controlled, and decided at the board meetings of the directors in London. A considerable number of important matters requiring local management was carried out by the managing director in Johannesburg on behalf of the board under powers delegated by the board in London, and in some instances such matters, though reported to the managing director in London, were not formally reported to the board until settled. A copy of the minutes of the board meetings in London were forwarded after each meeting to Johannesburg. No other minute-book was kept at Johannesburg.

With regard to the staff, the chairman and three of the mine directors were present in England, four directors were resident in England. One director was resident in Paris and one director in the South African Republic. The directors resident in Germany and Paris attended the board meetings in London. In 1899, being the year of assessment, the managing director was resident in London. The managing director was appointed for, and resided in, Johannesburg. The board appointed also two managers in London, two in Johannesburg, and one in Paris, and one in Berlin. The Johannesburg staff of the company numbered twenty-five, including surveyors and engineers. The London staff numbered twenty-six, the Berlin thirteen, and the Paris nine. The directors held monthly meetings at the company's office in London. Only one meeting was held out of England. The accounts of the Johannesburg, Paris, and Berlin offices were brought to London, where the balance-sheets and accounts of the company were made up and audited. The Berlin and Johannesburg office accounts were respectively audited in Berlin and Paris before being sent to England. The dividends were fixed and authorized by resolutions of the directors at meetings held in London for that purpose, and the dividend warrants in respect of 801,524 registered shares were also issued in London. The coupons on bearer shares were paid in 1899 as to 52,294 shares in Berlin and Paris and as to 11,182 shares in London, and eventually were brought to account in London.

On behalf of the company it was contended that the appellant company should be assessed as a person not resident within the United Kingdom drawing profit from a trade exercised in the United Kingdom and on such profits only.

The commissioners having heard argument and having taken evidence, found as facts—(1) That the trade and business of the company constituted one trade or business and was carried on and exercised by the appellants within the United Kingdom at their London office; (2) that the head and seat and directing power of the affairs of the appellant company were at the office of the company in London, from whence the whole of the operations of the company, both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, were controlled and directed. And they held that the appellant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom and liable as such to be assessed under section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, Schedule D, first paragraph, on the whole of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any trade, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; and they accordingly confirmed the assessment, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

By paragraph 1 of Schedule D of section 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, income tax is payable "for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits and gains." By the second paragraph of the same schedule income tax is payable "for and in respect of the annual profits and gains arising or accruing to any person whatever, whether a subject of her Majesty or not, although not resident within the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or any profession, trade, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits and gains."

Asquith, K.C. (Scrutton, K.C., and J. R. Atkin with him), for the company, referred to Attorney-General v. Alexander, 23 W. R. 255, L. R. 10 Ex. 20; Wingate v. Webber, 24 Rettie 939; Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428, and the judgments referred to in the judgment of Phillimore, J., in Kodak (Limited) v. Clark, 51 W. R. 459, [1903] 1 K. B. 505; Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson, 1 Ex. D. 428; San Paulo Brazilian Railway Co. v. Carter, 44 W. R. 336, [1896] A. C. 31, and submitted that on the facts viewed in the light of these decisions it was impossible to say that the business of the company was carried on in the United Kingdom so as to bring it within section 2 of the Schedule D of the Act of 1853. It was the first time that an attempt had been made to render liable the profits of a company registered abroad, not registered in the United Kingdom. The statute contemplated that a trade might be carried on in this country notwithstanding the fact that there was no residence in this country. Therefore, the finding of fact that the trade of the company was directed from this country was not conclusive on the question of residence.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the Crown.—The commissioners have found as a fact that the company is resident in this country. The place of residence does not depend upon the place of registration. A company started and registered in one place may migrate and carry on business in another. It may, so to speak, change its domicil. The only true test is "from what place is its business managed." There is no other test, and the question has been answered by the findings of the commissioners in favour of the contention of the Crown. Therefore the company is liable to pay income tax on the whole of its profits under section 2 of Schedule D.

Asquith, K.C., replied.

CHANNELL, J.—Although it is not likely that this case will stop here, and perhaps, having regard to the fact that its decision must affect a very great number of similar companies, and for that reason it might be said that I ought to have considered my judgment, yet I think that I can explain my view sufficiently and meet the requirements of the judges in the Court of Appeal, who, I understand, desire that a judge should express his reasons for the grounds for his decision rather than merely state the bare result he had arrived at. For this reason I think it would be convenient if I first of all disposed of a preliminary point as to the mode in which the case was stated, as the point has been taken by the appellants that the commissioners have gone farther in the stated case than they did when they first gave their decision. [His lordship then dealt with the objection, and continuing, said:] I think that any tribunal who, having stated its determination, is afterwards required to put that determination into writing, may amplify and explain its decision. That is all that, in my opinion, the commissioners have done in this case. The commissioners had found on the stated case that the defendant company was a person residing in the United Kingdom. They do not appear to have stated that finding when they first gave their decision. I think, however, that they must have intended to have found that fact as that was really the question raised by the case. It seems to me, therefore, that the appellants' objection on this point fails.

Now, the question I have to decide is one of mixed fact and law, and it is open to me, therefore, to deal with the question of fact, whatever the commissioners' findings might have been. The difficulty arises from the findings of the commissioners. [His lordship reads the findings.] Mr. Asquith started his argument by pointing to an observation of James, L.J., in Ex parte Bruell, 16 Ch. D., at p. 486, to the effect that the word resident must not be construed for taxation purposes by reference to definitions given to that word when used in connection with other branches of the law. I think that is true, and that one ought to look at the Act and see with what object the Legislature there used the word. I think it means that if a person is resident in this country, so that he takes the benefit of the government of the country with regard to the security of his life and property, and has had the opportunity of doing business under the protection of the government, he is placed under an obligation to contribute to the expenses of the country by a tax on all the profits of his business. If he is not so resident, he does not benefit by the expenses paid in governing the country and is not called upon to contribute. I think that is the policy of the Act. It is a conclusion that assists one in deciding the question when it is raised in the case of an individual, but in the case of a company the matter is more difficult, because in one sense a company cannot be said to live in the ordinary sense of the word in any place. Nevertheless a company does get protection to its business under laws provided by the government of the country where its business is registered and carried on.

For that reason the appellants contended that, as the company was registered in South Africa, their residence was taken to be in that country. On the other hand it was said that the company, having its head office and its board of directors in this country, did benefit by the law and order provided by the government of this country. The registration of the company was advanced on the one side, and the head office and board of directors were advanced on the other side, as tests in deciding residence. To a great extent the question before me is, which of these contentions is to prevail. Perhaps the question better stated was whether registration in Africa prevented the company from having a residence in England. It is quite possible that the company might have two residences. In fact the possibility of two residences was recognized for taxing purposes. If the fact of registration in South Africa does not prevent the company from being resident in this country a further question arises—Do the facts show a residence in this country? What is one to attribute as a residence to a body which in the ordinary sense has no residence? It must have some local habitation. The law of England provides one, because it provides that a company must have a registered office. So far as I can judge, the law of the South African Republic does not provide that a company must have a registered office as is the case in this country. At anyrate by reference to the articles of association of the company it did not appear that a registered office is necessary. The articles of association provides a head office where service on the company should be made, the effect of which is to make the head office a place of local habitation. The meetings of the company were to be in Johannesburg until otherwise determined, but the head office was to be in London, Paris, or elsewhere on the continent, or in South Africa, as determined. There is a finding of fact by the commissioners that the head office was in London, and there is, I think, evidence to support that finding. So far as the articles of association, which is the constitution of the company, throw any light on this question, they seem to point to London as the place where the company is to be found. It undoubtedly contemplated the company doing business all over the world. It contemplated a head office and branch offices, although, from the company being incorporated in the South African Republic, it would be thought its principal place of business would be there. Apart from that document the facts show that the control of the business proceeded from the board in London. Under these circumstances did the fact of the incorporation of the company in South Africa show that it had its residence there and not elsewhere? As to cases, no case was reported in which it had been held that a company incorporated in one country had a residence in another. On the other hand, in none of the reported cases does it appear that a company was resident in one country and incorporated in another. In Attorney-General v. Alexander the two matters were on the same side. In Wingate v. Webber the Scotch case which is perhaps the nearest to the present case, the company, besides being registered in Norway, had its registered office in that country, and its company business was conducted there, while its trading business was done by an agent in Glasgow. I think, moreover, in that case that there was a distinction between the officers of a company and mere agents of the company, and in considering the question within which branch in the Income Tax Act the company fell, the question was of some importance. Therefore none of the cases cited exactly cover the present case, and I am bound to give an independent decision to the best of my ability.

Turning to the Act, the first paragraph of the schedule refers to residence in this country, and the second to a resident abroad carrying on a business by agency in this country. What was held in Wingate v. Webster was that the Glasgow agent was accountable for income tax in respect of all the profits of the company made in England. In the present case all the directors and heads of the company who were officers of the company, were in England, and the conclusion I draw from that fact is that the company was in England, and not the agency, and that the company was resident in England. The considerations which go to show the habitation of the company go more to show that the company was here and the agency in South Africa.

The cases did not throw much light on the question. I cannot bring myself to find that the company by being registered in South Africa, and desiring, no doubt, to take the advantages of the laws of the South African Republic, are prevented from becoming resident elsewhere. My view is that it has been shown that it was originally intended that the operations of the company should be outside the republic and were in fact outside. It is not necessary for me to say anything with regard to whether the case falls within the second paragraph of the schedule. But in approaching that question the view which I have tried to explain as the one I have taken on the first question is confirmed, because in looking to see who should be made liable under the second paragraph it would be necessary to look for the agent, and the agent of the company could not be found without finding the company itself.

Therefore, for these reasons, I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

A testatrix, who was domiciled in America, by her will, which extended only to her property in England, appointed two persons to be executors and trustees thereof, and directed them to collect all her estate in England, both capital and income, and to invest and re-invest the same as from time to time might be prudent, and to manage the whole fund, and to invest all interest or income accumulating after her death as well as the capital; and she directed them at the end of six years after her death to divide the accumulated interest and income among certain persons, and to divide the capital of her estate then in their custody and control into three equal parts, one of such parts to be paid to and to become the sole property of the defendant, with remainder in case of his death before the expiration of the six years. The testatrix died in August, 1903, and her will was duly proved. Her property in England was invested by the trustees of the will in the purchase of £4,442 Transvaal Government Guaranteed Stock, and this stock stood in the books of the Bank of England in their names. The plaintiff subsequently recovered judgment against the defendant for £216, and applied for an order under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1, charging the defendant's interest in the said stock with the payment of the amount of the judgment debt.

Held, that the will imposed no obligation on the trustees to sell the stock or to change the investment, and that the defendant had an interest in the stock which could be charged under the Acts.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., in chambers.

On the 23th of June, 1904, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for £208 0s. 2d., with costs, which were taxed at £8, making in all £216 0s. 2d. The plaintiff, being unable to obtain payment of this sum, obtained an order nisi charging the defendant's interest in a sum of £4,442 14s. 6d. Transvaal Government £3 per cent. Guaranteed Stock standing in the books of the Bank of England in the names of Percy Howell Cathcart and Henry Isaacs, trustees of the will of Jean M. Lauder, deceased, with the payment of the amount due on the judgment debt.

The above-mentioned will of the testatrix, who was an American, domiciled in America, was as follows: "As to all moneys, bonds, bankers' balances, securities, and property of every description that may be carried on account or held in custody on my behalf by Baring Brothers & Co., or any other bankers or attorneys in England at my death, I hereby constitute and appoint my two friends, Percy Howell Cathcart and Henry R. Isaacs, both of London, England, and the survivor of them, to be executors and trustees for the said portion of my estate in England, and I direct them and the survivor of them, with such advice from Baring Brothers & Co. as they may find expedient, to collect and gather together all such residue of my estate in England at my death, both principal and interest, capital and income, and to invest and reinvest as from time to time may be prudent, and to manage the whole fund. And I direct them to invest all interest or income accumulating after my death as well as the capital thereof. At the end of six years after my death I direct my said executors and trustees, or the survivor of them, to divide the total accumulated dividends, income, and interest of said period into two equal and distinct parts, one equal part thereof to be paid to my third cousin and adopted son Frederick Charles Lauder, and the other equal part thereof to be paid to Charles Oram Lauder Young — the defendant in the action — known as Charles Lauder, my second cousin, to be used by him for the benefit and education of his children. And furthermore, at the end of six years after my death I direct my said executors and trustees, or the survivor of them, to divide all the capital of my estate then in their custody and control into three equal and distinct parts, one third to be paid to and to become the sole property of my said adopted son Frederick Charles Lauder, and one third to be paid to and to become the sole property of the said Charles Oram Lauder Young, known as Charles Lauder, but the remaining equal third part, I direct to be further kept invested and reinvested by my said executors and trustees or the survivor of them together with its accumulations thenceforth until the expiration of ten years from my death, at the end of which period the whole of the said fund shall be paid to and become the sole property of the then surviving children of the said Charles Oram Lauder Young, known as Charles Lauder, and of his wife, Emily Penruddock Lauder, the said fund with capital, income, and all accumulations, to be then equally divided among the said children then surviving. In case of the death of either or both the said Frederick Charles Lauder or Charles Oram Lauder Young before the expiration of six years from my death I direct that the lawful issue then living shall take the parent's share; otherwise and in case of either's death before the said expiration of six years from my decease leaving no lawful issue then surviving, I direct that his share shall vest in the survivor of the two, or if both be dead in such lawful issue of either as may then exist in the nearest degree.

This is expressly confined in operation to such property of mine as may be in England at the time of my death as expressed in the first paragraph, and does not extend to any other part of my estate controlled, situated, or held in custody elsewhere."

The testatrix died on the 2nd of August, 1903, and her will was proved in England on the 1st of December, 1903. Her property in England was invested by the trustees of the will in the purchase of £4,442 14s. 6d. Transvaal Government 3 per cent. Guaranteed Stock. At the date of the charging order nisi this stock was standing in the books of the Bank of England in the names of the trustees. The plaintiff having obtained the above charging order nisi, Phillimore, J., at chambers, upon the authority of Dixon v. Wrench, 17 W. R. 591, L. R. 4 Ex. 154, discharged it.

Firminger (Montague Lush, K.C., with him), for the plaintiff.—The defendant is entitled at the end of six years from the death of the testatrix to one third share in the £4,442 14s. 6d. stock which is standing in the names of trustees in trust for him, and a charging order can therefore be made under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, as amended by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1. The case of Cragg v. Taylor, L. R. 2 Ex. 131, 15 W. R. O. L. Dig. 106, is in point. In Dixon v. Wrench, 17 W. R. 591, L. R. 4 Ex. 154, there was a positive direction to the trustees to sell the shares not later than twelve months after the testatrix's death, and there was also a trust to pay debts and legacies. The judgment debtor therefore in that case had no interest in the shares, but only in the proceeds arising from their sale. In the present case there is no trust for sale or for payment of debts and legacies. The interest of the defendant in the stock is merely postponed for six years, and it is contingent upon the trustees not changing the investment. The fact that the stock is held upon trust for more than one person does not prevent a charging order being made: South-Western Loan and Discount Co. v. Robertson, 30 W. R. 102, 8 Q. B. D. 17. There is, therefore, power under the above Acts to make the charging order.

T. W. Wheeler, K.C., and R. C. Saunders, for the defendant.—The order of the learned judge was right. It is admitted that the stock in question comes within the Acts, but it is submitted that the defendant has no interest in the stock which can be charged. The trustees have power to vary the investment, and the defendant has no interest in the stock now. He may never receive any of the stock, as it may be sold and reinvested in other securities. Further, there is an implied obligation on the trustees to convert the stock. The trustees are also executors, and they may have to sell in order to pay debts. Again, the whole will shows that there is an implied obligation to convert at the end of the six years, when the division has to be made. Dixon v. Wrench is therefore in point.

They also referred to Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), pp. 988, 989.

STIRLING, L.J.—In this case the judgment creditor applied for a charging upon the judgment debtor's interest in certain stock standing in the names of trustees in the books of the Bank of England. The application was made under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1. It is admitted that the stock in question is of a kind which falls within section 14 of the earlier Act. That section provides that "if any person against whom any judgment shall have been entered up in any of her Majesty's superior courts at Westminster shall have any Government stock, funds, or annuities, or any stock or shares of or in any public company in England (whether incorporated or not), standing in his name in his own right, or in the name of any person in trust for him, it shall be lawful for a judge of one of the superior courts, on the application of any judgment creditor, to order that such stock, funds, annuities, or shares, or such of them or such part thereof respectively as he shall think fit, shall stand charged with the payment of the amount for which judgment shall have been so recovered, and interest thereon." That section applies to all stock standing in the name of a judgment debtor in his own right or in the name of a person in trust for him. That Act was extended by the later Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, s. 1 of which provides that "the aforesaid provisions of the said Act shall be deemed and taken to extend to the interest of any judgment debtor, whether in possession, remainder, or reversion, and whether vested or contingent, as well in any such stocks, funds, annuities, or shares as aforesaid, as also in the dividends, interest, or annual produce of any such stock, funds, annuities, or shares."

Now, the question arises here as to the interest of the judgment debtor under the will of an American lady, which she made disposing of her property in England. The will, after appointing certain persons to be executors and trustees, directed them to collect and gather together the testatrix's property in England, and to invest and reinvest the same as might be prudent; and to invest all interest or income accumulating after her death as well as the capital, and at the end of six years after her death to divide the accumulated dividends, income, and interest into two equal parts, one part to be paid to Frederick Charles Lauder, and the other part to the judgment debtor to be used by him for the benefit and education of his children. It is not material to consider the effect of this gift of the accumulated income. The will then goes on to direct the trustees at the end of six years after her death to divide the capital of her estate into three equal parts, one part to be paid to and to become the sole property of Frederick Charles Lauder, and one other part to be paid to and to become the sole property of the judgment debtor, with remainders over in case of either dying before the expiration of the six years.

The question is whether the interest of the judgment debtor in that one third part constitutes an interest, whether in possession, remainder, or reversion, or whether vested or contingent, which can be charged under the above Acts. The estate consists of £4,442 14s. 2d. Transvaal Government Stock. It is clear that the judgment debtor has not got the stock standing in his name. But the stock is standing in the names of the two gentlemen who are executors and trustees under the will, and at the end of six years from the testatrix's death the capital is to be divided into three equal parts, one of which parts is to become the absolute property of the judgment debtor. The question is whether he has not an interest in one third of the stock which can be charged under the Acts. It is said that he has not, because the executors and trustees may come under an obligation to convert the stock into money, and that therefore the only interest which the judgment debtor has is in the proceeds of the sale of the stock, as was the case in Dixon v. Wrench. That depends upon the effect of the will. It is said that the trustees are also executors, and that there may be debts, and that they may come under an obligation to pay those debts, and for that purpose to sell the stock or part of it. That is no doubt true, and the judgment debtor takes subject to that; but all that it will be necessary for the executors to do, if any debts exist, will be to sell so much of the stock as is necessary to pay those debts. That does not prevent the debtor from having an interest in the balance of the stock. If that is so, the only obligation is to accumulate the income during the six years, and at the end of that period to divide the stock into three equal parts, one part going to the judgment debtor. It is then said that there is an obligation at the end of the six years to convert the stock. I can see none. The only obligation is to divide the stock into three equal parts. Does that involve a sale? It is not like a particular kind of chattel which it is necessary to sell before a division can be made. Stock can be divided without a sale. There is no express obligation to convert, and there is nothing which impliedly imposes any such obligation. There is no imperative trust for sale. The judgment debtor may hereafter acquire an absolute title to a portion of the stock in specie, and so long as the stock remains unsold he has, in my judgment, an interest in it. At the end of the six years the judgment debtor may ask to have one third of the stock handed over to him. The judgment debtor therefore has an interest in one third of the stock which can be made the subject of a charging order. With regard to the authorities, in Dixon v. Wrench there was an imperative obligation on the trustees to convert the shares into cash, and the only interest which the judgment debtor had was in the proceeds of the sale and not in the shares themselves. In Cragg v. Taylor it was held that the judgment debtor had an interest in the shares which could be charged, though the very first trust specified in the deed was a trust to sell the shares and then to hold the produce of the sale upon trust, first, to repay a loan; secondly, to maintain the debtor and his wife, and their children; and then upon certain other trusts under which the judgment debtor took no interest.

In my opinion, therefore, the order ought to have been made absolute charging the interest of the judgment debtor, whatever it may be, in the stock.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that there is no obligation under the will on the trustees to sell the stock, and in my opinion the judgment debtor has an interest in this stock which can be charged under the Acts.

STIRLING, L.J.—I ought to have noticed the point with regard to the power of the trustees to change the investments. There is no imperative obligation upon them to alter the mode of investment, though they have a discretion to do so if occasion arises calling for such a change. If a change is made in the mode of investment, then the charging order will cease to have effect with regard to stock which the trustees may have transferred in order to make the change of investment. The discretion of the trustees is in no way affected by the charging order, which only extends to the interest of one of the cestuis que trust, an interest which is subject to the exercise of that discretion.

In re STRAND WOOD CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Liquidator—Security for costs—Practice—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 10.

According to the practice of the court the liquidator of a company is not bound to give security for costs in respect of a misfeasance summons taken out by him.

In 1902 the Strand Wood Co. (Limited) went into voluntary liquidation for the purposes of reconstruction, and Mr. Harry Wren was appointed liquidator in the winding up.

The assets and undertaking of the company were to be transferred to a new company, subsequently incorporated under the name of the Murman Coast Co. (Limited), upon the terms of an agreement whereby the new company undertook as part of the consideration for the transfer to satisfy the debts and liabilities of the old company and to keep the old company, its liquidator and contributories, indemnified against all proceedings in respect thereof, and against the costs and expenses of and incident to the winding up.

On the 19th of April, 1904, the liquidator took out a misfeasance summons under section 10 of the Companies Act, 1890, against certain officers of the old company. Two of the respondents to this summons were Messrs. A. & H. J. Gane. The claims against these respondents amounted in the aggregate to about £15,000, besides a further unascertained sum, as the alleged misfeasances extended over a number of years.

On the 28th of April the Messrs. Gane took out a summons asking that the liquidator might be ordered to give security for their costs of the misfeasance summons. The ground of the application was that the liquidator was a person of no financial position. The registrar declined to order the liquidator to give security.

The Messrs. Gane appealed.

Jessel, for the appellants.—The court has jurisdiction to order a liquidator to give security for the costs of a misfeasance summons.

He referred to In re Wedgewood Co. and Western Counties Bakeries, &c., Co., cited in Palmer's Company Precedents, vol. 2, pp. 632, 633; In re W. Powell & Sons, 44 W. R. 618, [1896] 1 Ch. 681; Cowell v. Taylor, 34 W. R. 24, 31 Ch. D. 34.

Romer, for the liquidator, was not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am afraid that the practice of the court is against the appellants and the appeal fails. I wish to say for myself that I personally, whilst acting as the judge in company matters, have seen many instances of an abuse of the present state of the law, and if this were a new matter I should not be sorry if the court had power to order security in cases in which it thought that the circumstances were such that security ought to be ordered. The authorities are, however, too strong for me, and I must be content with the practice as it stands.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The liquidator is coming here under a power expressly conferred upon him by Act of

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Parliament, and in the exercise of his statutory duties. It is not suggested that these proceedings by the liquidator are frivolous or improperly taken, and in that state of things, according to the practice of this court the liquidator is not bound to give security for costs.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I think it clear that this case does not come within section 69 of the Companies Act, 1862. This is not a case of an action by the company; but it is argued that by analogy where the liquidator comes to the court under the express provisions of section 10 of the Companies Act, 1890, we ought to treat him as being in the same position as a plaintiff company. I cannot follow that. The general rule is settled by Cowell v. Taylor and other cases. It seems to me that we should be going contrary to authority if we required the liquidator to give security for costs in this case. I desire to emphasize what was said by Romer, L.J., in In re W. Powell & Sons, that the court will not have the slightest hesitation in making a personal order for costs against the liquidator on a misfeasance summons if the circumstances require it.

Appeal dismissed.

HUBBACK v. BRITISH NORTH BORNEO CO. (a.)

Practice—Payment into court—Admission of liability as to part of a claim—Denial of liability as to rest of claim—Costs—Issues on which defendants fail—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 22, rr, 1, 6; ord. 65, r. 1.

Payment into court—with an admission of liability as to part of a claim but denial of liability as to the rest—of a sum larger than is eventually recovered by the plaintiff in the action, does not relieve the defendant so paying in from the necessity of paying the costs of issues on which he fails.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial on appeal from verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before Lawrance, J., and a special jury.

The plaintiff entered into the service of the defendants on the terms of an agreement under which he was to have a salary of 325 dollars a month. If he took no leave between the date of joining and the date of going on leave, he was to be allowed three months' vacation leave on full pay and six months on half pay in November, 1902, his salary when on such leave to be calculated at 3s. to the dollar.

In October, 1902, the defendants dismissed the plaintiff from their service.

The plaintiff then brought the present action. He claimed that he was entitled to reasonable notice to determine the agreement, and that six months' notice would have been reasonable. He claimed as damages three months' full pay whilst on leave, nine months' half pay whilst on leave, certain fares between Singapore and London, and six months' pay in lieu of notice. He also claimed damages for wrongful dismissal. The claim for nine months' half pay was based on an allegation that "six months" in the agreement was a clerical error for nine months.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant company, by paragraph 2 of their defence, admitted that the plaintiff was entitled for the first three months of the period of his leave of absence to full pay, and alleged tender of this amount to the plaintiff before action and refusal by him to accept such tender. The defendant company, for the purposes of the action only, was willing to admit liability to pay to the plaintiff a further sum of money equal to six months' half pay.

Paragraph 4 of the defence was as follows: "Whilst denying any liability to pay to the plaintiff by way of compensation or damages, or under the said agreement, any money beyond the sums of money admitted in paragraph 2 of this defence, the defendant company, for the sake of peace, brings into court the sum of £500 and says that such sum is enough to satisfy the plaintiff's claim in this action."

On the trial before Lawrance, J., the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and awarded him £781, and judgment was entered for that amount. They awarded him three months' full pay, nine months' half pay, six months' salary in lieu of notice at 3s. to the dollar, and fares between Singapore and London.

On appeal the Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff was only entitled to the three months' full pay and nine months' half pay, and that the rest of his claim failed. The result was that the plaintiff recovered less than the £500 paid into court by the defendant company.

It was now contended by the defendant company that they were entitled, under the provisions of order 22, to have all the costs of the action, including the costs of the issue as to six months' or nine months' half pay, on which they had failed.

Scrutton, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the defendants, referred to Wagstaffe v. Bentley, [1902] 1 K. B. 125; 50 W. R. Dig. 134; Wheeler v. United Telephone Co., 33 W. R. 295, 13 Q. B. D. 157; Dunn v. South-Eastern and Chatham Railway, 51 W. R. 427, [1903] 1 K. B. 358; Wood v. Leetham, 61 L. J. Q. B. 215, 40 W. R. Dig. 64.

McCall, K.C., and Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The defendants here have purported to avail themselves of order 22, and in particular of the provisions of rule 6 of that order. The result of the trial is that the money paid into court is larger than the sum which the plaintiff has recovered in the action, and we have to see what ought to be done about the costs. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that if they are given their full rights under order 22 they ought to have all their costs of the action, and ought not to be ordered to pay the costs even of the issue on which they have failed. They distinguish the decision in Wagstaffe v. Bentley upon the ground that in Wagstaffe v. Bentley the issues as to which the defendant failed were issues going to the whole cause of action, and in those circumstances it was right that the defendant, though he had paid more than was due into court, should have to pay the costs of those issues; but in the present case the defendants contend that they have not been defeated as to any issue going to the whole cause of action; and therefore they say they have not been defeated as to any defence and ought to have all their costs of the action. I see nothing in the authorities to compel us to this conclusion. Apart from authority, I think it would be good sense that a defendant should bear the costs of an issue on which he has failed. Far from there being anything in the Judicature Acts to prevent us from coming to this conclusion, I think order 65 is in point and assists us.

I have only to add this, that I doubt whether the defendants can have the benefit of the defence which they have raised. In my judgment order 22 makes provision for payment into court in two different cases—first, where the liability is admitted; secondly, where it is denied. If the payment in is made with an admission of liability, the plaintiff may, in respect of that cause of action, take out the sum so paid in at any time. If, on the other hand, money is paid into court with a denial of liability, it remains in court until the action has been tried. What is sought to be done here is to make a payment in on both the bases, which would prevent the plaintiff taking out the money, as he would be entitled to do if it were paid in in respect of a particular liability with an admission. The Judicature Acts and rules do not sanction that.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I also agree.

OGDENS (LIMITED) v. NELSON.
SAME v. TELFORD. (a.)

Contract — Construction — Agreement to participate in profits of business for a specific period—Sale of business within such period—Implied stipulation not to so sell.

By a contract made between the plaintiffs, wholesale tobacconists, and the defendants, retail tobacconists, in consideration of a promise by the defendants to become customers of the plaintiffs, and not to sign any agreement with any company or firm which would prevent them from buying or selling the goods of the plaintiffs, and to continue to buy and sell the plaintiffs' goods, the plaintiffs agreed that the defendants should for four years share in a distribution by the plaintiffs of an annual bonus among such of their customers as should purchase direct from them, the distribution to be made according to the purchases for the year.

Before the four years had expired the plaintiffs sold their business to third persons and went into liquidation. In an action for the price of goods sold to them, the defendants counterclaimed against the plaintiffs for damages for breach of the contract.

Held, that upon the true construction of the contract there was implied an undertaking on the part of the plaintiffs that they would not discontinue to carry on business during the term of four years, so as to prevent the defendants from earning their share of the bonus and that the defendants were, therefore, entitled to damages for breach of the contract.

Judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (51 W. R. 696, [1903] 2 K. B. 287), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the considered judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., at the trial of the two actions without a jury: 51 W. R. 696, [1903] 2 K. B. 287.

The actions were brought by Ogdens (Limited), a company in liquidation, to recover the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendants, who were retail tobacconists.

The defendants admitted the plaintiffs' claim, but counterclaimed for damages for breach of agreement under the following circumstances.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Prior to the month of March, 1902, there had been considerable agitation in the retail tobacco trade respecting an alleged attempt by the plaintiffs to obtain control of the retail tobacco trade in the United Kingdom.

This agitation led to the formation of a company called the Imperial Tobacco Co. of Great Britain and Ireland (Limited), which had offered to various tobacco dealers, including the defendants, in consideration of their selling the goods of the company and undertaking not to buy any goods of the plaintiffs and certain other companies, a share in a bonus of £50,000 and a share of certain expected profits in the Imperial Tobacco Co.

The offers of the Imperial Tobacco Co. led to a counter-offer by the plaintiffs, which was accepted by the defendants, and the offer and acceptance constituted the agreement in respect of which the defendants counterclaimed.

The plaintiffs' offer was sent out as a circular, in March, 1902, to retail tobacconists as follows:

"Bonus Distribution.—Our entire net profits and £200,000 per year for the next four years. Commencing the 2nd of April, 1902, we will for the next four years distribute to such of our customers in the United Kingdom as purchase direct from us our entire net profits on the goods sold by us in the United Kingdom. In addition to the above, we will, commencing the 2nd of April, 1902, for the next four years distribute to such of our customers as purchase direct from us the sum of £200,000 per year. Distribution of net profits will be made as soon after the 2nd of April, 1903, and annually thereafter, as the accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases made during the year. Distribution as to the £200,000 will be made every three months, the first distribution to take place as soon after the 2nd of July, 1902, as accounts can be audited, and will be in proportion to the purchases during the three months' period. To participate in this offer we do not ask you to boycott the goods of any other manufacturer."

Accompanying this circular there was a form of contract, as follows:

"Messrs. Ogdens (Limited), Liverpool.—Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that I have not signed the agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Co. (Limited), dated March, 1902, and in consideration of participating in your bonus distribution of the entire net profits on goods sold by you in the United Kingdom, and £200,000 per year, for the next four years, as set out in your particulars, I hereby agree not to sign it or any similar agreement with the Imperial Tobacco Co. (Limited), or any other company or firm, containing any conditions which would prevent me from buying, displaying, selling, or distributing your goods or the goods of any other manufacturer, and I also undertake to continue to buy, display, and sell your goods."

The defendant signed this contract and sent it to the plaintiffs.

Pursuant to the bargain so made, the defendants dealt with the plaintiffs, and in July, 1902, they each received a share of £50,000, being one-quarter of the £200,000, for the three months ending the 2nd of July, 1902; and they also received credit in account for their share of that bonus for the three months ending the 2nd of October, 1902; but they did not receive any share of the entire net profits on the goods sold by the plaintiffs in the United Kingdom.

In September, 1902, the plaintiffs sold their business in the United Kingdom to the Imperial Tobacco Co., and they informed the defendants and their other customers of that fact; they ceased to carry on any business in the United Kingdom, and went into voluntary liquidation.

The defendants admitted the claim for the price of goods sold. By their counterclaim the defendants alleged that the plaintiffs had broken the contract by ceasing to carry on business, and they claimed damages for that breach. It was agreed that the plaintiffs had not made any net profits during the period from the 2nd of April to the 2nd of October, 1902.

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., in giving judgment in favour of the defendants on their counterclaim, held that it was an implied term of the contract that the plaintiffs would continue to carry on their business during the full period of four years, and would not during that period do any act disabling themselves from earning profits or preventing the defendants from being their customers, and that the defendants were entitled to damages.

From this judgment the plaintiffs now appealed.

Asquith, K.C., and Duke, K.C. (F. E. Smith with them), for the appellants.

Bankes, K.C. (J. R. Randolph with him), for the respondents.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment of the court.

The following cases were referred to: Rhodes v. Forwood, 24 W. R. 1078, 1 A. C. 256; The Moorcock, 37 W. R. 439, 14 P. D. 64; McIntyre v. Belcher, 11 W. R. 889, 14 C. B. N. B. 253; and Northey v. Trevillion, 7 Com. Cas. 201.

COLLINS, M.R.—This appeal raises the question whether, upon the true construction of the agreement, the plaintiffs are emancipated from the obligation of paying certain sums of money which would be payable by them if they carried on their business, and whether they have emancipated themselves from that obligation by selling their business. Now, the question arises in this way: Ogdens (Limited) had formed a scheme for what is called "capturing the tobacco trade." They were confronted by a very powerful opposition to that scheme by a counter-scheme on somewhat similar lines by the Imperial Tobacco Co. In the throes of this competition each of these competitors kept offering better and better terms to customers. It was exceedingly important from the point of view of each of them to counterwork the machinations of the other, and Ogdens, in view of the competition of the Imperial Co., which had it been persisted in might have thwarted their scheme, thought it worth their while to make the arrangement which I will presently read. Accordingly they sent a a circular round in which they invite the attention of customers to the terms that were offered by the Imperial Co. and pointed out how much better the terms were which they themselves were prepared to offer. [His lordship here read the circular above set out.] Then comes the draft letter which the would-be customer was invited to sign, and which, in point of fact, was signed by the defendants in this case, and which accompanied the circular. [His lordship here read the letter as set out above.] Now, when the would-be customer signs that document Ogdens procure by his signature an undertaking which absolutely severs him from the opposing scheme and obliges him to abstain from making or signing any agreement which would prevent him from dealing with Ogdens. So that they secure at once and on the spot without anything further his secession from the opposing combination and his obligation and undertaking not to join it. That in itself is the most essential part of the whole thing from their point of view, having regard to the internecine contest which was then being waged. But are they entitled to give no return for that? Are they entitled to receive that benefit and at the same time hold in their own hands the power of destroying the conditions which make it impossible for them to return that which they are bound to return for the consideration which has been exacted to the extent I have described? What do they propose to give in return and what do they undertake with him that he is to get? The contract seems to me, on the face of it, a contract whereby a present advantage is secured absolutely and unconditionally by the secession of this customer from the opposing camp and his undertaking to give his custom to them, and there is an absolute undertaking on their part in return for that, during a period, which is to extend for four years, to do two things—viz., to make an absolute distribution of their net profits, and to distribute also as bonus the sum of £200,000 per annum. It is said that notwithstanding the fact that the consideration on the part of the customer was, to the extent that I have named, executed, and notwithstanding that according to the distinct terms of the contract, Ogdens have undertaken to give in return this fixed sum of money, yet it is in their power the next day, or as soon afterwards as convenient, to dispose of their business, and then to turn round to the would-be customer and say that inasmuch as they have disposed of their business they cannot make any profits, and therefore they have no bonus to distribute; that they have not undertaken anywhere in the terms of their contract to go on with their business, and that unless they go on with their business there cannot be a customer, and unless there is a customer they are under no obligation to pay a bonus. I think counsel for the appellants has himself furnished a strong argument upon this matter. He says that the weakness of the opposing party is that they are obliged to rely upon an implication and not upon an actual contract, that they are obliged to rely upon an implied undertaking to carry on the business. That goes too far, for it would follow that even when the business was still being carried on by Ogdens, if the customer had come and said to them: "Give me so much tobacco; I propose buying so much tobacco from you!" Ogdens might say in return: "No; we are not going to sell you any tobacco," and properly refuse to do so. That would have defeated the position of the would-be customer, because if he could not get them to sell any to him he was not a customer, and they would have been entitled to avail themselves of the same argument which is now put forward on their behalf: "We come under no obligation to pay anybody who is not a customer, and inasmuch as we have no intention of dealing with you, you cannot make yourself a customer; and, therefore, although we have got from you what you promised to give us, we are absolved from the obligation of admitting you to deal with us, and therefore from the obligation of paying you anything on the footing that you are our customer." The argument would be exactly the same, and just as strong, if they superadded the breach of an implied understanding that he was to be served when he asked for tobacco. It seems to me that, à fortiori, if the customer is entitled to read into the contract an implied promise by Ogdens while they are carrying on business to sell tobacco to the person who signs the contract, so that they are not entitled by any act of theirs to keep him out of the category of customers, they are equally responsible if by any act of theirs they prevent him from continuing to be a customer.

There is a long line of authorities upon questions of this kind; and there is a distinct line of demarcation running through those authorities, some falling on one side of the line and some on the other side of the line; most of them fall on this side of the line. The broad general principle to be deduced from those cases is, that a person cannot receive the consideration for a contract, when that consideration implies that he will continue to do something, without being subject to an implied obligation to continue to keep in existence the conditions which make it possible. There are many authorities for that proposition. For instance, in cases where a business is sold and is to be paid for out of the profits of that business, there is a clear obligation on the purchaser to continue to carry on the business so that profits can be made, out of which the purchase-money may be paid. That is the broad general principle, and it is applicable to the present case. In this case the consideration was executed in a great part, the defendant Nelson having signed the undertaking not to join the opposition. Having got that executed consideration, Ogdens were in the same position as a person who has bought a business and has contracted to pay for it out of the profits; that is, there is the same obligation upon them not to make it impossible to pay out of profits. It is contended on behalf of Ogdens that there is the authority of a case in the House of Lords to the contrary, Rhodes v. Forwood. When that case is carefully considered, it appears to have been a peculiar case depending upon the special circumstances. The substance of that case was that the defendants had appointed the plaintiff as their sole agent at a particular place for the sale of their coals for seven years, and there was no agreement obliging the defendants to sell any coals at all through that agent at that place; they were free to sell all their coals elsewhere. The defendants afterward sold their business, and it was held that the plaintiff was not entitled to say that the defendants were bound to carry on their business for the seven years because there was no special agreement to furnish him as their agent with any coals at all. In was held that on the true construction of the contract in that case there was no obligation to sell any coals at all through that agent. That case was decided upon the special terms of the contract. When that case had been criticized and distinguished in later cases, it had been said that it was decided upon the ground that there was no absolute contract to employ the plaintiff as agent at all. It was so distinguished in Turner v. Goldsmith by Lindley, L.J., from whose judgment I will read a short passage. He said: "It was contended that the point was settled by authority. I will refer to three cases on the subject. In Rhodes v. Forwood it was held that an action very similar to the present was not maintainable. But that case went on the ground that, there not being any express contract to employ the agent, such a contract could not be implied. In the present case we find an express contract to employ him." For the reasons which I have given, I think that the present case falls outside the narrow line laid down in Rhodes v. Forwood. The consideration was executed, and there was a contract absolute in its terms to pay the bonus for a period of four years. It seems to me that, therefore, the circumstances necessarily imply that the party giving the undertaking to pay cannot free himself from the obligation before the end of the term by getting rid of the business. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. After what the Master of the Rolls has said about the authorities, in which I entirely concur, I do not think that it is necessary for me to discuss them. Those authorities, so far as they lay down any principle upon which the courts should act, show that in a case like this the question is, What is the true construction of the contract itself? As to this contract, it is to be noticed that, for the benefit of the plaintiffs, the defendants at once gave valuable consideration, for they contracted with the plaintiffs in the first place not to sign the agreement of the Imperial Co., and also further contracted not to sign any similar agreement with the Imperial Co., or with any other firm or company containing any conditions which would prevent them from buying, displaying, selling, or distributing the plaintiffs' goods. For present purposes I need not pause to consider the extent of the obligation upon the defendants under the last condition of the contract. What do we find in the contract entered into by the plaintiffs? It appears to me that the plaintiffs made certain absolute terms with the defendants. In the first place, they absolutely contracted for the period of four years to distribute to their customers their entire net profits on the goods sold by them in the United Kingdom; they further contracted, and this is even more important for this purpose, for the period of four years to distribute to their customers the sum of £200,000 a year; and then followed the conditions as to distribution. That agreement by the plaintiffs is absolute in form, and I think that it is absolute in substance. The obligations undertaken by Ogdens were intended to bind them for the term of four years. It appears to me that, in this contract, when fairly construed, there cannot be implied in favour of Ogdens that after it was made they should be at liberty, as against the defendants, at their own free will to stop selling their goods in the United Kingdom during the four years, or to do any voluntary act which would make it impossible to distribute the sums which they had so contracted to distribute. That really determines this case, for in consequence there has been a breach of contract by Ogdens. Their assignment of their business was clearly a voluntary act, which prevented the defendants from obtaining any part of the sums contracted to be paid by Ogdens. Therefore there was clearly a breach of contract for which the defendants are entitled to recover substantial damages. This appeal, therefore, fails, and must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We must ascertain what was the common intent of the parties. It is said on behalf of the plaintiffs that the true implication is that the contract was optional, and was only binding so long as they chose to carry on business. On behalf of the defendants it is contended that there was an absolute contract to carry on business for four years, and that that was the intention of the parties. Upon considering the terms of the contract, it seems to me to be clear that the latter contention is the right one. The true meaning of the contract is that, if the defendants will deal with the plaintiffs and sign the proposed agreement, the plaintiffs will for four years distribute this money among their customers, and that they bind themselves to do so. I think that that is the contract between the parties, and that the plaintiffs cannot get out of it by parting with their business. By parting with their business they have committed a breach of contract, and the defendants are entitled to damages. Counsel for the plaintiffs have tried to bring this case within the authority of Rhodes v. Forwood and Hamlyn v. Wood. In those cases it was held upon the terms of the particular contract in question that they were purely optional.

Those two cases stand alone, and are quite different from the present case. The alleged inconsistency in the authorities is, in my opinion, more apparent than real. I think that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS v. TOZER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Statute—Interpretation—Teignmouth Harbour Act, 1853 (16 Vict. c. xxxvi.)

The word "person," when used in a statute, does not include corporation where the statute contains expressions that are repugnant to that construction: Thus, under a statute providing that the persons present at a meeting may vote, but that a proxy shall not be admitted, a corporation, though a person in law, is debarred from voting.

Action.

The Teignmouth Harbour Act, 1853 (16 Vict. c. xxxvi.), provides that a certain number of the harbour commissioners are to be elected by the harbour ratepayers; that is to say, by persons who reside in specified parishes and who pay harbour rates and dues. Both the plaintiff and the defendants were harbour ratepayers, one of the defendants being a joint stock company, and the plaintiff asked that the harbour commissioners should be restrained from placing on the voting list of harbour ratepayers the name of any corporate body or of any member or officer thereof as representing the corporate body, and also for a declaration negativing the right of a corporate body, or of any member or officer thereof as representing the corporate body, to vote at an election of harbour commissioners.

The Harbour Act (inter alia) provides by the incorporation of the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, that the word "person" when used in the Act was to include a corporation unless the context was repugnant to that construction; and also that the harbour commissioners should be elected at a meeting of the harbour ratepayers by a majority of the votes of the persons present" at the meeting for election, and that the votes might be given in writing under the hands of the voters, but that no proxy was to be admitted.

Butcher, K.C., and S. G. Lushington.—A corporation cannot be present at an election, cannot give a vote in writing, and the Act bars voting by proxy.

They cited Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association (Limited), 5 App. Cas. 857.

Upjohn, K.C., Wright Taylor, and Rayner Goddard.—A corporation may vote under its corporate seal and appoint an agent to hand in the vote; that would not be by "proxy." The "persons" present referred only to "natural" persons who could fulfil the proviso of the section.

They cited Corts v. Kent Waterworks Co., 7 B. & C. 314.

FARWELL, J.—The language of section 6 of the principal Act precludes me from construing "persons" as including corporate bodies. Voting by proxy is therein expressly barred, and this excludes any method by which a corporation can vote. From the language used in sections 20 and 25 of the Public Health Act of 1848 it must be inferred that a proxy is the appropriate means by which a corporation may vote, but the language of the principal Act seems to show that the voters must be natural persons who, after hearing a discussion, may exercise the right of voting. I am supported in this conclusion by Lord Selborne's words in Pharmaceutical Society v. The London and Provincial Supply Association (Limited), 5 App. Cas., at p. 862. I can only declare that a corporate body or an officer or member thereof as representing such body is not entitled to vote at an election of harbour commissioners.

Company— Winding up— Claim for debt— Creditor resident abroad — Security for costs — Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, r. 201.

A person resident abroad claiming by summons as creditor in the voluntary winding up of a company must give security for costs, the ordinary practice of the High Court, and not that of bankruptcy, being applicable under rule 201 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903.

Motion.

The above company, being in course of voluntary winding up, Mr. Jan Volker, of Haarlem, in Holland, on the 16th of April, 1904, applied by originating summons under section 138 of the Companies Act, 1900, against the liquidators for a declaration that he was entitled to prove for £120 in respect of an alleged debt due to him.

On the 30th of April, 1904, the liquidators took out a summons asking that Mr. Volker might be ordered to give security for costs in the sum of £25, upon the ground that he was resident abroad. The registrar before whom the matter came refused to make the order.

This was a motion on the part of the liquidators that the order of the registrar might be discharged, and that the security for costs should be ordered to be given.

Younger, K.C., and H. C. Bischoff, for the liquidators.—Rule 201 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, directs that where no special provision is made by the Act or rules, the practice of the High Court shall be followed. No special provision is made by this Act or rules as to security for costs, and the practice of the High Court is to order security for costs in all but exceptional cases where the plaintiff is resident abroad: Crozat v. Brogden, 42 W. R. 353, [1894] 2 Q. B. 30; Fontaine's case, In re Howe Machine Co., 37

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

W. R. 680, 41 Ch. D. 118, which latter was a case of a claim made in the winding up of a company. The cases decided in bankruptcy proceedings, such as In re Semenza, 42 W. R. 241, [1894] 1 Q. B. 15, do not apply, as the Bankruptcy Rules deal specially with the question.

W. R. Bisschop, for the claiming creditor.—The rule in bankruptcy is that the court has a discretion, and does not necessarily order security for costs to be given where the plaintiff is abroad, except in extreme cases. The practice in bankruptcy should be followed, as bankruptcy is analogous to winding up. There are no special circumstances in this case to justify the order asked for.

BUCKLEY, J.—Section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, as amended by section 25 of the Companies Act, 1900, has provided a creditor in a voluntary winding up with a short and speedy method of establishing his claim by summons. The claimant has availed himself of this method, instead of proceeding by action. In the latter case he would have been required to give security for costs, as he is resident out of the jurisdiction. It would seem strange if, that being so, he should not have to give security when proceeding by summons. The general rule of practice in the High Court as to ordering security for costs is that if there are not special circumstances—e.g., where the action is a cross-action, or where the defendant has money of the plaintiff or actor in his hands, or where the plaintiff or actor has substantial means within the jurisdiction which can be reached, the order for security will be made. Rule 201 of the Companies (Winding-up) Rules, 1903, has provided that "in all proceedings in or before the court, or any judge, registrar, or officer thereof, or over which the court has jurisdiction under the Acts and rules, where no other provision is made by the Acts or rules, the practice, procedure, and regulations shall, unless the court otherwise in any special case directs, in the High Court be in accordance with the rules of the Supreme Court and practice of the High Court." No special provision is made in these rules as to giving security for costs, and the ordinary practice of the High Court therefore seems to apply. But it is said that the claim in this case is analogous to a claim in bankruptcy, and that the rules of bankruptcy as to security for costs should be followed. In bankruptcy, however, there are special rules dealing with the matter, rules 131 and 148, and in In re Semenza the Court of Appeal refused to make the order because it considered that the existence of these rules showed that in cases which did not fall within them the order for security should not be made. But there are no rules in companies' winding up equivalent to those in bankruptcy. I think, then, that the ordinary rules of the High Court apply, and that Mr. Volker must give security for costs to the amount of £25.

PEASE v. COURTNEY. (a.)

Settled land—Powers of tenant for life—Restrictions—Agreement for lease—Park—"Usually occupied" with principal mansion-house — Easement — Damages—Settled Land Acts, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 6, 7, 31, 54; and 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 10.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The word "park" is not used in the Settled Land Acts in a legal or technical sense, but with the meaning attached to it in common parlance.

The words "usually occupied therewith" in section 10 of the Act of 1890 do not qualify the preceding words, "pleasure-grounds and park," but only the words "and lands (if any)," which they immediately follow.

A tenant for life agreed in writing not under seal to let a farm of 309 acres, of which fifty-five acres adjoined the principal mansion-house on the estate, and was called a park, and to supply the tenants gratuitously with water from a tower erected for supplying the mansion. No consent of trustees or order of court had been obtained. The tenants had not investigated the title of the intending lessor, who had since died, nor had they applied for a formal lease, but they had gone into occupation.

Held, that the park was within section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, whether it was or was not usually occupied with the principal mansion-house; that, consequently, the agreement, in the absence of consent of trustees or order of the court, was invalid; and that the tenants were not entitled to damages against the executrix of the deceased tenant for life.

Held, also (following Sutherland v. Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169), that the instrument was invalid as being an agreement to grant an easement over the principal mansion-house.

This was the trial of an action by a tenant for life and infant remainderman to set aside, as invalid under section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, an agreement for a lease entered into by a former tenant for life under the settlement, and purporting to be in exercise of the powers of section 6 of the Settled Land Act, 1882.

By his will, dated the 9th of May, 1893, John B. Barkworth devised the South Leigh Estate and other lands in the parish of Warblington to the use of his wife, Martha D. Barkworth, for life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to his grandson, Joseph Robinson Pease (one of the plaintiffs), for life without impeachment of waste, remainder to the first and every other son of the said J. R. Pease successively in tail, with remainders over. Mr. Barkworth died the 19th of October, 1893.

The South Leigh Estate had been purchased by J. B. Barkworth, the settlor—the greater part in March, 1890, and the rest in January, 1891. It comprised a mansion-house, which, apart from the questions raised in this action, was a "principal mansion-house" within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts, and a farm called South Leigh Farm, and the total acreage of the estate was about 356 acres, part of which was described in the particulars of sale as a beautifully timbered park of about 55 acres. At the time of the purchase a fence or hedge divided the upper park (being that part of the 55 acres nearest to the mansion and measuring about 13 acres) from the lower park, which was then occupied by one Gill as tenant on a yearly agreement. Mr. Barkworth determined this tenancy as from Lady-day, 1892, and caused the hedge to be grubbed up. After this several persons appeared to have paid money for the use of the park, but the evidence was conflicting as to whether they had exclusive possession or only the right of grazing.

By an instrument not under seal dated the 30th of September, 1902, Mrs. Martha Barkworth, then tenant for life in possession, agreed to let South Leigh Farm, with 309 acres of land (including the above-mentioned 55 acres), to the defendants for seven or fourteen years, from the 29th of September, 1902, the tenancy to be determinable at the end of the seventh year by twelve months' previous notice. The agreement contained a proviso that the supply of water to the farm from a tower erected for supplying the mansion should be continued without charge to the tenants, except that they were to keep the taps, joints, and pipes in repair above ground.

The agreement contained no provisions for the showing or investigation of the lessor's title. The defendants entered upon the farm, and paid various sums for the goodwill and for the stock and tillages on a valuation. No consent of the trustees of the settlement or order of the court in respect of the letting had been obtained. Mrs. Barkworth died on the 25th of October, 1902, without having executed or been asked to execute a formal lease.

The plaintiff, J. R. Pease, thereupon entered into possession of the estate as tenant for life, and served a notice on the defendants to deliver up possession; and on their refusal he commenced this action, in which his infant son was also a plaintiff, to recover possession of the premises comprised in the agreement.

The plaintiffs' contention was that the agreement was void, since, without the formalities required by section 10 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, it purported to be a contract for a lease of (inter alia) a park usually occupied with the principal mansion-house, and also to grant an easement over the principal mansion-house in respect of the supply of water.

The defendants denied that the park or any part of it was usually occupied with the mansion-house; but, even if it were, they submitted that the agreement was good in part. They pleaded that they had entered into the agreement in reliance on the description of the premises as a farm, and in good faith, and they claimed the benefit of sections 7, 31, and 54 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. They counterclaimed against the plaintiff tenant for life for specific performance by the execution of a lease, either for the the whole of the premises or of part, with an allowance of rent in respect of such part as to which the agreement might be held invalid; and they also counterclaimed against the executrix of the late tenant for life for damages in case of dispossession.

Micklem, K.C., and E. Ff. Ball, for the plaintiffs.

J. Rolt (Cave, K.C., with him), for the defendants.—The reasonable interpretation of section 10 is to read the words "pleasure grounds and park and lands (if any) usually occupied therewith" as one sentence. When Mr. Barkworth bought this property there was no park, but two fields divided by a fence. The "finely-timbered park" of the particulars of sale must have been the 13 acres; the land on the other side of the fence was let to Gill. If the contention on the part of the plaintiffs is right it comes to this: that any piece of grass land near a principal mansion-house and with a few trees on it may be within the prohibition, unless the court is to distinguish field from field and determine, without a guide, what field is to be called a park. If it was the intention of the Act that a park per se was to be excluded there would have been a definition of the word; but there is nothing to show what the "park" is that is excluded. It could not be the intention to leave the court to decide in each case. As to the other point, the utmost that could be said to be occupied with the mansion-house when Barkworth bought was the north part, the 13 acres, and of this he let the grazing. The rest was in the occupation of Gill, and when he left and Mr. Barkworth grubbed up the fence he treated the whole in the way the lower park had been treated, and let it on a yearly tenancy to Hoare. It is true that Hoare used it for grazing, but that was because it suited his purpose to do so; he had exclusive possession and was under no restrictions, and when Mr. Barkworth wanted to drive through in his pony carriage he sent and asked leave of Hoare. He would not have done this in the case of a mere agister. I submit, then, that at the death of the settlor—which is the critical time—he had thrown the two portions into one, thus changing the character of the upper park previously kept in hand; and had shewn by the way he let to Hoare that he did not intend to occupy any part with the mansion-house. This is sufficient to exclude the park from section 10 (2). If the court is against me on that, I submit that the upper park alone was occupied with the mansion at the settlor's death, and that we are entitled to the rest, in the same way that where a person with power to lease for twenty-one years grants a lease for forty, the lease has been held invalid only as regards the excess: Campbell v. Leach, Ambl. 740; Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. sen., at p. 644. As to the waterworks, the supply of water is an authorized improvement under section 25 of the Act of 1882, and there is nothing in that section to limit the authorized improvements to land not occupied with the mansion-house. Suppose in making the improvement the pipes were carried through land occupied with the mansion-house, would that be a contravention of section 10, so that the whole work would be thrown away? This is not like the case of Sutherland v. Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893] 3 Ch. 169, where the easement consisted of a right in the lessee to drive all over the park and land usually occupied with the principal mansion-house, and the lease was held bad altogether as having been granted mala fide, that is not the case here. A strong argument in our favour is that the farm is useless without the supply of water. If the agreement is held invalid we are entitled to compensation. An agreement to grant a lease is an agreement to grant a valid lease: Stranks v. St. John, 15 W. R. 678, L. R. 2 C. P. 376. Mrs. Barkworth committed a breach of contract in not obtaining the consent of the trustees, which it was her duty and not that of the defendants to do, and the defendants are therefore entitled to substantial damages (Day v. Singleton, 48 W. R. 18, [1899] 2 Ch. 320), or at all events to damages in respect of the expenses incurred: Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158.

Clauson (Eve, K.C., with him), for Mrs. Barkworth's executrix.—If the defendants had applied for a lease it would only have contained a qualified covenant for quiet enjoyment, and they could have claimed no damages when the lease came to an end. They went into possession without investigating the title and impliedly accepted it.

Micklem, K.C., for J. R. Pease, on the counterclaim.

Rolt replied on the counterclaim.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J., after stating the circumstances, said: Assuming that the property comprises a mansion-house, pleasure grounds, park and other lands, the plaintiffs object to the validity of the contract on the ground that, having regard to section 10 of the Act of 1890, the tenant for life could not validly contract to grant the lease in question without the consent of the trustees or an order of the court. Neither of these has been obtained; but the contention is raised on behalf of the defendants that the lease is not forbidden by the section, because the park is not usually occupied with the mansion-house, and it is said that to bring the case within the section it would be necessary that the pleasure grounds and park and other lands all ought to be usually occupied with the mansion-house. On the other hand it is contended that "usually occupied therewith" in section 10 (2) applies only to "lands (if any)" and not to pleasure grounds and park. In my opinion the latter is the true construction, and I think this appears from the language used: "Notwithstanding anything contained in the Act of 1882, the principal mansion-house (if any) and the pleasure grounds and park"—and then "and lands (if any) usually occupied therewith . . ." It is to be observed that the conjunction occurs between the first and second as well as between the second and third of the nouns, and in my opinion, having regard to the grammatical context, "usually occupied therewith" applies only to "lands (if any)." This is in accordance with the repealed section 15 of the Act of 1882, which provides that "Notwithstanding anything in this Act the principal mansion-house on any settled land, and the demesnes thereof, and other lands usually occupied therewith, shall not be sold or leased by the tenant for life without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court." The words "demesnes thereof" were in section 10 of the Act of 1890 expanded into the phrase "pleasure grounds and park." Under the circumstances, and apart from any question of fact as to whether the park was or was not usually occupied with the mansion-house, I am of opinion that the tenant for life had no right to let it without the consent of the trustees or an order of the court.

Then it was contended on behalf of the defendant lessees that the park in question is not a park at all, and that the word as used in the Settled Land Acts means the ancient legal park known to the common law. It was said, and truly said, that such a park required at all events three things—vert, venison, and enclosure—and it was said that a grant of the Crown or prescription was also necessary. Without considering the last assertion, it is certainly clear that vert, venison, and enclosure are necessary to a legal park.

In Sir Charles Howard's case, Cro. Car. 59, where the king, being seised in fee of a park, granted officium custodis to Sir Charles, and afterwards by letters patent under the Great Seal granted away all the deer in the park, all the judges and the barons of the Exchequer met together to determine the question (inter alia) "whether those letters patent be a dissolving of the park," and they all agreed "That the park is well dissolved, and shall be no more accounted a park, all the deer being destroyed; for a park consisteth of vert and venison and enclosure, and if it be determined in any of them it is a total disparking; and notwithstanding the grant of the office the owner may well dispark it." But it seems to me abundantly clear that "park" in the Settled Land Acts is not used in the legal or technical sense, but according to its meaning in common parlance. In the Imperial Dictionary, after defining "park" in the legal sense, a second meaning is given, viz., "a considerable extent of pasture and woodland surrounding or adjoining a mansion-house, devoted to purposes of recreation or enjoyment, but chiefly to the support of a herd of deer, though sometimes to cattle and sheep." There is also a third meaning given, viz., "any piece of public ground, generally in or near a large town, laid out and cultivated for the sole purpose of pleasure and recreation, without any regard to the size of the ground or the style of the arrangement."

It is in the second sense that the word is used in the Settled Land Acts. The land here in question consists of a piece of ancient pasture of over fifty acres with a considerable quantity of ornamental timber, and with forest trees of an ornamental character standing out in the open and not confined to the hedgerows and of great size according to the photographs and the evidence. I have therefore no doubt that this is a park within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts.

It will be observed that sub-section 3 of section 10 could not have the effect of excluding property under twenty-five acres from being called a park unless the site of the house and the pleasure grounds and park and lands usually occupied therewith did not together exceed twenty-five acres; anything where that limit is exceeded is, as regards area, entitled to be called a park.

If it were necessary to determine whether the upper and lower park were occupied with the mansion-house I should say that they were. [His lordship reviewed the evidence on this point, and came to the conclusion that the settlor never let either the upper or the lower park, but merely allowed the grass to be fed off.]

The agreement is said to be invalid on another ground—namely, that there is no power to grant an easement over the mansion-house, and that according to the contract the water supply from the tower to the farm and buildings is to be continued free of any cost to the tenants except that they shall keep all taps, joints, and pipes in repair above ground.

Now, it appears that when the settlor died the farm and lands were supplied with water from wells and a pond. After his death the widow, then tenant for life, laid on a water supply, from the water supply to the mansion, to a small farmhouse and other parts of the land. The mansion is supplied by a large reservoir, the water being pumped by an engine to the top of the tower. When the mansion is not occupied the engine is not at work, but it would be necessary to work it if this obligation to supply the farm were to have effect. In my opinion this provision binding successive owners to keep the engine working is one that a tenant for life is not entitled to insert in an agreement. It is true that section 10 of the Act of 1890 does not prohibit the granting of an easement, but it was decided by Romer, J., in Sutherland v. Sutherland, 42 W. R. 12, [1893], 3 Ch. 169, 194, that "although section 10 does not repeat the words in section 6 (the leasing section) of the Act of 1882 'or any part thereof, or any easement, right, or privilege of any kind over or in relation to the same,' it has the same operation and effect as if those words had been repeated." "It would indeed," said Romer, J., "be absurd if a tenant for life could not, without the consent of the trustees of the settlement or an order of the court, sell or lease the mansion-house, but could nevertheless, without such consent or order, sell or lease a part of it or an easement over it." On that additional ground it appears to me that the agreement for a lease is invalid.

On these grounds it follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that the agreement for a lease is invalid as against them, and to an order for delivery of possession, and for mesne profits on the footing of the existing rent.

Then as to the counterclaim. That part of it which asks for specific performance against the plaintiffs by the granting of a lease of course fails. In the alternative there is a claim for damages against the executrix of the late tenant for life. It is said that an agreement to grant a lease means an agreement to grant a valid lease, and that as by reason of the objections upon which the plaintiffs have succeeded no valid lease can now be granted, the estate of the late tenant for life is liable. The agreement contains no provisions for showing a good title by the lessor or for allowing investigation of title, and it was said that the tenant for life ought to have applied to the trustees for their consent to the agreement, and that because this was not done her estate is liable in damages, and Day v. Singleton, 48 W. R. 18, [1899] 2 Ch. 328, was relied on. Now in Day v. Singleton what happened was that the defendant induced the lessors to refuse their consent to the assignment, and the plaintiff, the purchaser, thus lost his bargain. Lindley, L.J., said (p. 328), "But if Singleton could have got the lessor's consent, and would not—still more if the refusal of that consent was procured by Singleton—Day would have had a right of action for damages against Singleton for a breach of his duty to obtain the lessors' consent, it being in his power to obtain it."

Of course if the consent could not have been obtained the case would come within Bain v. Fothergill, 23 W. R. 261, L. R. 7 H. L. 158, where it was held that the damages must be confined to the expenses actually incurred.

Now, in the present case it does not appear that the defendants ever asked for a lease. The tenant for life died twenty-five days after signing the agreement without any application having been made to her for the lease. If it is a case in which, as is suggested, the trustees would have given their consent if applied to for it, why should they not give it to a lease by the next tenant for lif? There was no breach of contract whatever by the tenant for life in her lifetime. The defendants never stipulated for the right to investigate her title, and if a lease had been granted they would only have had a qualified covenant for quiet enjoyment on which they could not have recovered damages when the lease came to an end. In my opinion, the defendant, executrix of the late tenant for life, is under no liability whatever in regard to the lease. It is not a case of total failure of consideraton, for the tenants have entered under the agreement and have been in occupation for nearly two years. The counterclaim wholly fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Food and drugs—Practice—Institution of prosecution—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 54), s. 19 (1).

By section 19 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1899, it is provided: "Where any article of food or drug has been purchased from any person for test purposes, any prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act in respect of the sale thereof shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of purchase."

*Held, that the laying of the information was the institution of the prosecution, and not the service of the summons.

On the 18th of July, 1903, an information was laid by the appellant, who is an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, against the respondent, who is a farmer at Chalfont.

The information charged the respondent that on the 23rd of June, 1903, he unlawfully sold to the appellant milk which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the appellant, being deficient in milk to the extent of 15 per cent.

The summons on this information was issued the same day, but it was not served on the respondent until the 22nd of July, 1903.

The summons was returnable on the 18th of August, and on that day the objection was taken that the prosecution had not been instituted within the time specified by section 19, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899.

The respondent contended that the service of the summons was the institution of the prosecution, and that as the summons was not served until after the expiration of more than twenty-eight days from the time of purchase the summons must be dismissed.

The appellant contended that the laying of the information was the institution of the prosecution, and that as that had been done within twenty-eight days, the prosecution was instituted within due time.

The magistrates upheld the respondent's contention and dismissed the summons, but stated this case for the opinion of the court.

Section 19, sub-section 1, of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, is as follows: "Where any article of food or drug has been purchased from any person for test purposes, any prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act in respect of the sale thereof, notwithstanding anything contained in section 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of purchase."

Randolph, for the appellant.—The laying of the information is the institution of the prosecution. That was clearly laid down in Thorpe v. Priestnall, 45 W. R. 223, [1897] 1 Q. B. 159, and that decision there governs this case.

J. A. Simon, for the respondent.—I agree that as a general rule the prosecution is instituted by laying an information, but before you can say that, you have to look at the general scheme of the Act. The object of the Act was to give the seller a chance of submitting the incriminated article to his own analysis if there was to be a prosecution. If the service was to be delayed the sample might have become unfit for analysis.

He referred to Ditcher v. Dennison, 11 Moo. P. C. Cas. 324; and Yates v. Reg., 33 W. R. 432, 14 Q. B. D. 648, at p. 661.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In spite of Mr. Simons' able argument, I think this appeal must be allowed. We are asked to put a limited construction on section 19 of the Act of 1899 and to say that because section 10 of the Act of 1879, which was replaced by the section now under consideration, required the service of the summons within a reasonable time, it ought to be looked at in order to see what was the intention of the Legislature in passing the section; and that as it refers explicitly to the service of the summons, the present section when it speaks of the institution of the prosecution must mean that the service of the summons is the institution of the prosecution. That is a dangerous argument, because it is open to the answer that by the alteration in the language used it was intended to repeal the old section, and to alter the time from which the period is to run from the service to the issue of the summons. Now, the words used in this section are general words, viz., a "prosecution shall not be instituted after the expiration of twenty-eight days from the time of purchase." Now, the laying of an information and the issue of a summons is the well-known way of commencing a prosecution, and it would require direct language to enable us to hold that the words institution of a prosecution did not mean the laying of an information. I think this appeal must therefore be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I agree. I think it impossible to collect from the language of section 19 whether it was really meant to continue the old proceeding or not, and that being so we have nothing to do but to follow the words of the present Act, which are quite clear. The commencement of a prosecution means the commencement of the proceedings by which a person is brought before the court, and there is nothing in this section which indicates a contrary intention. The case of Ditcher v. Dennison, which has been referred to, depended on the peculiarity of the proceedings in the ecclesiastical court.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. Nothing that has been urged upon us seems to me to justify us in treating the words of this section differently from the sense which has been given to them more than once before. The institution of a prosecution has always been taken as regards criminal law to mean the commencement of the proceedings, and not the service of the summons. In the cases on the Criminal Law Act, 1885, it has been clearly laid down that it is sufficient if the information is laid within the specified time, and the laying of the information, therefore, is the institution of the prosecution.

WALKERS, WINSER, & HANSON v. SHAW & CO. (a.)

Sale of goods—Quality not in accordance with sample—Right of buyer to reject—Custom limiting right—Validity of custom—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 76), ss. 15, 55.

A custom limiting the right of the buyer in a sale by sample to reject the goods on the ground that the bulk is not in accordance with the sample, to cases where the difference is excessive and unreasonable, and was so found by arbitration under the contract, is good in law, and is not void for unreasonableness or uncertainty, or on the ground that it contradicts the written contract.

Award stated in the form of a special case pursuant to section 7 (b) of the Arbitration Act, 1899, between the plaintiffs, who are grain merchants, carrying on business in London, and the defendants, who are grain merchants, carrying on business in Hull.

By a contract in writing dated the 1st of October, 1902, the plaintiffs agreed to sell, and the defendants agreed to buy, a quantity of about 500 tons of St. Malo barley, at time of shipment to be about as per sample 373 for shipment in October, 1902, at 23s. per cwt. free on board including freight and assurance to Hull, Grimsby, or Goole, the destination to be given when the ship was ready to sail.

Amongst the further terms of the contract it was provided that any shipment in partial execution of the contract is to be deemed and accepted as if made under a separate contract, that there should be no implied condition that the goods were free from latent defect, that any payment should be by net cash in London for invoice amount on presentation of, and in exchange for, bill of lading and policy of insurance, and that any dispute should be left to arbitration in London in the usual way.

The plaintiffs chartered the steamship Formby for the execution of the contract, and in pursuance of and in partial execution of the contract caused to be shipped from St. Malo 414 tons, 17cwt., 2qrs., and 4lbs. by the steamship Formby, and duly appropriated such shipment to the contract.

On the 8th of October, after the vessel was partially loaded, the defendants, having previously requested and received from St. Malo a bulk sample of the barley shipped by telegram, requested the plaintiffs to stop the shipment, alleging that the bulk sample differed from the selling sample, to which telegram the plaintiffs replied that they were unable to stop the shipment.

The Formby arrived at Hull on the 13th of October, 1902, but the defendants refused to accept the barley, and the matter was thereupon submitted to arbitration.

The arbitrator, after hearing the evidence on both sides, found that by the custom and usage of the London corn trade applicable to the sale of barley or other grain on contracts employed in the form employed in this case, a buyer was not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same is excessive or unreasonable, and is so found by arbitration under the contract. This had been the custom in the corn trade in London for a very long period, and it has been adopted as one of terms of the forms of contract for sale of barley and other grain since its incorporation in 1886, which forms were now largely used not only in the United Kingdom but also throughout the British colonies or possessions and on the continent of Europe and in America and elsewhere. The words inserted in the said forms of contract are "difference in quality shall not entitle the buyers to reject except under the award of arbitrators or the committee of appeal as the case may be"; a similar rule has been adopted by the Corn Trade Associations of Liverpool and Hull, as a rule in forms of contract issued by the associations.

He also found that the barley shipped per Formby, although somewhat inferior to the sale sample in quality, and in this respect not "as about as per sample," so as to entitle the sellers to insist on payment of the full contract price without any allowance, was commercially within the contract and the inferiority was not excessive or unreasonable, nor was it so great as to amount to a difference in description.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the above-named custom was good in law.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

CHANNELL, J.—I think the points of difficulty that arise in this case are mainly those which always arise when one tribunal has to review the decision of another tribunal, and has not the same jurisdiction to go into the whole matter as it was gone into below. I, sitting here, have merely power to review the decisions of these arbitrators so far as they deal with questions of law; questions of fact are still for the arbitrators, notwithstanding the alteration, so far as it is an alteration, in the recent Arbitration

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Act. The form in which the custom has been found by the arbitrator also raises a little difficulty. The custom that he finds is that in the London corn trade—the custom and usage of the London corn trade applicable to the sale of barley or other grain products in the form employed in this case. The form employed in this case is a contract to purchase barley to be shipped in Havre at a cost, freight and insurance price, with a clause providing that all disputes shall be settled by arbitration, without any clause, such as is stated to be put into the forms of contract settled by the Corn Trade Association, that the difference in quality shall not entitle the buyers to reject except under the award of arbitrators or the committee of appeal. Now, the arbitrator says that in such a contract there is a custom that the buyer is not entitled to reject for difference or variation in quality unless the same is excessive or unreasonable, and is so found under the contract. Now I should have come to the conclusion that this custom was unreasonable but for the qualification "unless the same is excessive or unreasonable." I think the true view is what I put in argument—viz., that you have not a right to reject merely for difference or variation in quality provided that difference or variation in quality can be met by an allowance in the price, but if the variation is such that the goods tendered are not available for the purpose for which in fact they were bought, then that variation would be an unreasonable variation, and one which a buyer would not be compelled to take merely at an allowance in the price. If that is the custom I do not see why it should not be given effect to in law. The law upon sale under such contracts is, of course, stereotyped in the Sale of Goods Act, and the two sections I have referred to deal with the matter, the 15th and 55th. Section 15, sub-section 2, says that in the case of a contract for sale by sample there is an implied condition; that there is not merely a warranty, but there is a condition, and therefore the buyer may reject if the thing tendered is not in accordance with the quality. But then the 55th section says that where any right, duty, or liability would arise under a contract of sale by implication of law—that, I think, clearly includes this case—it may be negatived (inter alia) by the usage if the usage be such as to bind both parties to the contract. Consequently there may be a usage which would prevent this implied condition arising, and alter it from being a condition into being a mere warranty. Upon that if there were no arbitration clause, damages could be recovered. If there is an arbitration clause, of course the matter would be settled by the arbitrator giving an allowance. Therefore, provided that there is a valid and effective usage in law, this implied condition as a condition is gone. It is then said that this custom is bad, firstly, because it contradicts the written contract. If it did, of course effect would not be given to it. But I think that that is answered by what was pointed out by counsel—viz., that this custom is in fact imported into a large number of contracts in this trade, and that when it is, then nobody contends that the contract cannot be given effect to, or that it makes the contract insensible. Therefore I do not think that it can be said that this custom is so inconsistent with the terms of the contract that it cannot be given effect to. If it went the length of saying "You shall have no remedy for any variation in the quality contracted for," that would be unreasonable, and would absolutely alter the nature of the contract. But that is not the custom. The custom simply is that you may take it with a variation in the price, and provided there is a limit to the custom in the way that I think there is by the words "unless the same is excessive or unreasonable," I do not see that that is inconsistent with the written contract.

The point whether it is reasonable is very nearly the same as that which I have been dealing with already. The suggestion is—and it is obvious—that if you have not got something of this sort in writing it is not fair between the parties, because one party has the option to reject when it is to his interest to do so by the market price having fallen, and he has also got the option to keep it when the price has gone the other way, notwithstanding the variation. It is said, and I think with some truth, that it is reasonable to have a custom which will prevent the rejection being claimed on the ground of a variation which does not affect the purpose for which the buyer wants to use the goods but only justly affects the price which he is to pay for it. If the custom is so limited it seems to me it cannot be said to be unreasonable. It is also said that it is unreasonable because it is uncertain, because it is a custom which may depend upon the idiosyncrasies of the arbitrator. But reasonableness, as was pointed out by counsel, is a thing which has to be considered in very many points arising in law, and there is no standard of reasonableness except that which a jury, which is the usual tribunal dealing with such matters, may think to be reasonable, and juries certainly have idiosyncrasies, sometimes very remarkable ones, quite as much as arbitrators, and I think it very likely that judges have also; so that when the reasonableness, as in the case of a custom, is for the judge and not for the jury, there may be a great variation of opinion according to what may be called the idiosyncrasies of the judge. I think, therefore, that the fact that this custom in its operation depends upon what the tribunal which has to deal with it thinks to be reasonable, does not make it uncertain in law so that it cannot have any effect given to it. That, therefore, disposes of the three points upon which it was contended by counsel that this custom cannot be given effect to.

[His lordship then considered the question whether the custom existed in fact, and held that, though he would not have come to the same conclusion himself, he could not see his way to interfere with the finding by the arbitrator that the custom did exist.]

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). THIRD PARTIES. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Indemnity—Contractor and sub-contractor—Right to sue—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 3; s. 4.

A contractor for the construction of a building entered into a contract with a sub-contractor whereby the latter agreed to execute part of the work. A workman in the employment of the sub-contractor was injured by an accident while at work on the building, and became entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. He claimed compensation under section 4 of the Act from the contractor, who agreed to pay him a certain weekly sum during incapacity. The sub-contractor was no party to this agreement. The contractor claimed to be indemnified by the sub-contractor under section 4 in respect of his liability to the workman, and brought an action in the High Court to enforce the indemnity. The sub-contractor contended that the indemnity could only be enforced by means of an arbitration under the Act.

Held, that, as the amount of the weekly payment to the workman had been settled by agreement, and there had been no arbitration proceedings to settle the amount, the action was maintainable.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., at the trial of the action.

The plaintiff was the contractor for the construction of a building, and he had made a sub-contract with the defendant whereby the latter undertook to execute the whole of the plastering work in the building. In July, 1901, a workman in the employment of the defendant, while engaged on the plastering work of the building, was injured by an accident, and became entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Notice of the accident was given both to the plaintiff and to the defendant, and the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the workman—the defendant being no party to it—to pay him half his average weekly earnings as compensation during incapacity. A year afterwards, in consequence of the decision of the House of Lords in Cooper v. Wright, 51 W. R. 12, [1902] A. C 302, the plaintiff claimed indemnity from the defendant under section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and brought this action in the High Court claiming to recover the moneys already paid to the workman to the date of the writ, further sums which the plaintiff might pay to the date of the judgment, and a declaration that the defendant was liable to indemnify him in respect of future payments. The defendant, who had a policy of insurance with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Insurance Co. against liability to which he might be subject under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, served a third-party notice upon the insurance company claiming to be indemnified by them in respect of the plaintiff's claim. The insurance company entered an appearance, and contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue the defendant upon the indemnity, but could only recover in respect thereof by taking proceedings for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. It was admitted that if the defendant was liable to the plaintiff, the insurance company were liable to indemnify the defendant.

Wills, J., held that the action was maintainable, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for the sums claimed, coming to the conclusion that the sum agreed upon was properly payable to the workman, and he made a declaration that the defendant was liable thenceforth to pay to the plaintiff such sums as the plaintiff might be liable to pay to the workman under the Act in respect of the accident, and he gave judgment for the defendant against the insurance company for the above sums.

The insurance company and the defendant at their request appealed.

Hugo Young, K.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the insurance company.—The plaintiff is not entitled to sue the defendant upon the indemnity given to him by section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The scheme of the Act is that every claim under it shall be settled by arbitration. By section 1, sub-section 3, "if any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act, . . . or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act," it shall be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Act. The claim for indemnity arises under the Act, because it is given by section 4, and the proceedings to enforce that indemnity are proceedings under the Act. Rules 19, 20, and 23 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, deal with the case of a person claiming indemnity under either section 4 or section 6 of the Act, and they require the indemnity to be claimed in the arbitration proceedings. Further, the agreement here is not such an agreement as is contemplated by section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act. The agreement there contemplated is an agreement to which all persons liable are parties or assent, so that all liabilities may be settled once for all, and it does not include an agreement to which the workman's employer is no party. The agreement not coming within the Act, the plaintiff cannot claim indemnity under section 4 in respect of payments made to the workman under it. Again, by clause 1 of Schedule I. to the Act, a weekly payment may be reviewed by an arbitration under the Act. It cannot have been intended to allow a sum fixed by a judge of the High Court or a jury to be reviewed by an arbitrator under the Act. An arbitrator can only review a sum fixed by arbitration. This shows that all questions as to liability to pay compensation and the amount thereof, including any question of indemnity under the Act, are intended to be settled by arbitration.

They referred upon this point to Crossfield & Sons v. Tanian, 48 W. R. 609, [1900] 2 Q B. 629.

COLLINS, M.R.—In my opinion these appeals fail. A great deal of ingenuity has been shown by the learned counsel who argued the case for the third parties to try and find out something in the Workman's Compensation Act, 1897, which is not there. By section 4 of the Act a workman who is injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment may take his remedy against the undertakers, though he is employed by a sub-contractor and not directly by the undertakers; and the section gives the undertakers a right of indemnity over against any other person who would be liable independently of that section. The workman in the present case elected to claim against the plaintiff, who was the contractor for the erection of the building, and therefore came within the term "undertakers," and by agreement between the plaintiff and the workman the former paid to the latter a sum per week equal to half his average weekly earnings.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That agreement was come to independently of the defendant. At that time it was not realized that a contractor had any right of indemnity under section 4 over against a sub-contractor, and accordingly no steps were taken by the plaintiff at that time to claim indemnity from the defendant. In May, 1902, the House of Lords, in Cooper v. Wright, decided that a sub-contractor might be an undertaker within the Act and liable as such, and that therefore the contractor would have a right to indemnity over against the sub-contractor in respect of the amount of compensation moneys. The plaintiff thereupon took steps to assert that liability in the defendant to indemnify him, and brought an action in the High Court, and the insurance company were brought in by the defendant as third parties upon the ground that they were liable to indemnify him under a policy of insurance. The whole matter was gone into before Wills, J., who considered every circumstance bearing upon the question, and he arrived at the amount of the indemnity to which the plaintiff was entitled as against the defendant. The third parties insist that the whole of the proceedings were misconceived, upon the ground that under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it is not competent for an undertaker, who has come under an obligation to pay compensation to a workman in respect of an accident for which another person is liable to pay compensation, to put in suit his right to indemnity over against that other person, except in accordance with the procedure provided by the Act. The onus of making that out rests upon the person who asserts it. In my opinion the insurance company are not within measurable distance of making that out. The provisions of the Act show that the scheme for the assessment of compensation to an injured workman is that the amount shall be fixed by arbitration where no agreement as to the amount is arrived at. But there is no provision which shows that the right of the undertaker as against the person who is liable to indemnify him must in all cases be settled by arbitration under the Act. The obvious reasons for providing that, in the absence of an agreement, the claim of a workman for compensation shall be settled by arbitration under the Act have no application to a claim for indemnity by an undertaker, where the persons concerned may be and probably are in a good pecuniary position. This latter inquiry begins after the workman is out of the case. The provisions of section 4 are for the benefit of the workman, in order to give him a right against the undertaker—the contractor—where he is in the employment of a sub-contractor. When the compensation payable to the man is agreed upon, the matter is done with, and the only question that remains is as to the right of the undertaker to indemnity over. There is no reason why this latter claim should be decided by arbitration. There is no provision in the Act to that effect. The main provision which has been relied upon is section 1, sub-section 3. That sub-section provides that "if any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act (including any question as to whether the employment is one to which this Act applies), or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the second schedule to this Act." That obliges me to see what is the meaning of the words "the liability to pay compensation under this Act." The meaning of those words is made clear by sub-section 1 of the same section, which makes an employer "liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act" to a workman in his employment who is injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. Therefore sub-section 3 is dealing with the direct obligation of the employer to pay compensation to his workman. Then comes section 4, which contains nothing in its terms to show that the right of the contractor to an indemnity must be determined by arbitration. Various rules in the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, have been relied upon. Rule 19 is first of all relied upon. That rule deals with a case in which arbitration proceedings to recover compensation are taken by a workman, and it provides that where the respondent claims to be entitled under section 4 or section 6 of the Act or otherwise to indemnity over against any person not a party to the arbitration, he must, five clear days before the day fixed for the arbitration, file a notice of his claim, and he must serve the notice on the person against whom the claim is made; and by rule 20 if the person so served desires to dispute the claim in the arbitration as against the respondent, he must appear on the day fixed for the arbitration; and in default of his doing so he shall be deemed to admit the validity of any award made against the respondent. Those provisions are applicable where proceedings are taken by a workman for the assessment of compensation by arbitration, and the respondent has a claim for indemnity over; and they are framed for the purpose of having those questions determined once for all between all parties in the arbitration, so that the person against whom indemnity is claimed shall not be allowed subsequently to dispute the right of the workman to be paid compensation. It does not, however, touch the case where there is an agreement, as in the present case, come to between the workman and the plaintiff to pay compensation, and where arbitration is not required. It would require an express provision in the Act to take away the right in such a case to sue at law for the indemnity. There is nothing in the Act to that effect. It is unnecessary to go through all the other arguments adduced, which are all founded upon the suggested construction of section 1, sub-section 3, which I have held to be untenable. In my opinion the appeals must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff is an "undertaker" within the meaning of section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The defendant is a contractor with the plaintiff for the execution of part of the work which the plaintiff has contracted to carry out. While the work was being carried on a workman in the employment of the defendant met with an accident, and under section 4 of the Act he applied to the plaintiff for compensation. The amount of the compensation was agreed upon between the plaintiff and the workman, without any arbitration proceedings, the defendant being no party to the agreement. The plaintiff now brings an action in the High Court claiming an indemnity against the defendant in respect of the sums payable to the workman under the agreement. That indemnity is expressly given by section 4, because the defendant, in whose employment the workman was and who was a sub-contractor, would have been liable to pay compensation independently of the section. The right of indemnity, therefore, accrued to the plaintiff as against the defendant. There is nothing said in the section as to how that right of indemnity is to be enforced; and therefore, unless there is something in the Act to the contrary, the plaintiff is entitled to sue in the High Court. What is relied upon as excluding the right of the plaintiff to sue in the High Court is section 1, sub-section 3. It is said that the question has arisen as to the liability to pay or as to the amount of compensation under the Act. But there is no question here between the workman and the undertaker, the plaintiff. That question has been settled by agreement between them. It is then said that this is not such an agreement as is contemplated by the Act. It is said that the agreement must be one which binds the workman, the undertaker, and the employer, and, I suppose, any other person who may be liable to indemnify the employer. I fail to see any such provision in the Act. The agreement was come to between the workman and the undertaker who was liable to pay him compensation. It would be hard upon a workman if he could not make an agreement with the undertaker, from whom he was claiming compensation, without getting his employer's sanction. There is no hardship or injustice upon the employer in this. His remedy is under Schedule I., clause 12, of the Act. If the defendant is dissatisfied with the amount of the compensation agreed upon, his remedy is to apply to have the amount agreed to be paid by the plaintiff to the workman reviewed under clause 12 of Schedule I., and then the only sum which he will be compelled to pay will be the sum so settled upon that arbitration. The judgment of the learned judge at the trial was framed upon that view of the Act, and it leaves the defendant free to take proceedings under clause 12 to have the amount reviewed, and if he is successful in that his liability would be as then settled.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be quite clear that the compensation mentioned in section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act refers to compensation payable to the workman, and does not touch the question of the indemnity to which the undertaker, who has paid the workman, is entitled to under section 4. Here the plaintiff became liable to pay compensation to the workman, and the amount of that compensation was arrived at by agreement between the plaintiff and the workman. Section 4 thereupon came into operation and the plaintiff became entitled under it to an indemnity from his sub-contractor. There is nothing in that section or in any other part of the Act which excludes the plaintiff from suing in the High Court to enforce that indemnity. The right to an indemnity is given by the Act, and the plaintiff can assert that right in the ordinary way. Further, I cannot agree with the contention that this agreement is not within the Act because the defendant either was not a party to it, or did not consent to it.

In re RICHARD AND GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Railway—Minerals—Lying under and near railway—Compensation for preventing working of minerals—Interest—Railways Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 78.

Where a mine owner gives notice to a railway company, under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, of his intention to work the minerals lying under or near the railway, and the railway company give a counter-notice to the mine owner that the working of the minerals will be likely to damage the works of the railway, and that they are willing to make compensation for preventing the working of the minerals, and the question of the amount of compensation is referred to arbitration, the arbitrator has no power to award interest upon the compensation money from the date of the counter-notice to the date of the award.

Appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., upon an award of an umpire stated in the form of a special case.

Philip Richard was the lessee for a term of years of the veins and seams of coal extending under the railway of the Great Western Railway Co.

Richard having given to the railway company notice in writing of his intention to work the coal adjacent to and under the railway, the railway company gave a counter-notice to Richard stating that the working of the coal would be likely to damage the works of the railway, and that they were willing to make compensation for the preventing the working of the coal.

The matter of the compensation to be paid by the railway company was referred to arbitration.

The arbitrator made his award for the sum of £14,654 5s. 10d. as compensation, and he further awarded that the railway company should pay to Richard the sum of £2,795 13s. 3d. as and for interest upon the said sum of £14,654 5s. 10d. from the date of the counter-notice to the date of the award.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the umpire had any jurisdiction to award interest as above.

Channell, J., said that he was inclined to think that interest could be awarded directly, but that even if it could not, the amount of the interest could be taken into consideration as entering into the calculation of the sum to be awarded as compensation for depriving the mine owner of his right to work the minerals as from the date of the counter notice. He therefore held that Richard was entitled to the sum of £2,795 13s. 3d.

The railway company appealed.

Cripps, K.C., and Ernest Moon, K.C. (Howard Wright with them), for the railway company.—The principle laid down in Birch v. Joy, 3 H. L. C. 565, that a purchaser in possession of an estate, receiving the rents, is liable to pay interest on the unpaid purchase-money, only applies to a case of vendor and purchaser. Where a mine owner is prevented from working his coal under or adjacent to a railway by a counter-notice given under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, there is no purchase of the coal by the railway company: Great Northern Railway Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 49 W. R. 261; [1901] 1 K. B. 416; Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., 52 W. R. 193, [1903] A. C. 426. The sum payable to the mine-owner under sections 78, 81, and 82 of the Act of 1845 is by way of compensation for preventing him from working his mines. Interest cannot be payable upon that compensation until the amount has been fixed and default has been made in payment. The decision of Buckley, J., in Fletcher v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 50 W. R. 423, [1902] 1 Ch. 901, turned upon a special Act, which required the railway company to purchase the minerals within a certain distance of the railway, which the mine owner was prevented from working, and the minerals so paid for were to vest in the railway company. That case was not decided under the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and has therefore no application. Interest, therefore, is not payable on the amount awarded for compensation before the date of the award.

They also referred to Caledonian Railway Co. v. Carmichael, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 56.

Abel Thomas, K.C., and S. T. Evans, K.C. (George Cave, K.C., with them), for the claimant.—Whether there has been a sale and purchase of the minerals or not, interest is payable on the amount of the compensation money from the date when the mine owner was prevented from working them, in accordance with the equitable principle laid down in Birch v. Joy. The principle applies where a body under statutory powers requires a landowner to abstain from using his land. Fletcher v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. is a strong authority in support of this view. The arbitrator had, therefore, jurisdiction to award interest from the date of the counter-notice.

Moon, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—The question in this appeal is whether the arbitrator is entitled to allow a sum for interest in addition to the sum allowed for compensation under section 78 and the following sections of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. The case is susceptible of a comparatively short judgment, because, in my opinion, it is really concluded by two decisions in the House of Lords. The facts are that the mineral owner gave the railway company notice under section 78 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, of his intention to work the coal lying under or near the railway. That notice let in the right of the railway company to give a counter-notice, which had the effect of preventing the working of the coal subject to the payment of compensation for such prevention. That raised a question of compensation and nothing else, and the question is whether the arbitrator is entitled to award a sum for interest on the amount fixed as compensation. The counter-notice did not create the relation of vendor and purchaser. It merely gave rise to a claim for compensation under the machinery of the Act. The first of the two cases in the House of Lords is Caledonian Railway Co. v. Carmichael, the head-note in which, so far as material, is as follows: "A sheriff's jury, awarding compensation to a landowner against a railway company in 1864, found that so far back as 1852 he was entitled to £5,272, saying, however, nothing as to interest. The court below added to the principal sum twelve years' interest. Their order reversed. Per Lord Westbury: Interest can be demanded only in virtue of a contract, or where the principal money has been wrongfully withheld." The other case is that of Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., and the head-note there is as follows: "Owners of coal mine under and near waterworks gave the undertakers notice under section 22 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, that they intended to work the coal. The undertakers replied by a counter-notice requiring the mine owners not to work and stating their willingness to make compensation. In an arbitration under the Act and the Lands Clauses Acts to assess the compensation, the mine owners gave evidence to prove that coal rose in value after the date of the counter-notice. Held, that there was no purchase of the coal or transfer of the property in the coal; that the inquiry was not what was the value of the coal at the date of the counter-notice, but what would the coal owners, if they had not been prohibited, have made out of the coal during the time it would have taken them to get it; and that the evidence was admissible." Taking those two decisions together the case comes to this: The matter to be determined by the arbitrator is, not what is the price to be paid as upon a sale of the coal, but what is the sum to be paid as compensation for preventing the mine owner from working the coal, and there is no contract, express or implied, to pay interest, nor is there any breach of duty on the part of the railway company in not paying the compensation money over in a reasonable time. If any claim for interest can arise, it can only be after the amount of compensation had been ascertained. The case of Fletcher v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., before Buckley, J., which was relied upon by the claimant, turned upon a private Act of Parliament which constituted the transaction a sale of the minerals, the compensation being the price payable for them, and therefore it was held, on the ordinary principle with reference to vendor and purchaser, that the obligation to pay interest arose. In the present case neither of the circumstances mentioned by Lord Westbury in Caledonian Railway Co. v. Carmichael exist. There is no contract, express or implied, to pay interest, nor is there a wrongful withholding of the principal sum and non-payment of it on the day when it ought to have been paid. The arbitrator, therefore, had no jurisdiction to award interest, and the appeal of the railway company must succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add. It is contended on behalf of the claimant that the principle laid down in Birch v. Joy applies, and that interest on the amount of the compensation can be awarded as from the date of the counter-notice by the railway company. That case, however, was decided with reference to the rights of the vendor and purchaser of an estate under an ordinary contract of purchase and sale. The case of Fletcher v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co. was decided by Buckley, J., upon the terms of a special Act of Parliament, and not upon the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, and in that case the learned judge came to the conclusion, upon the terms of that special statute, that the relation of vendor and purchaser existed between the mine owner who was prevented from working the minerals and the railway company, and that therefore the principle of Birch v. Joy applied. In the present case the relation of vendor and purchaser does not exist. That was expressly decided in two cases, both of which are binding upon us. The first is Great Northern Railway Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, in this court, and the other is the more recent case of Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co., in the House of Lords. This latter case was a decision upon the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, which contains a provision identical with those in the Railways Clauses Act, 1845. The House of Lords held that those provisions did not establish the relation of vendor and purchaser between the mine owners and the waterworks company. The Lord Chancellor said: "It was not a purchase of the coal, nor is it analogous to a purchase of the coal." Lord Macnaghten said: "The counter-notice by the undertakers following a notice of the mine owners under section 22 does not operate to make a contract or to transfer property. It is not even a step towards a contract or a step towards expropriation. The undertakers acquire no property in the minerals. The property remains where it was. The mine owner is prohibited from working, and the undertakers are bound to make full compensation. That is all." For these reasons it seems to me that the ground upon which it sought to support the claim for interest fails, and the appeal must be allowed.

In re THE CHURCH PATRONAGE TRUST.
LAWRIE v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL. (a.)

Advowson—Charity— Will—Trust to present fit and pious person.

A charitable trust can be created of an advowson as of other civil property, but such a charitable trust must be for the benefit of the public or a class of the public, and cannot be implied from a direction to choose fit and proper persons, such being the duty imposed by law upon every owner of an advowson.

Decision of Buckley, J., 52 W. R. 106 [1904] 1 Ch. 41, affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J. (reported 52 W. R. 106, [1904] 1 Ch. 41).

The trustees of the Church Patronage Trust applied by summons under section 6 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), that the court might sanction their retaining the advowson of the vicarage of the church at Battesford, otherwise Battisford, coming to them under a codicil to the will of Louisa Woodcock and a subsequent deed of appointment. The application was made on the assumption that the advowson had been thereby assured "to or the benefit of a charitable use" within the meaning of section 5 of the Mortmain Act, 1891.

By the codicil in question, which was dated the 18th of April, 1902, the testatrix devised the advowson to such uses as her three sisters or the survivor of them "shall within twenty-one years from the date of my decease appoint for the purpose of carrying out the express wish of my late husband that the said advowson should be made over to and vested in the Church Patronage Trust Society by all lawful means, but if the said society decline to accept the said patronage, the said advowson and perpetual presentation shall belong to my said three sisters as joint tenants in fee simple."

The testatrix died on the 14th of May, 1902.

The sisters of the testatrix exercised the power of appointment given to them by the codicil by a deed dated the 14th of February, 1903, whereby the advowson was appointed and confirmed unto and to the use of the trustees of the Church Patronage Trust, their heirs and assigns. And it was thereby agreed that the trustees and the persons deriving title under them should stand possessed of the advowson upon the trusts and subject to the powers, so far as applicable, comprised in and forming the ninth schedule to an indenture of the 21st of December, 1871.

The last-mentioned indenture was the trust deed of the Church Patronage Trust.

The trusts contained in the ninth schedule were, so far as they are material, as follow:

"1. Upon trust that from time to time, as often as the said vicarage and parish church of —— shall become vacant by the death, resignation, deprivation, or cession of the incumbent or otherwise, the trustees for the time being of these presents do and shall nominate, appoint, and present to the same vicarage and parish church such fit and pious person of godly life and conversation, being in holy orders, capable of accepting and holding the same, as the trustees for the time being of these presents, or the major part in number of them, shall determine upon. . . ."

"2. Provided always that it shall not be any objection to the person who may be appointed at any time to supply the vacancy for the time being of the said vicarage and parish church that he is one of the trustees for the time being of these presents."

"3. . . . So that the number of five trustees, three of whom at least shall be clergymen of the Established Church, may from time to time, as far as circumstances will admit, be kept up."

"4. That only such persons shall be eligible for the office of trustees as shall be, or shall be well known or reputed to be, of godly life and conversation, and shall profess themselves members of the Established Church of England, and shall be known to be zealously attached to the great principles of the reformed faith contained in the Liturgy and Articles of the said Established Church."

Buckley, J., held that there was no trust expressed other than such as was involved in the duty of the owner of an advowson. Consequently the gift did not constitute a charitable trust and the summons failed, the case not coming within the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891.

The trustees of the Church Patronage Trust appealed.

Levett, K.C., and Barlow, for the appellants.—This trust provides that suitable persons shall be presented to the advowson, and that a certain number of the persons who are to have the power of choice are to be clergymen, so that a good choice is doubly ensured. It is submitted that a trust of this kind is charitable as being for the benefit of religion. It is plain that an advowson may be given on a good charitable trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a particular parish: In re St. Stephen, Coleman-street, 36 W. R. 837, 39 Ch. D. 492. But the only benefit that the inhabitants of the parish get in such a case is precisely what is given by this deed—viz., the ensuring of the choice of a proper person as their minister. The trust is also charitable within the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Hunter, 45 W. R. 610, [1897] 2 Ch. 105, as being a trust to advance a particular set of doctrines. The persons to be presented under this trust must be "zealously attached to the great principles of the reformed faith." Though the judgment of Romer, J., in In re Hunter, 45 W. R. 344, [1897] 1 Ch. 518, was restored by the House of Lords in Hunter v. Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 673, [1899] A. C. 309, the decision of the Court of Appeal on this point was not affected.

Commissioners of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, 40 W. R. Dig. 217; Attorney-General v. Scott, 1 Ves. sen. 412; Foley v. Attorney-General, 7 Bro. P. C. 249, were also cited.

R. J. Parker (Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., with him), for the Attorney-General.—The Attorney-General is as a rule interested in supporting a charitable trust, but as there is no one here to argue the contrary, he feels it his duty to place this view before the court. So far as an advowson is civil property it can be made the subject of a trust, and the trust of an advowson for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish is a good charitable trust. But it is a good charitable trust only so far as the advowson is civil property. The inhabitants of a parish in such a case get the benefit of something more than the common law duty which is imposed on trustees to appoint fit and proper persons. They get the benefit of the pecuniary value of the advowson. This is borne out by the Sale of Advowsons Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 50), which authorizes the sale of advowsons held on trust for inhabitants, ratepayers, freeholders, or other persons forming a numerous class. But there can be no charitable trust of the ecclesiastical duties attached to the advowson. It is the duty of all patrons to appoint fit and proper persons, and trusts which merely provide for the performance of that duty cannot be said to be charitable: Lewis on Perpetuities (ed. 1843), pp. 695, 696. It is further submitted that a trust to be a good charitable trust must be for the benefit of some person or body of persons, but here there is no cestui que trust at all.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the Official Trustee of Charitable Lands.—There is no decision on this point which is binding on the court. If this trust is charitable, it can only be supported as a method of securing a better choice of incumbents.

He cited Duke on Charitable Uses (ed. 1805), p. 137.

Levett, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that this appeal fails, and that the judgment of Buckley, J., must be affirmed. I suppose some people, cynically minded, take a positive pleasure in results of law which really are a little grotesque when looked at in relation to the history of the subject-matter with which one has to deal; but when you start with a constitutional arrangement which is part of the constitution of the nation, and which really lays down a rule that is not consistent with the origin of the subject-matter you have to deal with, one cannot be surprised that there is some little difficulty in coming to a conclusion with reference to the law; but I dare say that the outcome of all this is, as Mr. Parker has said, that practically you arrive at a better state of things than you would have done if you had made your constitutional law accord with the origin of the particular subject-matter. One cannot doubt that in its origin the church view of the right of presentation harmonized better with the particular subject-matter that was in view, than the property view which was afterwards adopted. Although this may lead to some difficulty in reference to cases which may arise at law, or even occasionally to some grotesque results, I dare say that this all works out for the best. At all events, what we have to decide in this case is this: We have a disposition in this case by will which clearly would be invalid as being against the law regarding perpetuities unless it can be brought within the exception in favour of charitable trusts; and, therefore, the whole question is whether in this particular case the dispositions by the will of the testatrix are such as to fall within the exception in favour of charitable trusts. I do not think it would serve any useful purpose in the judgment which I am now giving to repeat at length the provisions of the testatrix's will. They are all sufficiently set out in the report of this case in [1904] 1 Ch., p. 41; but I think it will be convenient to add to that a portion of clause 3, which is not set out in the report. [His lordship read clause 3, and continued:] The question arises whether there is a trust created which ought to be held not invalid as regards the law against perpetuity by reason of its coming within the exception in favour of charitable trusts. When Buckley, J., was dealing with this matter in his judgment as reported on p. 49 he said, speaking of this deed which was executed on the 21st of December, 1871: "So far, therefore, I have a deed of appointment which I must read into the codicil, and the joint effect of the two is that the testatrix has devised to the persons who thus become appointees. They are to hold upon the trusts set forth in the ninth schedule to the deed of 1871. I am unable to find in the first clause of that schedule any direction to do anything further or other than what the owner of any advowson is bound to do. He ought to present a fit and pious person of godly life, who is in holy orders, and capable of holding the living." There the learned judge is repeating the words as they appear in the clause which is supposed to create the trust: "There is no trust expressed other than such as is involved in the duty of any owner of an advowson." Then Buckley, J., says: "If I turn to clause 4 of the schedule I find there is a definition or indication of the class of persons who are to be trustees. Assuming, although I do not think it is the case, that I could evolve from that description of the character of the trusts that they are bound to appoint a person of the particular religious persuasion which is pointed out by that clause, I do not find that any class of thought in the Established Church of England is there defined or pointed to. The trustees are simply to be persons of godly life, members of the Established Church of England, and attached to the principles of the reformed faith contained in the Liturgy and Articles of the Established Church." So far I entirely agree with every word that Buckley, J., said. I want now at this point to say a word upon that part of clause 3 which I have already referred to, "So that the number of five trustees, three of whom at least shall be clergymen of the Established Church, may from time to time as far as circumstances will admit be kept up," because counsel for the appellants relied upon that also as being a provision which was put in for the express purpose, in the view of the testatrix, of bettering the choice of the parson to be presented, that is, bettering it according to her view as being more likely to result in the selection of a good parson because the majority of those who were to make the appointment were to be clergymen of the Church of England.

Now one has to consider whether this is a charitable trust within the meaning of the word when used with reference to the exception in favour of charitable trusts. The first thing to point out is that this is not a case where the testatrix, or the creator of a fund, has brought into the fund any property or money, as to which she declares new trusts. All that she is doing by means of her will is to declare the trusts in respect of the advowson—that is to say, to declare in respect of the advowson that the parson appointed shall have the qualifications which have been set forth, but when one looks at those qualifications to see what they are, one finds they are only the qualifications which are required, independently of the declaration of the trusts, to be observed by every patron when he is presenting to a living. Therefore, in the first instance, there seems to be, as Buckley, J., has pointed out, a very strong reason why this should not be held to be a charitable trust within the meaning of the words "charitable trust" with reference to the law of perpetuities. There is nothing voluntarily done by the testatrix at all to enhance or increase the obligations which exist on the patron for the time being, whoever he may be, in respect of the presentation to the living.

Now what is the next observation one can make in reference to this particular alleged charitable trust? It is that there is in this case no cestui que trust whatever. This is not like the case of a trust in favour of the parishioners of a particular parish; it is nothing of the sort. It is a trust without a cestui que trust, and it is a trust which really is only another mode of describing an existing duty which is cast by the law upon persons holding this class of property. I should like to say in passing that although in the course of the argument I asked the question whether the recognition of such a trust in favour of the parishioners of a parish was not an authority for the proposition that you might create a charitable trust, in a case where that which was provided for was a better choice of the incumbent, the answer given to me, I think, was a perfectly sound one; but although it may possibly be—I do not know about that myself—that you would be likely to get a better choice if the parson was elected by the parishioners, that, at all events, is not the reason why the law has recognized such trusts in favour of the parishioners as charitable trusts. The reason why the law has recognized such trusts as charitable trusts is merely in reference to the property which is conveyed; and that is recognized in the decision of Kay, J., in St. Stephen, Coleman-street, where, quoting from the decision in Goodman v. The Saltash Corporation, 31 W. R. 293, 7 A. C. 633, the learned judge read these words of Lord Selborne: "A gift subject to a condition or trust for the benefit of the inhabitants of a parish or town, or of any particular class of such inhabitants is (as I understand the law) a charitable trust; and no charitable trust can be void on the ground of perpetuity." Then Kay, J., quotes what was said by Lord Cairns: "A grant of that kind, it appears to me, would be perfectly legal and perfectly intelligible, and there would be nothing in it which would infringe any principle of law. Such a condition would create that which in the very wide language of any courts is called a charitable—that is to say, a public, trust or interest, for the benefit of the free inhabitants of ancient tenements. A trust of that kind would not in any way infringe the law or rule against perpetuities." But one has not got such a case here. If there is a trust at all in this case it is a trust without a cestui que trust. It seems to me that these grounds are sufficient to show that in this particular case there is great difficulty in saying there is a charitable trust.

But what has been most strongly urged on behalf of the appellants is that this may be a charitable trust because it may tend to the better choice of an incumbent, and a passage was read from the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in The Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel, in which Lord Macnaghten defined the trusts which are charitable trusts: "'Charity' in its legal sense comprises four principal divisions; trusts for the relief of poverty; trusts for the advancement of education; trusts for the advancement of religion" (they did not claim that this trust came within any of those words); "and trusts for other purposes beneficial to the community, not falling under any of the preceding heads." They claimed that a trust which provided in a case like this for the better selection of the incumbent was a charitable trust. With regard to that, it is in the first place to be observed that if it is a charitable trust one would really be saying that the law of England which allows an advowson to be treated as private property is not a convenient law, and that it ought to be remedied, and that one way of remedying it would be to try as far as you can to prevent advowsons being vested in private individuals and to vest them in bodies of people specially qualified to make a selection of an incumbent. I cannot agree to that. Some people may think that is a good thing, and some people may not, but I think it is impossible to say that a trust, the real object of which is to remedy the law of England, can be treated as a charitable trust. I do not mean in any observations I am making to suggest that it is impossible that an advowson should be vested in trustees for a charity. Admittedly, in the case of an advowson which is appendant to the property the property may be conveyed to the trustees for the charity, and in that case the trustees for the charity will hold, as part of the property vested in them, the advowson. I do not know that it would militate against that that the same testator who left the property with the advowson appendant should express what his wishes were with regard to the presentation to the particular living; and also I wish to say I do not at all suggest that you might not, if you put it in a proper form, that is to say, put it as a mere transfer of property, transfer an advowson to a charitable society, like the case of the missionary society which was mentioned in the argument. All I say is, that I do not think the mere fact that the intention of the creator of the supposed charitable trust was to improve the choice of the parson to whom the living should be presented, is sufficient to constitute this a charitable trust. Under these circumstances I do not think I should be doing any good in adding to my judgment.

With regard to what was said about the views of the Lords Justices who were parties to the decision in the case of Hunter v. The Attorney-General in the Court of Appeal, that is a decision which, of course, binds us, and if that decision is to be treated as an express authority that you may create a charitable trust by a provision which limits the area of choice by saying that the parsons presented are all to be of a particular school of religious thought or view, I say two things: First I say that although that may seem to be laid down in the judgments of Lindley, L.J., Lopes, L.J., and Rigby, L.J., yet they do not give us any reasons which would guide one as to when such a limitation, for the purpose of improving the selection, is to be treated as a charitable trust. When that case went to the House of Lords the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed, and, although this particular point was not expressly taken, yet I think that when one reads the opinions of the law lords, and having regard to the decision of Romer, J., which they were replacing, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to suppose that the law lords who were parties to that judgment could have approved of that part of the judgment of the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal in which they are supposed to have sanctioned the proposition that a limitation of the area of choice in accordance with the view of the testatrix or creator of the alleged trust can be treated as falling within the term "charitable trust" for the purpose of the exception in the law against perpetuities, in favour of charitable trusts. I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

With regard to the points upon the two sections, the 5th and the 8th, of the Mortmain Act, they do not arise in this case, and, therefore, I say nothing about them.

ROMER, L.J.—No doubt advowsons may be made the subject of good charitable trusts, for example, if they are held upon trust for a parish or its parishioners; but the question before us is in substance this: Can trusts be held good charitable trusts which have no cestui que trust, unless they be the public, by inference, and where the trusts are in substance merely that the legal owners of the advowsons, their heirs and assigns, shall take care to present fit and duly qualified persons as vacancies occur? For instance, would such a trust as I am about to mention be good? A case where the legal owner of an advowson for the time being by deed-poll declared that he, his heirs and assigns, should stand possessed of the advowson belonging to him upon trust that he and they, as vacancies should occur, would take care to present fit and duly qualified persons to fill the vacancies. I think not. Such trusts merely provide that the owners of the advowson for the time being shall properly discharge the duties cast upon them by the very nature of the property they hold. I cannot think that such trusts of advowsons can lawfully be made perpetual by construing them as being charitable. I do not think it can be said that expressly making the owner of an advowson for the time being for the purposes of the discharge of his duty, a trustee instead of an ordinary owner, is intended so much for the benefit of the public, as leading to the probability of a better selection of the clergyman, as to justify the court in holding that in itself it is sufficient to create a charitable trust. The effect of holding otherwise would be that any owner of an advowson for the time being could for ever afterwards tie up and bind the administration of the duties of presentation, either by deed-poll, merely declaring himself and his heirs and assigns trustees in the appointing of clergymen to fill the vacancies of the living, or by conveying to another, his heirs and assigns, upon similar trusts. I think this would lead to results very far-reaching and much to be avoided. That view decides the present case, because on the facts I think that the trusts we have to consider cannot, in substance, but be classed as such trusts as I have before mentioned.

I need not make any further observations on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hunter v. The Attorney-General beyond these. In and so far as the court in that case did decide that the trusts declared of an advowson merely directed to narrowing the choice of the clergymen to be appointed to vacancies by the owners for the time being were good charitable trusts, that case is distinguishable from the present. Whether, if the Court of Appeal did so decide, that decision was right it is not for me to say. That must be for another court.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree. I have really very little to add. In approaching this case we must start with this proposition—that according to English law an advowson is regarded as property, property no doubt of a peculiar kind, to which certain ecclesiastical duties and obligations attach, and property which may be partially forfeited by the owner's delay or neglect to discharge those duties. If the owner of an advowson does not, on a vacancy occurring, within a certain time present a fit and proper clerk, the law makes provision for his losing the right of presentation, and that right is vested in some other authority. It being a species of property, there is, I think, no doubt whatever that it may be subject to a charitable trust. The books are full of such cases. I would only mention the case of The Attorney-General v. Warr, in 1829, where an advowson was given to certain specified charities by will. In the St. Stephen, Coleman-street, case Kay, J., gave a decision clearly in the same sense, and the statute of 19 & 20 Vict., to which our attention has been called, proceeds on the same footing. But the question we have to decide is not whether an advowson can be the subject of a charitable gift. In order to create a valid trust you must have not only a trustee, but a cestui que trust. That cestui que trust may be either an individual, or individuals, or the public, or a class of the public. But can you create a charitable trust by vesting an advowson in persons whom you call trustees, and imposing upon them expressly the duty of discharging the precise obligation which the law implies in them as the owners of the advowson? I think not. No authority to this effect has been cited, and if the contrary view to that which I have expressed were the law, I think it would be difficult to resist the conclusion that every owner of an advowson in this country holds it upon a charitable trust. I have been unable to see what difference it can make if an owner of an advowson who holds property subject to certain ecclesiastical obligations declares by deed that he does hold them upon trust to discharge those ecclesiastical obligations. In this case it seems to me all that the testatrix has really done is to secure that the advowson shall be vested in certain patrons as owners of the advowson. That, and nothing more, has been done, and that does not create a charitable trust.

One word more. I do not think it is necessary that we should consider what might have been the result if the trust had been to present only, say, members of the English Church Union, or members of the Church Association. I desire to keep an entirely open mind as to that point, and speaking for myself I think there is nothing in the case of Hunter v. The Attorney-General in the Court of Appeal which would prevent this court from considering and deciding that point whenever it arises.

Slander—Charge of bringing blackmailing action—No special damage—Imputation of criminal offence.

To accuse a man of having brought a blackmailing action is to use words which are capable of being understood by the hearers as imputing an indictable offence to the person so accused, and an action for slander is consequently maintainable, even though no special damage be alleged.

This was an application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial on appeal from a verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before Grantham, J., and a special jury in Middlesex.

The statement of claim alleged that prior to the matters complained of the plaintiff had recovered judgment in an action brought by him in the Mayor's Court against the defendant for certain sums of money and costs.

Paragraph 2: "On the 30th day of May, 1902, at a meeting of shareholders of the Elandsfontein (No. 2) Gold Mining Co., held on such date, at the Institute of Accountants, Moorgate-street, E.C., the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff the following words: 'On that occasion (meaning upon the hearing of certain arbitration proceedings arising out of the said action in the Mayor's Court) Mr. Marks (meaning the plaintiff) was taxed with having brought a blackmailing action (meaning the said action in the Mayor's Court) against me. He was awfully indignant about it, and wanted to know if it was by instructions of mine that my counsel accused him (meaning the plaintiff) of having brought a blackmailing action. My counsel said it was upon his (meaning the plaintiff's) own evidence.'"

Paragraph 3: "The meaning of the said words was that the plaintiff was a blackmailer, and had brought an unfounded action against the defendant; had been guilty of an indictable offence or offences, and of endeavouring to obtain money by threats from defendant; and was further guilty of a misdemeanour in supporting his claim by giving false evidence, and had so admitted in his evidence given upon oath before the said court."

By paragraph 4 it was pleaded that by reason of the said defamatory matter the plaintiff was injured in his business, credit, and reputation, and suffered damage.

The defendant pleaded that the occasion on which the words were spoken was privileged, and that they were spoken bonâ fide and without malice.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the course of the trial the learned judge intimated that this was a case of the pot calling the kettle black, and, after hearing the plaintiff's case and his cross-examination, the jury stopped the case, and gave a verdict for the defendant, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bray, K.C., and Rose-Innes, for the plaintiff.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and Neilson, for the defendant.—The action is not maintainable. It is not a criminal offence to bring any action however unfounded. The words used, therefore, do not impute to the plaintiff any criminal offence, and no special damage is alleged.

Bray, K.C., replied.

Cotterell v. Jones, 11 C. B. 713; Wren v. Wield, L. R. 4 Q. B. 730, 17 W. R. Dig. 91; and Hankinson v. Bilby, 16 M. & W. 442, were cited in the course of the argument.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—On the whole we think that there must be a new trial. I will first deal with the point last taken by Mr. Isaacs. He was, of course, right in his submission that unless the statement of claim alleged that the slander imputed or might impute a criminal offence, this action necessarily fails, because no special damage is alleged, and it is not a case in which there is any imputation of professional misconduct at all, or misconduct by a tradesman in his trade, or anything of that sort. It is one of those cases in which spoken words are not actionable unless they impute or might impute a crime, and in the opinion of the tribunal which ultimately deals with the matter appear to have been words not necessarily intended by the speaker to impute a crime but which the hearers might have understood as imputing a crime. The words in question are those set forth in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim. Paragraph 3 contains the innuendo, but I will first say a word on the matter without reference to the innuendo. I am not prepared to say that even without reference any innuendo it would be right to hold that these words, actually used, could not be reasonably understood by the hearers as imputing to the plaintiff a criminal offence. I mean by that the criminal offence of making a claim, supporting it in an action, and supporting it in that action by criminal means—that is to say, either by false evidence given by the plaintiff himself, or by false evidence obtained by him for the purposes of the action. If such an action were thus brought and thus supported it seems to me it would be a blackmailing action, and a blackmailing action brought by such means and in such a manner as to constitute a criminal offence. When one looks at paragraph 3 and sees what the innuendo is, that paragraph confirms this view, because the meaning which it is suggested these words conveyed to the hearers is very much the same as that which I have just stated, and, such as it seems to me, the words might have been reasonably understood to mean by the hearers. Take the last words of the paragraph: "and was further guilty of a misdemeanour in supporting his claim by giving false evidence, and had so admitted in his evidence given upon oath before the said court." I think that the hearers might well have understood that that was the imputation made by the defendant upon the plaintiff, especially when one has regard to the last words complained of—"my counsel said it was upon his own evidence." It is certainly suggested there that that evidence was untrue evidence given upon oath by the plaintiff. I have pointed out that we should not refuse a new trial upon this last point taken by counsel on behalf of the defendant; and I now proceed to deal with the reasons why I think there ought to be a new trial here. [His lordship then dealt with that part of the case.]

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first place, it seems to me that no reliance can be placed on the point that was raised by counsel for the defendant that the action was not maintainable at all. It is impossible, I think, to come to the conclusion that the words set out in paragraph 2 of the statement of claim were not such as the persons hearing them might fairly interpret as imputing an indictable offence to the plaintiff. If that be so, the action is maintainable, and the question must be asked of the jury as to the sense and meaning which ought to have been put upon them. That being so, the question comes to this, whether there ought to be a new trial. [His lordship, on this part of the case, agreed with Vaughan-Williams, L.J., that in the circumstances there ought to be a new trial.]

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add.

HANDCOCK v. PAWSON. (a.)

Will—Election—Compensation—Time to ascertain compensation—Testator's death—Date of election.

The time to ascertain the amount due as compensation in consequence of election against a will is the date of the testator's death, not the time of election.

Summons to determine whether in case of an election not to take under a will the amount of compensation to the other beneficiaries was to be ascertained at the date of the death of the testator or at the time of election.

By a settlement dated August, 1887, Mortimer Hancock became the tenant for life of the Roxley Court estate in Hertfordshire, with power of appointment among any one or more of his issue, with remainder in default of appointment to his eldest son, the defendant Mortimer Pawson Hancock, in fee simple.

By his will, dated the 7th of July, 1901, Mortimer Hancock devised all his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust for his three children in equal shares and he requested his trustees to allocate to his son Mortimer Pawson Hancock the Roxley Court estate as part of his share.

Mortimer Hancock died on the 13th of July, 1901. By an order dated the 26th of February, 1902, Kekewich, J., declared that the will was not an exercise of the power of appointment contained in the settlement, and that the defendant Mortimer Pawson Hancock, who in default of appointment became tenant in fee simple of the Roxley Court estate, was put to his election between the devise in his father's will and the estate under the settlement. At the time of his father's death Mortimer Pawson Hancock was abroad, and in consequence he did not make his election till 1903. On the 8th of July, 1903, he gave notice to the trustees of the will that he elected to take under the settlement, and against the will. In consequence of this, compensation had to be made to the other beneficiaries for the benefits taken by them under the will, and the question arose as to whether the amount of such compensation was to be taken at the date of the death of the testator or at the time of election, and a summons was in consequence taken out to ascertain the date.

Timmins, for the summons.—The property should be valued at the date of election: Seton, vol. 2, p. 1590, form 7. This was the date for ascertaining the value in Howells v. Jenkins, 11 W. R. 1050, 1 De J. & S. 616: Streatfield v. Streatfield, Ca. temp. Talb. 176, 1 Swanst. 447. There is no right to compensation until the election is made, and the amount should be ascertained when the claim arises. It is more convenient that this should be the date.

C. A. Bennett, for an infant with the same interest.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the defendant.—The election, when made, is retrospective, and the right to compensation is therefore also retrospective. This is according to the authorities and the forms in Seton: Gretton v. Hayward, 1 Swanst. 309; Rogers v. Williams, 24 W. R. 1039, 3 Ch. D. 688; In re Lord Chesham, Cavendish v. Dacre, 34 W. R. 321, 31 Ch. D. 466; Seton, vol. 2, p. 1579, form 6; Douglas v. Douglas, 20 W. R. 55, 12 Eq. 617; Ashburner's Principles of Equity, p. 673.

Timmins replied.

Nov. 10.—KEKEWICH, J.—Under the will of the testator, who died on the 13th of July, 1901, the defendant Mortimer Pawson Hancock takes a property called the Roxley Court estate, and other benefits. The Roxley Court estate was already his own, and by an order of the 26th of February, 1902, he was held bound to elect between the devise and bequest in his favour under the will, and this estate. On the 8th of July, 1903, he gave the trustees of the will notice of his election to take the estate under the provisions of a settlement which was his title to it, and against the will. Thereupon he became liable to make compensation to the disappointed legatees to the extent of the benefits which he takes under the will, and it has to be ascertained what they have lost. A question has been raised, and is submitted by the summons, whether the amount of compensation is to be ascertained at the date of the death of the testator, or as on the 8th of July, 1903, when the election was made.

Cases of election and consequent compensation are of such common occurrence that one is startled to find this question treated as unsettled at the present day. Really there is no doubt about it. The principle on which the rule of the court is founded has been stated again and again in plain language, but nowhere more clearly than by Talbot, L.C., in Streatfield v. Streatfield (Cases temp. Talbot, p. 188, of the 3rd edition, published in 1793): "When a man takes upon him to devise what he had no power over, upon a supposition that his will will be acquiesced under, this court compels the devisee if he will take advantage of the will to take entirely but not partially under it, as was done in Noys and Mordaunt's case, there being a tacit condition annexed to all devises of this nature that the devisee do not disturb the disposition which the devisor hath made." The decree in that case is set out in a note, p. 447 of 1 Swanston Reports, and study of that decree will show that it was intended to work out the principle thus stated by the Lord Chancellor. It is also stated in equally clear language by Eldon, L.C., in Gretton v. Howard, 1 Swanst. 434, thus: "The only remaining question is on what terms must compensation be made? From what time is the estate at Nine Elms to be given up to the petitioner? The election is retrospective, reverting to the time of the will, the parties electing reject all that comes under it, consequently they have in the interval enjoyed the property of another; to retain the past rents and profits which they have received with no other title than that conferred by the will would be to claim under it, renouncing the will they admit that they have been in possession of an estate without title. There must be a retrospective account of rents and profits, and an account of sums expended for melioration of the estate which must be reimbursed." The injustice of proceeding on any other basis than this becomes obvious when one reflects that it often happens (as has happened here) that after the liability to elect has been declared a period is allowed for consideration and determination on the part of the persons affected by such liability, so that the actual election is frequently not made until some time after the testator's death. And according to a well settled rule an infant bound to elect is generally, though not invariably, allowed to declare election within six months after attaining majority.

The forms—see 2 Seton, p. 1579, No. 6, and p. 1590, No. 8—proceed on these lines, and if it be possible, as it may be, to find orders framed differently, this may fairly be accounted for by supposing that there were peculiar circumstances to take the case out of the general rule. The difficulty of valuing property, especially real estate, as of a date long since passed is always considerable, and the parties concerned might agree, and the court itself might be opinion that it would be more convenient to accept a valuation at a later date.

The question submitted by the summons must, however, be answered by directing that the amount of compensation must be ascertained as at the date of the testator's death.

Summons.

This was a summons in the winding up of the above company to ascertain whether a sum of nearly 5d. per share, which had already been received from the former holder of certain shares which had been forfeited and sold by the company, could be obtained again from the purchaser.

The above company was incorporated in 1895 under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, with a capital divided into shares of the nominal value of £1 each, subsequently divided into shares of 5s. each. 40,000 of these shares had been formerly held by a company called the African Gold Properties (Limited). A sum of 3s. 4d. had been paid up on these shares, and the Randt Gold Mining Co. had called up the remaining 1s. 8d.

This call the African Gold Properties (Limited) had not paid, and in May, 1900, their 40,000 shares were by resolution of the Randt Gold Mining Co., under article 15 of the latter company's articles, declared forfeited, and were, together with 1,300 other shares held by other members and similarly forfeited, sold to the New Balkis Eersteling (Limited) for £150. At the time of sale a certificate was issued to the purchasing company which, after certifying that it was the holder of the shares on which 3s. 4d. per share had been paid, continued: "The remaining 1s. 8d. per share has been called up and is payable by the African Gold Properties (Limited), who were the holders of the shares prior to the same being forfeited, and the said New Balkis Eersteling (Limited) is to be deemed to be the holder of the said shares discharged from all calls due prior to the date hereof."

In December, 1900, the directors of the Randt Gold Mining Co. made a call of 1s. 3d. per share upon the New Balkis Eersteling Co., this being all they as directors could make at one time. This call the latter company refused to pay, and were sued for, and they were ordered to pay it by Bucknill, J., whose judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords; reported as Randt Gold Mining Co. v. New Balkis Eersteling (Limited), 51 W. R. 391, [1903] 1 K. B. 461, 52 W. R. 561, [1904] A. C. 165.

Articles 16 and 17 of the articles of association of the Randt Gold Mining Co. were as follows:

"16. Any share so forfeited shall be deemed to be the property of the company, and the directors may sell, re-allot, or otherwise dispose of them in such manner as they may think fit.

"17. Any member whose shares have been so forfeited shall, notwithstanding, be liable to pay, and shall forthwith pay to the company all calls, instalments, and interest, and expenses owing upon or in respect of such shares at the time of the forfeiture, together with interest thereon from the time of forfeiture until payment at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and the directors may enforce the payment of such moneys or any part thereof if they think fit, but shall not be under any obligation to do so."

Under this latter article the liquidator of the company, which was then being wound up, claimed from, and was paid by, the African Gold Properties (Limited) £790 18s. 1d., a sum just less than 5d. for each of the 40,000 shares formerly held by it. The liquidator of the Randt Gold Mining Co. contended that he was entitled, notwithstanding this payment, to make a further call upon the New Balkis Eersteling Co. of 5d. per share as being the remaining unpaid liability upon those shares.

The present summons was by the liquidator against the New Balkis Eersteling Co., asking that the latter company might be ordered to pay a sum of £898 6s. 8d., which included a call of the remaining 5d. per share upon the 40,000 shares in question held by the respondent company, the rest of the sum being for calls of larger amount upon the remaining 1 300 shares. Of that sum it was agreed that £107 8s. 7d., being the difference between £898 6s. 8d. and £790 18s. 1d., was due from the respondent company, and the only question was as to so much of the larger sum as equalled the £790 18s. 1d. already received from the African Gold Properties (Limited).

Clauson, for the liquidator of the Randt Gold Mining Co.—Articles 16 and 17 incorporate articles 20 and 21 of Table A verbatim. The payment of the £790 by the African Gold Properties (Limited) was made under these articles, and does not relieve the shareholders from their liability to pay the remaining 5d. per share. The payment of the £790 was not made in respect of calls upon the shares, but of a debt due to the Randt Gold Mining Co. in the nature of a penalty: Ladies Dress Association (Limited) v. Pulbrook, 49 W. R. 6, [1900] 2 Q. B. 376. The African Gold Properties (Limited) were not contributories of the company, but debtors: In re Blakely Ordnance Co., Needham's case, L. R. 4 Eq. 135, 15 W. R. Dig. 58; In re Blakely Ordnance Co., Stocken's case, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 412. Consequently their payment of the £790 has no effect upon the money due upon the shares by the holders, the respondent company.

C. C. Scott (P. O. Lawrence, K.C., with him), for the New Balkis Eersteling Co. — The liquidator is asking for part of the money due in respect of these shares to be paid twice over. He has already received the 5d. per share from the former holder and now seeks to make the present holder pay it again. This cannot have been the intention of the Companies Acts. Section 38 (4) limits the liability of the shareholder to the amount (if any) unpaid on his shares. But this 5d. has been already paid. In In re Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation, Bridger's case, 17 W. R. 216, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 266, Selwyn, L.J., says (p. 272) that if any sum has been paid from any source in respect of shares that payment would go in diminution of the liability of the shareholder. The company have now received the whole of the 5s. per share for which these 40,000 shares were issued, and they can claim no more.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 28.—BUCKLEY, J.—The only point which I have to decide is whether this 5d. per share can be recovered from the New Balkis Eersteling Co. The applicant says truly that the African Gold Properties (Limited), after forfeiture, was not a member or a contributory of the Randt Gold Mining Co., and that the 5d. per share which has been recovered from the former company has been paid by it not as a contributory, but under the special contract contained in article 17. He contends that this 5d. has therefore not been called and paid in respect of the shares. He argues that, having regard to section 38 (4) of the Companies Act, 1862, the member, that is to say, the New Balkis Eersteling Co., can be made liable up to the amount unpaid on the shares, and that this 5d. per share has not been paid on the shares, but paid under the special contract contained in article 17. In my judgment it is immaterial that the African Gold Properties (Limited) paid, not as members, but under the special contract in article 17. The material question is, not what was the character of the person who paid, but what was the character of the payment made. If the company have received payment of 5d. in respect of the 5s., the nominal amount of the share, they cannot enforce payment of it a second time. In my judgment it is plain that the 5d. was paid in respect of the

5s. payable upon the share. The special contract is that the member whose shares have been forfeited shall be liable to pay all calls "owing upon or in respect of such shares." The payment which he made was made under a liability to pay the call upon or in respect of the shares at the time of forfeiture. Its payment was, pro tanto, a discharge of the 5s. Suppose that a third party has guaranteed to a limited company the payment by a member of his calls upon his shares and that under that guarantee the company recovers against the guarantor and not against the member, still the payment made by the guarantor will be a satisfaction pro tanto of the liability on the shares just as much as if the payment had been made by the member. I see no ground upon which the company should be entitled to recover the 5d. twice over, once from the forfeited member, and again from the member who becomes the purchaser after the forfeiture. The purchaser is liable for the whole amount unpaid, but not for the whole amount irrespective of such payments as the company may recover from the forfeited member. As a separate and independent ground, I think that by contract between the company and the purchaser of the share the latter is entitled to the benefit of such payments as are made by the forfeited member. This point arises on the form of the certificate. The shares are sold as shares upon which the 1s. 8d. has been called up and is payable by the African Gold Properties (Limited). To such extent as the company recover in respect of that previous call they have, I think, contracted with the purchaser that he shall have the benefit of it towards satisfaction pro tanto of the amount unpaid at the time of his purchase. In my judgment the contention of the liquidator that he can recover over again from the New Balkis Eersteling the £790 18s. 1d. which the African Gold Properties (Limited) have paid, fails. He can only recover £107 8s. 7d., the amount agreed to be owing.

EMBIRICOS v. ANGLO-AUSTRIAN BANK. (a.)

Banker—Conversion—Cheque stolen—Conflict of law—Indorsement forged — Good title passed in foreign country—Cheque drawn in foreign country on bank in England—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 24, 72.

Plaintiffs in Roumania bought a cheque from a bank in Roumania drawn on a bank in England. The plaintiffs (payees) indorsed the cheque to "G. E. & Co.," a firm in London. The cheque was stolen and the indorsement forged. The thief indorsed the cheque to, and obtained payment for the cheque from, a bank in Vienna. The Vienna bank took the cheque for good consideration, acted in good faith and without gross negligence, and indorsed the cheque to the defendants and forwarded it to England, where it was presented to and paid by the bank on which it was drawn. The thief was prosecuted to conviction. By Austrian law the Vienna bank acquired a good title to the cheque.

Held, in an action for conversion of the cheque, that, since the Vienna bank acquired a good title to the cheque a good title was passed to the defendant bank, and that, therefore, the defendants were not liable for conversion.

The facts and argument appear in the following considered judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 10.—WALTON, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, Messrs. Leonidas Embiricos and another, sue the Anglo-Austrian Bank and claim £250 damages for the wrongful conversion of a cheque. The case raises a somewhat important question as to the rights of the parties under the circumstances of a case like the present one. Shortly, the controversy is this: The plaintiffs were the payees of the cheque in question. It was stolen from them, and it was fraudulently indorsed by the thief, or someone acting in concert with the thief, to a bank at Vienna, who took it for good consideration and in good faith, and it was indorsed by them to the Anglo-Austrian Bank, the defendants. The Anglo-Austrian Bank, the defendants, obtained payment of it from the bank upon whom the cheque was drawn. It is said that in dealing with the cheque and obtaining payment for it they were dealing with the property of the plaintiffs, that the cheque was the plaintiffs, and that the defendants are responsible for the conversion of the cheque. On the other hand, the defendants say that by the transfer of the cheque, which took place in Vienna to a Vienna bank, a good title passed to the Vienna bank—a good title which this court is bound to recognize—and that the Vienna bank having taken a good title gave a good title to the defendants, and therefore the defendants when they dealt with the cheque and obtained payment of it by presenting it to the bank upon which it was drawn were dealing, not with the plaintiffs' property, but with their own property, and therefore they are not liable in this action. The cheque was drawn on the 6th of March, 1903, by the Banque Generale at Braila, in Roumania, on a bank, the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, London, and was payable to the plaintiffs or their order. It was indorsed by the plaintiffs, who carry on business at Braila, to a firm of G. Embiricos, of London. The cheque was placed in an envelope with a letter addressed to Messrs. G. Embiricos & Co., London, and ought to have been posted, but instead of its being posted in due course the clerk in the service of the plaintiffs fraudulently opened the letter and stole the cheque, sending on the letter to its destination—that is, to Messrs. G. Embiricos & Co., London. The cheque then found its way to Vienna, and at Vienna on the 9th of March (the cheque having been drawn on the 6th of March) it was taken by someone who no doubt was acting in concert with the thief to the bank, which I call the Vienna bank, to be cashed. The Vienna bank not knowing the person who brought the cheque to them asked him to call again the next day. It appeared to be properly indorsed. The Vienna bank then communicated with the drawers of the cheque, that is to say, the Banque Generale of Braila, and ascertained from the drawers of the cheque that the cheque was drawn by them and therefore was a genuine cheque in that sense, and the next day, the 10th of March, the person who had brought the cheque on the previous day to the bank to be cashed, called again, and it was cashed, that is to say, he received its value and the cheque was handed over to the Vienna bank. It purported to be duly indorsed by Messrs. G. Embiricos & Co., to whose order it had been indorsed by the plaintiffs. Then it was sent on, indorsed by the Vienna bank, to the Anglo-Austrian Bank in London and was cashed by them. There is here, of course, no question as to the contractual rights in the cheque as against the bank upon whom the cheque was drawn. They are not parties to the action. The only question is a question as between two successive holders of the cheque as between the original payees, who were holders and from whom the cheque was stolen, and a subsequent holder who acquired his title through and by means of a forged indorsement.

It is plain that if this case is to be governed by English law the defendants—there is no dispute about it—would have no defence to this action. The English law is stated in section 24 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provides that: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, where a signature on a bill is forged or placed thereon without the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be, the forged or unauthorized signature is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the bill or to give a discharge therefor or to enforce payment thereof against any party thereto can be acquired through or under that signature, unless the party against whom it is sought to retain or enforce payment of the bill is precluded from setting up the forgery or want of authority." But the defendants say that the English law as stated in that section of the Bills of Exchange Act does not apply to the present case because the cheque was transferred in Vienna to the Vienna bank, and the defendants say that by the law of Austria, which is the law of Vienna, the Vienna bank obtained a good title to the cheque although it was handed to them by some person who either was the thief or was acting in concert with the thief who had stolen the cheque, and although the indorsement to it, that is, the written indorsement, was a forgery. It is stated that that is the law of Austria, the law which would govern a transaction of this kind in Vienna, and that the question of title arising from the transfer of the cheque in Vienna must be determined by the law of Vienna. Now, with regard to the law of Vienna I do not think there is any dispute. It is stated in affidavits, and, so far as I can see, the affidavits of the plaintiffs and of the defendants agree. In an affidavit used by the defendants (the affidavit of Dr. Wilhem Stein) it is alleged in paragraph 7 that: "By Austrian law the holder of a cheque which he has bought bonâ fide and for value is identified as proprietor of the cheque and entitled to the proceeds thereof against all the world, notwithstanding that the cheque has previously been stolen and notwithstanding that the indorsement has been forged." I do not need to read the rest of the affidavit. The articles of the code applicable to Vienna are set out. I think one ought to add to that statement of the law what appears lower down. "By Austrian law the holder of a cheque which he has bought bonâ fide and without gross negligence" ought to be added, "and for value is identified as proprietor of the cheque and entitled to the proceeds thereof against all the world notwithstanding that the cheque has previously been stolen and notwithstanding that the indorsement has been forged." The law is stated in an affidavit which has been put in by the plaintiffs practically in the same language. There is no dispute as to what the Austrian law is.

The question is whether the validity of the indorsement and transfer in Vienna depends upon the Austrian law or whether it depends upon English law. Mr. Cohen, for the defendants, relied on the general principle which is applicable to ordinary chattels, and which he contended was applicable also to a cheque such as the cheque in question in this case, and the general rule upon which he relied is stated in the case of Alcock v. Smith, by Romer, J., now Romer, L.J., in giving judgment in that case, and whose judgment was afterwards affirmed by the Court of Appeal. What Romer, J., said was this: "Generally the rights of transferor and transferee on a transfer in one country of a document of title to a debt or to an interest in personal property are governed by the law of the country where the transfer takes place, although the debt may be due from persons living in, or the personal property may be situate in a foreign country." Mr, Cohen with regard to chattels, contended, and I think rightly, that the law is correctly stated in Mr. Dicey's book on the Conflict of Laws in rule 140. The rule as stated by Mr. Dicey, is in these words: "An assignment of a movable which can be touched (goods), giving a good title thereto according to the law of the country where the movable is situate at the time of the assignment (lex situs) is valid." I do not think that it was disputed, or at least I do not gather that it was disputed that that is a correct statement of the law with regard to ordinary chattels and, therefore, if this had not been a cheque, but had been a diamond, say, which had been stolen out of a letter and then sold in Vienna under such circumstances that the purchaser in Vienna took a good title, and the question afterwards arose in this country as to the validity of the sale in Vienna, the English courts would recognize the validity of the transaction in Vienna, if it was good according to the law of Vienna, even although it would not be good according to the law of England. It seems to me the analogy with a sale in market overt is almost exact. A horse is stolen and is taken by the thief to some other place and is sold in market overt: according to the general law, the thief could give no title at all; if it is sold in market overt according to our English law the purchaser does get a good title. You might imagine a somewhat similar state of things with regard to a foreign state like Austria. It might very well be that a sale in Vienna of a chattel might confer a good title according to the Austrian law although if the same sale had taken place in London no title at all would have been given. In such a case it seems to me plain that the title acquired in Vienna, good according to Austrian law, would be a good title in England.

Now, does this apply to a bill or a cheque? It seems to me that the case of Alcock v. Smith from the beginning to end assumes that the same rule must be applied to a cheque as would be applied to a chattel. Romer, J., having begun by pointing out that in that case the question arose, not as a question of contract between the parties to the contract, but as a question as between successive holders, as to the title to the instrument, refers to the general law and refers to the rule with regard to chattels as to which I have just spoken, and it seems to me in that case that he applies the ordinary rule with regard to chattels to a bill. In that case, stating it quite shortly, the question arose in this way: A bill was purchased in Norway under circumstances which gave the purchaser a good title in Norway by Norwegian law, but which would not have given to the purchaser a good title in England if the transaction had taken place in England according to English law; at any rate, it would not have given the purchaser a good title as against the plaintiffs in the case of Alcock v. Smith. The bill having been purchased in Norway was indorsed to the defendant (I am speaking now of the defendant in the case of Alcock v. Smith), who was in England, and the plaintiffs, against whom, according to the English law, the defendants had acquired no title or not a good title, set up their claim against the defendant in England. The question had to be determined in England, and it was held that although the purchaser under the same circumstances would not have taken a good title, and that, therefore, the defendant would not have had a good title as against the plaintiffs if the purchase and the transaction had been in England, yet because the transaction was in Norway, and was good according to Norwegian law, he did not take a good title as against the plaintiffs. It seems to me that in effect Alcock v. Smith governs the present case, and that I am bound to follow it, and, if so, my judgment ought to be for the defendants.

Reference was also made to section 72, sub-section 2, of the Bills of Exchange Act, which is this: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, the interpretation of the drawing, indorsement, acceptance, or acceptance supra protest of a bill is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made." "Contract" there means drawing, indorsement, or acceptance, or by acceptance under protest. There is an exception: "Provided that where an inland bill is indorsed in a foreign country the indorsement shall, as regards the payer, be interpreted according to the law of the United Kingdom." Mr. Cohen scarcely relied upon that sub-section, although, if interpretation of the indorsement means the legal effect of the transfer by indorsement, it seems to me it would have covered the present case—if it means that. "Indorsement," of course, in the Bills of Exchange Act means something more than the mere writing of a name or, at any rate, of some words on the back of a cheque. "Indorsement," as interpreted by the Bills of Exchange Act, means an indorsement completed by delivery; and therefore "indorsement" means the transaction of delivering a cheque indorsed. It has been said in the very case I have referred to of Alcock v. Smith that the word "interpretation" is not to be read in the strict sense merely of an explanation of words and language, but as meaning the legal effect—that the legal effect of the indorsement is to be determined by the law of the place where such contract is made. If that means the legal effect of the transfer by indorsement, it seems to me it would apply to the present case. But whether it does apply or whether it does not apply, it does not prevent the general rule from applying. I do not think in the case of a codifying Act like the Bills of Exchange Act, because a particular instance of the application of a general rule is expressly provided for and mentioned, that you can properly argue the general rule applies only so far as it is expressly mentioned; that does not exclude as to the other things which are not expressly mentioned, because these Acts, like the Bills of Exchange Act, do not pretend to be scientific codes in which the whole of the principles are laid down from beginning to end, but they are really rather in the nature of a digest; and in this, as in other statutes of the same kind, there is a general saving clause which provides that the general principles of law are to apply, which is section 97, sub-section 2: "The rules of common law, including the law of merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to bills of exchange, promissory notes, and cheques." Therefore, even although section 72 does not apply, and ought not to be read so as to govern the present case, I think that the general principle which I have endeavoured to indicate does apply, and that this is analogous to a case in which a chattel was transferred in Vienna in such a way as, according to the Austrian law, to give a good title, although not in such a way as would give a good title according to English law. In such a case the title acquired in Vienna would be recognized as a good title in the English courts, and I think the same rule applies to a cheque under the circumstances of this case.

There is another question. By the Austrian law the Vienna bank took a good title only if it took the cheque in good faith and for full value (about which there is no dispute), and also without gross negligence. It is said there was gross negligence, and the gross negligence relied upon is this: That the Vienna bank did not make further inquiries as to the stranger who brought the cheque to the bank to be cashed. That is one point which is relied upon, and I will deal with that first. They did inquire of the drawer of the cheque to ascertain whether the cheque was a genuine cheque to begin with—whether it was really a cheque drawn by the drawer on the bank in London. They found out that it was. Who the person was into whose hands the cheque had got they could not tell at all except by asking him, and it seems to me that that would have been a very useless proceeding, because he could have said anything he chose; and I do not think that they could expect to be able to obtain any reasonable security as to the validity of the transaction, or as to the validity of the title of the person who presented the cheque to them by making inquiries of him. At any rate, the fact that they did not make any further inquiry than they did, does not seem to amount to what the Austrian law calls gross negligence.

Then the other point is this: It is said that the cheque was indorsed to G. Embiricos & Co., and that G. Embiricos & Co. were in London; but there was nothing on the face of the cheque to show that they were in London. So that there was nothing to show that G. Embiricos & Co., to whom the cheque was indorsed, were really in London. It is said that the cheque was cashed on the 10th, and was drawn on the 6th, and that it could not have got to London and back. That may be so, but I do not see that there is anything in that which in itself was suspicious. So far as the Austrian bank was concerned the cheque might quite properly be in the hands of some person in Vienna on the 9th of March, although it was drawn only on the 6th, and it seems to me that the evidence as to gross negligence fails.

Therefore, if I am right in the principle of law which I think ought to be applied to this case, and if I am right in saying that it is governed by Alcock v. Smith, there must be judgment for the defendants.

The difference between this case and Alcock v. Smith seems to me to be this: that in Alcock v. Smith there was no fraud; there was no question of the bill having been stolen; it was not dealt with by a thief or by anybody who had acquired it dishonestly. But in the case of a chattel that would make no difference. In the case of a sale in market overt it makes no difference, and I do not see why it should make any difference in the present case. I have found nothing else that is material which seems to me to distinguish the case of Alcock v. Smith from the present case, and, therefore, I think there must be judgment for the defendants.

JACKSON v. WIMBLEDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Drainage—Single private drain—Liability to repair—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 41—Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 19.

A main or common drain which was admitted to be in itself a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act connected with the public sewer by means of a branch drain which was admitted to be a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890;

Held, that the sewer was not thereby converted into a single private drain so as to enable the local authority to recover from the owner of one of the houses his proportion of the cost incurred by them in repairing the drain.

Case stated.

The appellant was summoned on the 8th of August, 1903, for that he did on the 29th of April, 1903, or on some day or days within six months then last past, make default in payment of the sum of £35 1s. due and owing from the appellant to the respondents, being the amount of expenses incurred by the respondents in the execution of certain works in relaying the main or common drain at the rear of Nos. 51, 53, 55, 57, 59, 61, 63, 65, 67, 69, 71, and 73, Hartfield-crescent, and also did make default in payment of £13 7s. 5d., a proportion of the expenses incurred by the respondents in the execution of certain works in relaying a single private drain connecting 73, Hartfield-crescent and 75, Hartfield-crescent, belonging to different owners, with a certain public sewer.

On the north side of Hartfield-crescent, in the respondents' district, are sixteen houses numbered with odd numbers from 51 to 81, both inclusive. The appellant is the owner of twelve of these houses. A Mr. Halliday is the owner of 75, and a Mr. Ysoldt is the owner of the other three. At the rear of these houses runs a main common drain running from east to west connected with the public sewer in Hartfield-crescent by a branch drain (hereafter called branch drain AB) running from north to south between the house numbered 73 and the house numbered 75, at about right angles to Hartfield-crescent, under a narrow piece of land between the two houses which is unbuilt upon. Each of the sixteen houses connects at the rear with the main or common drain by means of branch drains which convey the sewage from each of the houses to the main drain, and thence through the branch drain AB into the public sewer in Hartfield-crescent. The main drain at the rear of the houses Nos. 51 and 81, and the branch drain AB are constructed wholly upon private property.

Part III. of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, has been adopted in the respondents' district.

On the 26th of November, 1902, a written application was made to the respondents acting as the local authority under the Public Health Act stating the drains on the premises 77 to 85 (inclusive), Hartfield-crescent were a nuisance and injurious to health, and requesting them in pursuance of the said Act to empower their inspector of nuisances to enter the premises and cause the ground to be opened up and examined.

In pursuance of section 41 of the said Act, the respondents, as the local authority, on the 18th of December, 1902, by writing, empowered their inspector of nuisances, after giving twenty-four hours' notice in writing to the occupier, to enter such premises and cause the ground to be opened.

In pursuance of such authority, after giving the notice specified, the inspector of nuisances did enter and open up the drains at the rear of Nos. 77 to 85, Hartfield-crescent, and found that it was necessary for the drain at the rear of Nos. 75 and 51 to 73 (odd numbers, inclusive), Hartfield-crescent, to be also opened up and examined, and being empowered by the respondents to do this, he also opened up and examined the drains at the back of these premises. The whole of the main or common drain appeared to be in a bad condition and to require alteration, and the inspector duly represented such fact to the respondents.

The respondents thereupon caused notice to be given to the owners and occupiers of all the sixteen houses requiring them to execute the necessary works forthwith, or within a reasonable time therein specified.

The owners of the premises Nos. 75, 77, 79, and 81 duly executed the works required by the respondents to their satisfaction so far as such works affected the main drain, but made default in executing the works required to the branch drain AB.

The appellant, as the owner of the houses Nos. 51 to 73, did not comply with such notice, but made default in executing the works so required to be done to the branch drain AB, and the main drain at the rear of the houses Nos. 51 to 73; and the respondents duly executed such works, and their surveyor duly made an apportionment of the expenses of such works by apportioning the expense of the branch drain AB amongst the owners of the sixteen houses, 51 to 81 (odd numbers), Hartfield-crescent and also apportioned the cost of the works executed to the main drain at the rear of 51 to 73 upon the appellant. The appellant did not within the required statutory period of three months dispute such apportionment, and the same has now become binding. Formal demand was made by the respondents, as local authority, for the sums so apportioned—viz., £35 1s. in respect of repairs to the main drain, and £13 7s. 5d. in respect of the repairs to the branch drain AB, and default having been made by the appellant in complying with such demand, on the 8th of August, 1903, the respondent laid this complaint before the magistrates.

It was admitted before the justices by the appellant that the branch drain AB was a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1890, but it was contended on his behalf that the main or common drain at the back of the houses Nos. 51 to 73 was a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1890, and not a single private drain connecting two or more houses belonging to different owners with a public sewer, within the meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1890.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that it is necessary to have regard to the entire system of drainage discharging into the public sewer, and that such system of drainage comprehended the drainage of the whole of the houses Nos. 51 to 81, which belong to different owners, and form in fact one entire drain connecting the whole of the sixteen houses with the public sewer; that, therefore, the main or common drain at the rear of the houses Nos. 51 and 81 and the branch drain AB were capable of being dealt with under section 19 of the Act as a single private drain within the meaning of that section.

The question for the opinion of the justices was whether the main or common drain at the rear of the houses was a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.

The justices decided in favour of the respondents, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether their decision was right.

Section 19, sub-section 1, of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, provides as follows: "Where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain, an application may be made under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (relating to complaints as to nuisances from drains), and the local authority may recover any expenses incurred by them in executing any works, under the powers conferred on them by that section, from the owners of the houses in such shares and proportions as shall be settled by their surveyor (or the case of dispute by a court of summary jurisdiction)."

Sylvain Mayor, for the appellant.

Macmorran, K.C. (G. Humphreys with him), for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I hope that the day will arrive when no question can arise as to what is a sewer and what is a drain. But really the difficulty of dealing with these questions is such that one does hope that something may be done in the way of a declaratory Act or an amending Act to put these questions beyond the range of discussion. The difficulty probably arises, and the difficulty in legislating probably arose, from the fact that here you are applying modern provisions as to sanitation and repairs of drains to old methods of drainage that have been built up under all kinds of systems.

Now, the main proposition for which counsel for the respondents contends is this: once get section 19 of the Act of 1890 to apply, and you are entitled to go back to the end of all the drains or sewers—for this purpose the drains as I will call them, so as not to appear to beg the question—that connect with the private drain to bring them all within the purview of section 41 of the Act of 1875. I think, stated in that way, the proposition goes too far. I have had a great deal of trouble in this case by reason of the fact that it is admitted that the branch drain AB is a single private drain within section 19 of the Act of 1890, therefore in respect to that part of it at any rate, proceedings could be taken under section 41 of the Act of 1875. But I think that the main contention of counsel goes too far. It does not follow that you are entitled to go to the end of every pipe and say that they are all of them private drains because they happen to connect. One could put a number of cases, although I do not know that very much light is thrown by trying to put cases, but it does seem to me, to take one case, that if that were so, a person who was in possession of an undoubted sewer, or through whose land there went a sewer, the obligation of repairing which sewer really had fallen upon the local authority, might be deprived of those rights by the action of third persons without his consent at all. Therefore I think that the proposition is too wide.

Under these circumstances what is the real question we have to decide? It is that the main or common drain at the rear of the houses 51 to 73 would be a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, if it had discharged into a sewer at the point whence it runs into the branch drain AB, or if it had been connected by a pipe (which was not a single private drain) which ran from that point to the sewer. At first I was inclined to think that it was difficult to contend that a sewer could communicate with a single private drain; but after the consideration this case has undergone, and the argument that has been addressed to us, I think that that view of mine was not well founded and went too far.

The scheme, as far as one can see there is a scheme of legislation, originally provided that where there was a drain which drained more than two houses or more than two buildings within the definition contained in section 4 of the Act of 1875, it became a sewer because it was not a drain. I can well imagine that there may be a structure, as in this case, dealing with a long row of houses as to which it could not be denied that they would be sewers. They do in fact empty on both sides in this case into that which for this purpose must be taken as being a single private drain.

I do not think that the admission made with regard to a single private drain ought to be construed as being an admission, that the whole of it is a single private drain, because, whatever may have been the reasons for the admission, or however it came to be made, the point was distinctly raised that the main or common drains at the rear of the houses 51 to 73 was a sewer. Does section 19 of the Act of 1890, which enables the local authority to apply section 41 of the Act of 1875, involve the proposition that because you find that there is a single private drain the connections with that must be part of the single private drain and are to be so regarded? As I have already pointed out, that might involve the loss of rights and the change of obligations which undoubtedly existed prior to the Act of 1890, and it would require clear and distinct words in order to bring about that result. The words of section 19 are "where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain." I am fully conscious of the difficulty of understanding what was meant by "a single private drain" having regard to the fact that if a drain does drain two houses it would become a sewer by virtue of the Act of 1875. But at the same time the Legislature, I think, certainly did not mean to sweep away the distinction between a drain and a sewer for all purposes in that particular case, nor does counsel for the respondents contend that. He says that for some purposes the distinction will remain. If the effect of the section is to throw the obligation of nuisance and repair upon the occupier I do not know what there is substantially left beyond ventilation. At any rate it seems to me that the purview of the section is to confine the operation of section 41 to that which is a single private drain, and I point out that in the case which has been of great assistance to us, and which certainly discussed the matter more carefully than any other case that I know—I mean the case of Bradford v. The Mayor of Eastbourne, [1896] 2 Q. B. 46, 44 W. R. Dig. 93—it was not contended nor was it any part of the decision that the obligations and the rights extended to more than that it was a single private drain in fact. It was not any part of that decision to decide that that which was connected with a single private drain must of necessity have been a single private drain itself or part of it. I cannot help thinking that the language of the most careful judgment (if he will permit me to say so) of my brother Wills rather excludes the idea that the matter was in any way considered by the court beyond the particular question as to what was the meaning of "a single private drain" under section 19 of the Act of 1890.

Therefore I think that we are entitled, notwithstanding the admission, to say that that which was a sewer may still remain to be a sewer, and that the fact that it connects with a single private drain does not make a difference. It would have been a sewer had it connected with the main sewer by means of that which was itself a sewer or by a continuation of its own pipe. I do not think that the fact that it does happen to pour out into a single private drain, and thereby get to the sewer, makes any difference for the purpose of deciding what is the character of the main or common drain.

Of course in this case, counsel for the respondents contends you find a private drain, you find the different owners, and therefore a case under section 19 arises. I think that is perfectly true so far as the portion of the pipe or conduit is concerned which is found to be a single private drain into which the other drains or sewers may connect; but I see no reason why a sewer should not connect with the single private drain and then with another sewer.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the justices were wrong in coming to the conclusion that the main or common drain at the rear of the houses 51 to 73 was a drain within the meaning of the Public Health Act, and not a sewer, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, though with considerable difficulty, because it seems to me that to reconcile section 19 of the Act of 1890 with the general legislation on this subject is a work of extreme difficulty. The court of which I was a member attempted to do it in the Eastbourne case, and I think so far as the Eastbourne case was concerned the attempt was not altogether unsuccessful. But now it comes to be applied to a different set of circumstances, and that creates a fresh difficulty and one as to which the considerations of policy appear to me to be pretty evenly balanced; so there is a very great difficulty in saying that there is any particular reason why one should incline to one class of construction rather than another, for reasons of public convenience or general policy.

What appears to me to be the determining factor really is that when you come to look at section 19 the facts which are disclosed in this case would seem to primâ facie bring us to say that this was a case in which under certain circumstances at all events section 19 might apply; because there are two or more houses which belong to different owners—namely, those on the right-hand side and those on the left-hand side of the passageway through which the branch drain AB is carried. They are connected with the public sewer by that single private drain AB, and then one has got to see, when that is granted, what the consequences are, those being the facts. The consequences are that application may be made under section 41 of the Act of 1875, and when you turn to section 41 I think it is very clear that the drain in respect of which complaint is to be made, and the drain in respect of which the local authority has the power of calling upon the owner to do the work, and may do it themselves if the owner does not do it, is the same drain in each case. If that is the case, then, inasmuch as the obstruction did not lie in the branch drain AB section 41 would not apply. There seems to be a certain sort of intelligible groundwork for such a view in this consideration—that if the obstruction does arise in the branch drain, generally speaking it would be almost impossible to say which of the various effluents which meet in the branch drain is the one that does the mischief, and therefore it is reasonable enough that the expense of putting things right should be shared amongst all the people who use the branch drain. That, of course, does not apply when you are dealing with the main accommodation at the rear of the houses 51 to 73, because the other houses which are necessary to bring in the operation of section 19 of the Act of 1890 do not directly drain into it.

I do not say that these reasons are satisfactory. I very much doubt whether completely satisfactory reasons could be given for any decision any way upon any question almost of those which have come under my notice under this section 19; but I think upon the whole, for the reasons which I have mentioned, that the decision which my lord has announced is the correct one.

KENNEDY, J.—I think so too. I quite agree that it is very difficult to come to any satisfactory solution of the difficulties which are presented on one side or the other in connection with this case, but it seems to me that the least difficult is the one which my lord has presented.

I will only add just this: the section which is invoked by the repondents here is section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890. To what does that relate? To put it shortly, it relates to the rights or duties of repairing and of bearing expense connected with a single private drain which connects two or more houses belonging to different owners with a sewer. Does any portion of the main or common sewer at the rear of the houses 51 and 73—and that is what we have got to deal with—fulfil that condition? Clearly not. It is a complete length which would be a sewer, and repairable by the public authority for the whole distance because it is a length of conveyance of sewage—to avoid the words "drain" and "sewer"—not from different owners but from the same owner. Does the branch drain AB satisfy it? I think myself it does, and no question arises as to the branch drain. Therefore, from 51 to 73 you have got the different owners, and you have got them connected by what certainly may be described as a single private drain. Does the fact, then, that the branch drain is a single private drain and does collect from houses owned by different persons carry with it, so to speak, the right to treat as a single private drain within the section, a track, I will call it, or a range of drainage which clearly does satisfy it, and the connection of which at B is one of the elements, but one which by itself would be insufficient to make AB a single private drain. AB only becomes a single private drain because of the connection with different houses which is involved in the connection at its northern end, not only with the main or common drain at the rear of the houses Nos. 51 to 73, but the main or common drain at the rear of the houses 75 to 81.

It seems to me that that which is the most simple, because the most natural, explanation of the words is also the one which, on the whole, least conflicts with the considerations that arise from the fact that this is an amending Act, and has to be read with the provisions of the earlier legislation, which undoubtedly did protect the private owner in respect of these things.

HOWARD v. PRESS PRINTERS (LIMITED) (a.)

Practice—Injunction—Undertaking in lieu of injunction—Cross-undertaking by plaintiff as to damages.

Where, before the opening of a motion for an interim injunction, the defendant offers out of court an undertaking which is embodied in the order in lieu of an injunction, there is no practice under which a cross-undertaking in damages by the plaintiff is to be implied. Such an implication may arise where the defendant's undertaking is given under pressure from the court.

Appeal from a refusal of Farwell, J., to vary the minutes of an arranged order.

The plaintiffs, Mr. Howard and two others, were owners of some residential flats, and they brought an action, and served notice of motion for an interim injunction, to restrain the continuance of a nuisance to their tenants caused by the working night and day of the defendants' steam printing and folding engines.

Before the motion was opened on the 5th of August, it was suggested—whether by the judge or counsel was disputed—that a modus vivendi might be arrived at, and the respective solicitors accordingly left the court and conferred, with the result that the defendants through their solicitor offered an undertaking, till the trial, not to run their machines after 7 p.m. or before 8 a.m., an exception being allowed of one night in each week and of one additional night in one week in September or October. These terms, with some further provisions as to keeping windows closed, and as to delivery of pleadings so as to expedite the trial, were reduced to writing and signed by the parties, and with some trifling emendations by counsel the agreement was communicated to the court and embodied in an order made in lieu of injunction.

In drawing up the said order the registrar inserted a cross-undertaking by the plaintiffs as to damages, and the plaintiffs moved to vary the minutes by striking out the cross-undertaking, which they said was not included in the terms agreed on, and would not, if proposed, have been acceded to by them. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that such a term was to be implied, and that without it they would not have entered into the agreement.

The motion was heard on the 31st of October.

Butcher, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and Whinney, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., said that an undertaking given to the court and having the force of an interim injunction involved, like it, a cross-undertaking as to damages. This was so well known that it was said in Seton (p. 521) that registrars were directed always to insert it. So invariable was the practice in that court that it was seldom counsel thought it necessary to mention such an undertaking, and then only in case of some concession. It was said there was something special in this case because the agreement was made by the solicitors outside the court. But the defendants' undertaking was an onerous one, and if the matter was wrong it ought to be set right in damages. If parties chose to settle outside, they did so on the understanding that the ordinary practice of the court would be adhered to, and if they wished to exclude it they must do so expressly. The difficulty in the present case was that the defendants had been three months under their undertaking. As to that past time the order must be drawn up, including the cross-undertaking, but, as the plaintiffs wished it and the defendants did not object, both undertakings would be stopped and dissolved as from the present day. He refused leave to appeal.

The plaintiffs appealed by leave of the Court of Appeal.

Butcher, K.C., and R. J. Parker, for the plaintiffs.—The judgment in Attorney-General v. Albany Hotel Co., [1896] 2 Ch. 696, 699, 700, shows that the court cannot compel a plaintiff to undertake in damages though it will withhold an injunction in the absence of such an undertaking. In Tucker v. New Brunswick Trading Co., 38 W. R. 741, 44 Ch. D. 249, 252, an injunction was granted against the company, but not against the two other defendants. One of these latter asked for an undertaking in damages, and the Court of Appeal held that he was entitled to it, but that the other, who had not been represented on the motion for injunction, was not. In Smith v. Day, 31 W. R. 187, 21 Ch. D. 421, 424, Jessel, M.R., sets forth how these undertakings came to be inserted. It was to insure justice being done in case it turned out on fuller evidence at the trial that the interim injunction ought not to have been granted. Farwell, J., did not appreciate the difference between an injunction granted, and a voluntary undertaking by a defendant. [ROMER, L.J.—It might be hard on a plaintiff if a defendant undertook to stop working altogether till the trial, knowing that this was unnecessary, and relying on being recouped for all loss by the plaintiff under an implied undertaking; but I should like to leave open a possible case of a motion to restrain, say, a sale on the following day, and of the judge saying "I shall grant an injunction unless the defendant will give an undertaking." When pressure is thus put on a defendant, I think a cross-undertaking may well be implied.] The result of upholding the decision of Farwell, J., will be to make settlements in future more difficult, and to increase the number of motions that must be fought out.

Upjohn, K.C., and Whinney, for the defendants.—In James v. Jones, 67 L. T. 584, 41 W. R. Dig. 170, the Court of Appeal refused to entertain an appeal from a decision of a judge as to the minutes of his judgment. There is really no difference between what took place on the 5th of August and what would have happened if the agreement had been come to between counsel. If a motion is before the court, and is not fought out because the parties through their counsel agree what shall be done before the trial, it is the same thing as if an injunction had been granted in those terms, and a cross-undertaking ought therefore to be implied. An undertaking in the terms of the notice of motion has the effect of an injunction, and the defendant gets a cross-undertaking as a matter of course. These undertakings were at first confined to ex parte applications, and have been gradually extended. We admit we have not found a case deciding they are to be implied where no injunction is granted, but in practice they are inserted without being mentioned. [ROMER, L.J.—What damages are you asking for—those that would follow from an injunction in terms of the notice of motion, or of your undertaking?] Our application is that if it be found hereafter that there was no case for relief on the motion we shall have damages for what we were induced to do under the apprehension of an injunction, though in fact it was never pronounced. The form expressly limits the damages to the amount which the defendants might incur and which the plaintiffs ought to pay.

(a.) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If a defendant should offer too wide an undertaking a plaintiff need not accept it. It is said that the effect of upholding the decision of Farwell, J., would be disastrous, but if defendants know that an injunction does, while an undertaking does not, carry with it an implied undertaking in damages they will be the less likely to come to an agreement.

Butcher, K.C., was not called on to reply.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think this appeal must be allowed, and that the undertaking of the plaintiffs to answer in damages must be struck out. It is said that there is really no difference in the matters which have been under discussion in this case between an injunction and an undertaking. I do not agree with that. I think that an undertaking entered into with the court is the equivalent, and will have the effect, of an injunction thus far, that any infringement of the undertaking may be made the subject of an application to the court to enforce it. But, apart from that, there is this essential difference between the two: an injunction is something that the court orders, something that the court compels. With regard to an undertaking, I do not suppose anyone seriously suggests that the court can by its order compel an undertaking. I do not mean to say that in every sense of the word an undertaking is invariably voluntary; for instance, supposing an injunction has been granted by the court of first instance, and there is an appeal against the order for an injunction; upon the appeal coming on to be discussed, the Court of Appeal might think that the injunction was a great deal too wide, and they might put to the appellants: "We will make an order absolutely dissolving this injunction, not limiting it or amending it, or anything of the sort; but you, the appellants, undertaking," and then the appellants might give an undertaking which would be a reasonable undertaking under the circumstances. But, generally speaking, the proposition is true that a court cannot order what we call an undertaking. Now, that being so, it seems to me that the only question here is a question whether there is any practice in the courts which could justify the court in saying in this case that by necessary implication the plaintiffs here, when they accepted the defendants' undertaking, consented to give an undertaking to answer in damages. It does not seem to me that that has been made out. Farwell, J., says in his judgment: "In my opinion the registrar was right. I think if parties go outside to settle the terms of an order like this" (that is, an order saying "the court doth make no order, the defendant undertaking . . ."), "they settle it on the understanding that the ordinary practice of the court will be adhered to, and, if they wish to exclude that practice, they must bargain and make terms to that effect. If a man takes an undertaking, and does not wish to give a cross-undertaking, in my opinion it is incumbent on him to put it in the terms." Now if that practice had been established to-day, then Farwell, J., would have been quite right, and we should have held that by implication the plaintiff who took the undertaking consented to give a cross-undertaking. But in my judgment no such practice has been established. Mr. Upjohn has frankly said that he cannot produce any authority to that effect. I do not profess myself to have any knowledge of what the practice in such matters in the Chancery Division may have been, but I have heard the statements that have been made in the course of the argument by Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., and I accept it, that there is no such practice. Under these circumstances it seems to me that without going the length of saying that there never could be a case in which the plaintiff, by the acceptance of the undertaking of the defendant, impliedly consented to give a cross-undertaking although it was not mentioned, I see nothing in this case to lead me to suppose that this is a case of that sort; and speaking generally of what would be convenient, I think for the reasons that have been given in respect of such a case, for instance, as a defendant expressing his willingness to give a very wide undertaking indeed, the effect of which might be that if the plaintiff gave a cross-undertaking to be answerable in damages he might expose himself to considerable risk, it is much more convenient that if the defendant giving an undertaking wishes for a cross-undertaking, he should expressly say so, and it is not to be taken as against the plaintiff that he assents because he does not exclude such cross-undertaking. I think the order must be amended in the way I have indicated. Costs in any event so as to avoid a separate taxation.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not say that a case may not arise in which, where an undertaking has been given by a defendant on a motion for an injunction, and nothing has been expressly said about an undertaking as to damages on the part of the plaintiff, such an undertaking may not be implied. There may be such a case. The question is whether in the present case such an undertaking as to damages can be implied. Now, when I look at the arrangement come to between the parties, the wording of it, and the form of the order as drawn up, I must say, speaking for myself, that I cannot conceive that an undertaking as to damages ought to be implied. In the first place my experience is that there is no general practice that whenever, on a motion for an injunction, a defendant offers to give an undertaking, a corresponding undertaking as to damages on the part of the plaintiff is in fact to be implied; I know of no such practice. There is a practice, and a right practice I have no doubt, that in cases where the court grants an injunction it always makes a term, whether it is express or to be implied, that the injunction granted is on the terms of an undertaking by the plaintiffs as to damages. In that case the reason why the undertaking is required is of course obvious. It may turn out at the trial that the order was wrong, as subsequent events have proved, and that the court never ought to have made the order it did, and therefore it is for the purpose in that case of restoring the defendant to the position he ought to have been in by recompensing him as to damages, that the court in the case of an injunction requires an undertaking as to damages. It is because it is an order of the court enforcing a certain obligation upon the defendant, which he is protesting against, but which he is bound to obey. But in the case of an undertaking offered by a defendant on the hearing of a motion, that undertaking may be, and generally is, as far as the court is concerned, a voluntary act on the part of the person undertaking, and may go beyond any order that the court would have made but for the undertaking, and go beyond anything that would have been asked for by the plaintiff if the defendant had not voluntarily given the undertaking. Now, in the present case, what happened was this. The parties arranged terms; the defendant offered an undertaking, and it was because of that undertaking on his part that the court, as appears on the face of the order itself that is drawn up, expressly made no order on the motion. The court was not asked to hear the motion, and did not hear it. The parties arranged that undertaking, and the court, as I have pointed out, on its being brought to its notice, took the undertaking, made no order, and did not hear the motion. Now, in the present case, having regard to what the nature of the motion was, a motion for an injunction to restrain the nuisance alleged, and to the form of the undertaking given, which was an undertaking not to do certain work at all between certain hours of the night, except upon some day or days in the week, I cannot think that if the defendants had not offered that undertaking any such order would have been asked for by the plaintiffs to correspond with what was contained in the undertaking, nor that the court, had it been asked, would have made an injunction in terms corresponding to the undertaking. On the contrary, I feel pretty certain that no such order would have been granted, and that no such order would have been asked for. Nor can I in the present case assume, as against the plaintiffs, that if the defendants had said "We give this undertaking on the terms that you give a corresponding undertaking as to damages," the plaintiffs would have given any such undertaking. On the contrary, I think it might have involved them in a risk which they might well have shrunk from incurring, even if they were right in the action. I do not see how, even if they were entitled to an injunction in respect of a nuisance, they could have been compelled to give any undertaking as to damages which might seem to make them responsible for the defendants not working during the periods contained in the undertaking. Nor can I in this case infer that the plaintiffs must have known, or ought to be taken to have known, that the defendants were relying on any implied undertaking as to damages on the part of the plaintiffs, if in fact the defendants did rely on such an undertaking or thought about an undertaking as to damages at all. I think that the plaintiffs may well have thought that the defendants were willing to give the undertaking they did because they thought it would not substantially hurt them, and I do not think that in the circumstances of this case it is to be implied, as against the plaintiffs, that they were bound to assume that the undertaking was one which would injure the defendants, and that, so far as it would injure them, they, the plaintiffs, would be responsible if they failed at the trial. Under these circumstances it appears to me that no undertaking in respect of damages can be implied as against the plaintiffs, and that, under the circumstances, the court has no power to insert such an undertaking as it did on the motion to vary the minutes made before it in the court below. I think, therefore, the order ought to be amended by striking out the undertaking as to damages. I think that the appeal succeeds, and that the appellants ought to get the costs of the appeal and of the motion in the court below.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree—so entirely that I should be content not to add a word, were it not that we are differing from the decision of Farwell, J. The history of undertakings as to damages is given by Sir George Jessel in the case of Smith v. Day, 31 W. R. 187, 21 Ch. D. 421. It seems to amount to this, that the court can say, and does say, "We will not make an order upon imperfect materials, granting a temporary injunction, except you give an undertaking in damages." That is the term which the court can impose as the price of an injunction. The courts have gone a step farther, and they now say that it is an implied term in every order of an interlocutory nature for an injunction, a term which everybody applying for and obtaining such an interlocutory order must be deemed to know of. But the court cannot compel a person to give an undertaking even in that case; the court can only say, "We will not grant an injunction unless you give an undertaking." But it has been argued before us that cross-undertakings are to be implied in every case in which an undertaking is inserted in an order. Now for that proposition no authority whatever has been cited, and it seems to me to be inconsistent with the very idea of undertakings, which are in their inception voluntary. If these cross-undertakings are not to be inserted as of course in every order, is there any ground for inserting one in the present case? Is this an exceptional case? Here we have the terms in writing—terms which the parties themselves arranged—terms which were, I think, really in the nature of a modus vivendi, to use the language of Mr. Butcher when it was mentioned in the court below—and terms on which it was reasonable that the parties should go on until the short period elapsed before the court could finally adjudicate upon the matter. I see no ground whatever for enlarging in this case the terms of the written arrangement which had been made, and I confess I am very greatly impressed by the consideration which Romer, L.J., has indicated, that the undertaking here is in a form and to an extent beyond that which the plaintiffs asked for by their notice of motion, and beyond anything that the court could really have granted. To say that the plaintiffs were to be bound "to abide by any order that the court may make as to damages if the court shall hereafter be of opinion that the defendants shall have sustained any by reason of their undertaking" is asking me to imply that which I think is contrary to the real bargain between the parties and contrary to anything which it is reasonable to suppose they can have entertained. The result is the appeal must succeed, with the consequences which my lord has stated.

Appeal allowed.

RUBEN v. GREAT FINGALL CONSOLIDATED. (a.)

Company—Share certificate—Fraudulent issue of certificate by secretary acting for his own purposes—Forgery—Estoppel—Holding out—Principal and agent.

The plaintiffs advanced a sum of money to the secretary of the defendant company for his own purposes, and received from him as security a document which purported to be a certificate of shares in the defendant company made out in the names of certain nominees of the plaintiffs. The document bore the seal of the company, and appeared to be signed by two of the directors, and was countersigned by the secretary. The seal had been affixed thereto by the secretary fraudulently, and without any authority from the directors, acting not for or on behalf of the company, but entirely for his own purposes. The signatures of the two directors were forgeries by the secretary. It was admitted that the secretary was a proper person to deliver certificates.

Held, that, in the absence of any evidence of a holding out of the secretary by the company as a person having authority to warrant the genuineness of certificates, the company were not estopped from disputing the plaintiffs' right to have their nominees registered as shareholders.

Decision of Kennedy, J. ([1904] 1 K. B. 650, 52 W. R. Dig. 26), reversed.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., on further consideration: [1904] 1 K. B. 650.

The action was brought to recover damages from the defendant company by reason of the refusal of the company to place the names of Max Rosenhain and Edmond Alexandre on the register of the shareholders of the company.

The material facts of the case, as stated by Kennedy, J., in his judgment, were in substance as follows:

One A. S. Rowe, then a partner in Bewick, Moreing, & Co., was in December, 1902, the secretary of the defendant company. He held the appointment under a written agreement of the 31st of December, 1900, between the defendant company and Bewick, Moreing, & Co., whereby Bewick, Moreing, & Co., undertook to provide the defendant company with suitable offices and office accommodation, a suitable secretary, to be approved of by the company, and a sufficient clerical staff. The secretary was to be paid by Bewick, Moreing, & Co., but was to be deemed to be the secretary and officer of the defendant company, and subject to dismissal by the defendant company at any time. Bewick, Moreing, & Co. were to receive £500 a year from the defendant company, and also all transfer fees received by the defendant company. The defendant company's registered office in December, 1902, was in the offices of Bewick, Moreing, & Co., 20, Copthall-avenue, E.C., and several other limited companies were housed and provided for by Bewick, Moreing, & Co. there, under similar arrangements.

The plaintiffs were a firm of stockbrokers in the city, with whom Rowe had for some months before December, 1902, done business on his own private account in stocks and share transactions. They knew he was a partner in Bewick, Moreing, & Co. They did not know that he was secretary of the defendant company. They believed him to be a director of it. He had been introduced to the plaintiffs as a person in good credit; he kept his engagements, and they had every confidence in him. With Mr. Lindo, one of the partners in the plaintiffs' firm, Rowe was on terms of social acquaintance.

In December Rowe saw Mr. Lindo and asked whether the plaintiffs could arrange a loan for him on 5,000 shares in the defendant company. He said he had a joint account with a friend, who wished to sell, and he desired to take over the friend's interest and so avoid a sale, because, on information which he had received, he believed the shares (which were then at a premium) would rise considerably in value. He wanted the loan for a short time only, and as the 5,000 shares afforded at the price of the day ample security for the £20,000 which he wanted on loan, and as he undertook, if there was any fall in price, to provide a £2 per share margin, the plaintiffs agreed to try to meet his wishes.

On the 16th of December the plaintiffs arranged with Lazard Brothers & Co., who were bankers in the city, for the advance of £20,000 to themselves for a principal on the proposed security; and Mr. Lindo on the same day went to the offices of Bewick, Moreing, & Co., which were also the offices of the defendant company, and told Rowe that the money would be ready on the 18th of December. Rowe said that he would have the share transfer executed by the transferor on the following day. The shares, he said, were standing in the company's books in his friend's name and not in his own.

On the 17th of December the transfer, with the names of Max Rosenhain, who was a partner in the firm of Lazard Brothers & Co., and Edmond Alexandre, as transferees, but with the space for the name of the transferor left in blank, was taken by Lindo to Rowe, and later in the same day it was returned by Rowe to Lindo, and purported to have been executed by "E. Storey" as transferor. In the corner of the document was the usual "certification." Rowe, when he gave Lindo the transfer, said that his directors (that is, the directors of the defendant company) would be meeting the next day at 11 a.m., that he would explain everything to them and have the share certificate made out in the names of Rosenhain and Alexandre, and that it would be ready for Lindo if he called at 11.30 a.m. The same afternoon Lindo brought back to Rowe the transfer executed by the transferees, paid to him a registration fee of 2s. 6d., and received a receipt in due form.

On the 18th of December, at 11.30 a.m., at the office, Rowe delivered to Lindo the share certificate, and Lindo returned the receipt to Rowe. The certificate thus issued was in form perfectly regular. It purported, in accordance with article 12 of the articles of association of the defendant company, to bear the seal of the defendant company, to be signed by two of its directors, and to be countersigned by the defendant company's secretary. Lindo learnt from it for the first time that Rowe was the company's secretary.

The certificate was taken by Lindo to the plaintiffs' office, when it was examined by their clerk, and it was then taken by him to the office of Lazard Brothers & Co., where it was left after its examination by a clerk there, and their cheque for £20,000 in favour of the plaintiffs was handed to Lindo. This cheque was paid by the plaintiffs into their own banking account, and a cheque of the plaintiffs for the same amount, less stamp fee and commission, was handed over to Rowe the same day, and was subsequently cashed by him. Within ten days Rowe absconded, and it was discovered that the certificate was a forgery. The only genuine part of it was Rowe's counter-signature as secretary. The signatures of the two directors, which it bore, were forged, and the seal of the company, which it also bore, had been fraudulently affixed to it by Rowe, who, as secretary, had access to it at all times, and, as the learned judge thought, practically the custody of it, in the safe of the defendant company.

Messrs. Lazard Brothers & Co., by their solicitors, applied to the defendant company for the registration of Rosenhain and Alexandre in the books of the defendant company as the owners of the shares. The defendant company refused to accede to the application. Then Lazard Brothers & Co. applied to the plaintiffs for other equivalent security or repayment of the loan of £20,000. The plaintiffs paid Lazard Brothers & Co. the amount of the loan, with interest, and thereupon, as the defendant company refused to register the ownership of Rosenhain and Alexandre or recognize their title to the shares, they brought the present action, after obtaining from Lazard Brothers & Co. an assignment of that firm's rights, if any, and giving written notice of such assignment to the defendant company. The plaintiffs' claim was against the defendant company, but Lazard Brothers & Co. and Alexandre were made formal defendants in order that all parties concerned might be before the court.

At the trial certain statements or admissions of material facts were agreed to by the counsel for the respective parties, which left, in the learned judge's opinion, no question which it was necessary or proper to leave to the jury. These statements or admissions of fact were, so far as material to the present report, as follows: Agreed—(1) That the alleged certificate was not a valid or genuine document, and that the signatures thereon, other than the signature of Rowe, were forgeries; (2) that (a) the bank (Lazard Brothers & Co.) and the plaintiffs respectively made the advances upon the faith of the genuineness and validity of the alleged certificate and of its being properly issued, and (b) the secretary was a proper person to deliver it; (3) that Rowe, in creating and delivering to Lindo the alleged certificate, acted fraudulently and not for or on behalf of or for the benefit of the defendant company, and solely for himself and for his own private purposes and advantage; (4) that the defendant company did not by its directors or otherwise authorize Rowe to make, seal, or issue the alleged document.

The jury having been discharged, the case was argued before the learned judge on these admissions.

The learned judge held, on the authority of Shaw v. Port Philip and Colonial Gold Mining Co., 32 W. R. 771, 13 Q. B. D. 103, that the defendants were estopped by the certificate issued by their secretary from disputing the right of the plaintiffs to have the names in question placed on the register of shareholders, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for a sum which had been agreed upon between the parties.

The defendants appealed.

Lawson Walton, K.C., J. E. Bankes, K.C., and A. M. Bremner, for the appellants.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C., and J. D. Crawford, for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The question on this appeal is whether the appellants, a limited company, are responsible in the circumstances for the fraud and forgery of their secretary, one Rowe, who is now undergoing a sentence of penal servitude. The respondents are a firm of stockbrokers. Rowe was a member of a well-known firm carrying on business as engineers. He was also secretary of the appellant company, whose business was conducted in the office of his firm. In December, 1892, Rowe, who had frequently done business with the respondents, applied to one of their firm named Lindo to procure a loan of £20,000 on the security of 5,000 shares in the appellant company, which he said were the joint property of himself and a friend in whose name they stood, and who wished to sell them, while he (Rowe) was desirous of acquiring them. The operation was to be carried out by a transfer from the friend in whose name they stood to the proposed lender, who on receiving the certificate would make the required advance. The facts and admissions are fully stated in the judgment of Kennedy, J., and it is not necessary for my purpose to do more than summarize them as briefly as possible. The respondents arranged with a firm of bankers for the required loan on production of the transfer and certificate duly made out in their names. A transfer was accordingly forged by Rowe in the name of Storey to the bankers, by whom it was executed. It was then brought back by Lindo to Rowe to be exchanged for a certificate, which Rowe told him would be passed by the directors and ready for him early the next day. Lindo paid a registration fee to Rowe of 2s. 6d., and, returning the next day at the appointed hour, received the certificate from Rowe and took it to the bank, who then advanced the money to Lindo, who paid it into his firm's bank and gave Rowe a cheque for the amount, less a deduction for commission. Throughout these transactions and until he had received the certificate and taken it to his office Lindo was unaware that Rowe was secretary, though he thought he was the director of the company. Rowe absconded. It was admitted that Rowe had forged the names of the two directors which appeared upon the certificate, and had affixed the company's seal thereto "fraudulently and not for or on behalf of or for the benefit of the defendant company, and solely for himself and for his own private purposes and advantage." It was also admitted that Rowe was "a proper person to deliver the certificate." On discovery of the fraud the company refused to put the transferees on the register. The respondents were, therefore, obliged to recoup the bank the sum of £20,000, and claimed in this action to recover it from the appellants on the ground that they were estopped from setting up Rowe's fraud.

Kennedy, J., who tried the case without a jury upon the admissions which he has set out, was of opinion that the case was indistinguishable from Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed. The case was very elaborately argued, and the amount at stake is large, but I think the principles on which the decision rests are well established and, when the facts are properly understood, are easy of application.

The general rule governing the responsibility of a master for the acts of his servant were stated by Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 15 W. R 877, L. R. 2 Ex. 259. The passage has been frequently cited and approved, and is, indeed, the locus classicus on the subject. It runs as follows: "The master is liable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit though no express command or privity of the master be proved." He then gives instances where this rule has been acted on and proceeds: "In all these cases it may be said, as it was said here, that the master had not authorized the act. It is true he has not authorized the particular act, but he has put the agent in his place to do that class of acts, and he must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself in doing the business which it was the act of his master to place him in."

Founding themselves on the principle so stated, the Court of Appeal, in British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co., 35 W. R. 590, 18 Q. B. D. 714, held that an action of deceit would not lie against a principal for a fraudulent misstatement made by his servant for his own private purposes in reply to a class of question which it was within his ordinary duty to answer. The fact that it was made, not in the supposed interest of the master, but for his own private purposes, ipso facto took it out of the scope of the actual authority, and also, according to Bowen, L.J., out of the class of acts which the agent was put there to do. In Thorne v. Heard, 42 W. R. 274, [1894] 1 Ch. 599, Kay, L.J., refers to this case, to which he was not himself a party, in these terms: "It was there deliberately decided that the words 'for his master's benefit' are essential, and that where an agent in the course of his employment committed a fraud not for his principal's benefit but for the benefit of himself, and the principal did not benefit by such fraud, he could not be made liable for it." It was also cited with approval by Lord Brampton in the House of Lords in the recent case of Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh, 50 W. R. 218, [1902] A. C. 117. It was also sought in British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co. to fix the master with liability on the ground of estoppel by holding out the servant as the proper person to answer such questions. The two judges, however, who dealt with that aspect of the case disposed of it on another ground, which was subsequently disapproved—namely, that a company could not be estopped from denying that which to admit would involve an ultrà vires act: see Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, 42 W. R. 204, [1898] A. C. 396, at p. 407, per Lord Herschell. The case, therefore, is not a direct authority on the question whether the holding out may be of such a character as to debar the master from escaping responsibility for an act done by his servant within his apparent authority, although done not with any notion of benefiting the master, but exclusively for fraudulent purposes of his own. It is obvious that the ostensible authority may be larger than the actual, but the question will still remain whether it can ever be large enough to make the master responsible for a fraud or crime committed exclusively for the servant's own purposes, and not utilized in any way by the master. A difficulty was raised in argument on this point. It was urged that, where the actual authority is in writing and unambiguous, and covers the actual thing done, the master is bound, though the servant misuses the authority fraudulently for his own purposes, Hambro v. Burnand, 52 W. R. 583, [1904] 2 K. B. 10, decided in this court, following the opinions of Lord Brougham, L.C., and of the Privy Council, and of a line of cases in America. Ought there then to be any difference where the authority is not in writing, but is nevertheless clearly ascertained by the verdict of a jury or otherwise upon sufficient evidence of holding out? In my opinion it is not necessary to decide this point in this case, since, for the reasons which I will presently state, I do not think the holding out here can possibly be pushed so far as to bring the fabricating the certificate, whether by writing the directors' names or by misusing the seal, within the class of acts which the secretary was apparently authorized to do. It may be, however, that a long step towards the solution of the difficulty will be found in that class of cases where the limits of what has often been called estoppel by negligence have been discussed—for instance, Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans' Charities, 3 W. R. 573, 5 H. L. C. 389; Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, 32 W. R. 626, 26 Ch. D. 482—and for a very full discussion of the subject see Beven on Negligence in Law (2nd ed.), vol. 2, chap. 4.

It is clear that a man may by his negligence where he owes a duty provided that negligence be sufficiently closely connected with the event to bring it within the legal chain of causality, make himself responsible to the person or class of person to whom he owes a duty, for the crime or fraud of another committed for that other's own purposes. It may be that to put a written authority in the hands of another person without conditions or safeguards is such negligence as to entail responsibility to third parties for fraudulent misuse of the authority: see the instance given by Fry, L.J., in Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Co. v. Whipp, of a mortgagee who allows a mortgagor to have the custody of the title deeds for the purpose of raising a loan. I cannot think that the judges who decided British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co. intended to deny the possibility of the principal's liability in cases of this class for the fraud or crime of his agent committed for the agent's own purposes.

However this may be, it is, I think, clear in this case that there is no evidence of such a holding out as to bring the acts done by Rowe within any presumable scope of authority. To put it most favourably for the respondent, the act whether done for the master's benefit or not, must at least be one of the class of acts which the servant is ostensibly put there to do, so as to bring it within the second limb of the proposition of Willes, J. If we try it by the test of actual authority, the actual scope certainly did not cover any acts other than those of a purely ministerial character, such as bringing the certificate before the directors for signature and appending the seal in their presence; and it does not need the authority of Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Trustees and Merchants of the Staple of England v. Bank of England, 21 Q. B. D. 160, 36 W. R. Dig. 78, to show that fraud and forgery were not within the actual scope of such an employment. But so far as regards all this class of prior acts there is no ostensible representation at all. There is no holding out with respect to them. The ostensible action of the secretary is limited to handing over the apparently complete certificate. How does such an act carry with it any implication of authority to make, as well as hand over, the instrument? His own signature may import a personal representation by himself that the document is apparently genuine, and found a right against himself, but it does not import that he had any other than ministerial duties in connection with the matter. If this is so, it does not in any way enlarge the presumption if the act of handing over be often repeated, and it seems to me, therefore, that there is nothing in the point so much pressed that this was a mercantile company whose shares were constantly changing hands on the market. I think, therefore, that the representation, such as it was, based on the fact that Rowe had ostensible authority to hand over the certificates, is not more efficacious to fix the company with liability for his fraud, than the representation implied in the cases cited from the fact that the clerk or secretary was the proper intermediary through whom the forged powers of attorney were deliverable to the bankers to be handed to the banks. Those cases are, therefore, in point, and as it is not contended that there was any such negligence on the part of the company as to fix them with responsibility for Rowe's acts, I think the case against the company fails, and that we are bound to give effect to Kennedy, J.'s, own view, notwithstanding Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. It may be that that case is distinguishable upon its special facts, but it is not necessary to decide the point, for I am clearly of opinion that the facts in this case are not sufficient to found liability in the company.

I have treated this case on the footing that Lindo dealt with Rowe as secretary of the company, and acted on the faith of the ostensible authority implied from his position as such, but I am by no means sure that this is the true inference from the evidence.

An argument was founded upon some observations of the Lords in Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh that the certificate itself carried with it a representation by the company which would bind them against third parties who acted upon it even though it was a forgery. But though the words used apart from their context might possibly be open to this construction, I think it is reasonably clear from the train of reasoning in their speeches that nothing of the kind could have been meant, and that the certificate they had in mind was one such as that in In re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Co., 16 W. R. 862, L. R. 3 Q.B. 584, which had been in fact executed in due form by the company, but under a misapprehension. The appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: I entirely agree with the judgment my lord has delivered, but it is right that I should state shortly the ground upon which my judgment proceeds. In this case three questions seem to require consideration. The first is this—Is the defendant company bound by the certificate on which the plaintiffs rely? The articles of association of the defendant company (of which all persons dealing with the company are deemed to have notice) provide (article 12) as follows: "The certificate of titles to shares shall be issued under the seal of the company and signed by two directors, and countersigned by the secretary or some other person appointed by the directors." The document on which the plaintiffs rely is written on the company's paper, and has the seal of the company affixed and is countersigned by the secretary; it also purports to bear the signatures of two directors, but these are mere forgeries by the secretary. In these circumstances the certificate (as was, indeed, admitted by the defendants at the trial) is not a valid or genuine document, and does not, in my opinion, bind the defendants. It was suggested that, inasmuch as the document appeared on the face of it to satisfy the requirements of the articles of association, the plaintiffs acting as they did in good faith, were not affected by irregularities in the proceedings of the secretary: Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co., L. R. 7 H L. 869. To mere irregularities the principle of that case, no doubt, applies, but it has never been extended to forgery, a forged instrument being simply null and void. The distinction is drawn by Lord Hatherley in advising the House of Lords in the case itself: see L. R. 7 H. L., at p. 899. In that case he says: "Two cases were cited in the argument in which a fraudulent use was made of the seal of the company by the secretary of the company who had been entrusted with that seal. Those cases, however, can have no bearing upon the present case, for they are simply like cases of forgery. It was just as if signatures, not a seal, had been required, and the secretary had forged the names of the directors. A secretary, having no authority to do so, affixed the seal of the company, and the instrument to which the seal was affixed was as void as if the question had been one of handwriting and a signature had been forged."

The second question is—Is the defendant company estopped from disputing the validity of the certificate? It was strongly urged before us that, inasmuch as the certificate was good on the face of it, and was delivered to the plaintiffs by the secretary of the company, who was admitted by the defendants to be "a proper person to deliver it," the company was precluded from denying as against the plaintiffs the validity of the document; and the decision in Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. was relied upon in support of this contention. It was held in that case that the secretary had in the circumstances been held out by the company as their agent to warrant the genuineness of the certificate, and it was said that the like conclusion ought to be arrived at here. I think it is possible that a company may so act as reasonably to produce the belief on the part of members of the public dealing with the company that the secretary or other agent of the company has authority to warrant the genuineness of the certificate which he delivers; but the question whether a particular company has so acted must in each case be one of fact to be decided on the circumstances of the case. It may well be that the conclusion arrived at by the Divisional Court in Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. was well founded, but the circumstances appear to me to differ from those of the case with which we have to deal. Here the articles of association prescribe that the intervention of three persons—namely, two directors and the secretary (or some other person appointed by the directors)—shall be essential to the validity of a certificate. The framers of the articles well knew that certificates were documents of great importance, as regards the preparation of which the company required to be protected; and the provisions of article 12 were directed, and must, as it seems to me, have been recognized by business men as being directed, to the securing of such protection to the company. The ministerial act of delivering the certificate when prepared to the person entitled to it must be entrusted to some one; it was, in fact, entrusted, and properly entrusted, to the secretary. But is it a proper inference of fact that the secretary was thereby held out as an agent to warrant the genuineness of the certificate? I am unable to see that it is. So to hold would, in my opinion, be to deprive the company to a very great extent of the benefit of the precautions carefully provided by article 12, and really leave the company at the mercy of the secretary or other person entrusted with the delivery of a certificate.

The third question is—Are the plaintiffs entitled to recover damages against the company for a wrongful act of the secretary committed in the course of his employment? It is said that the secretary of the company, while acting in the course of the company's business and for the company's benefit, made a representation, on the faith of which the plaintiffs acted and suffered damage, and that, although the secretary had no express authority to make the misrepresentation, still he had authority to do that class of acts, and that the company must be answerable for the manner in which he did the business which the company had entrusted to him: Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank. To this there appear to me to be two answers. First, if I am right in the answer which I have given to the second question, the secretary had no authority to make representations as to the genuineness of certificates; he was merely entrusted with the ministerial duty of delivering certificates to those entitled to them. The making of such representations therefore was not included in the class of acts which the company entrusted to him. Secondly, the secretary, in delivering the certificate, was not acting in the interest of the company, but in his own; and the case of British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co. appears to me to be a direct authority that in these circumstances the company is not liable. It is true that part of the reasoning found in the judgments of Bowen and Fry, L JJ., has been disapproved by the House of Lords in Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson, but the decision has never been overruled, and in fact was cited as an authority by Lord Brampton in the recent case of Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh. In my opinion, therefore, it is binding on this court. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendants.

MATHEW, L.J., read the following judgment: This is an appeal from the judgment of Kennedy, J., in an action brought to recover damages for the refusal of the defendant company to place the names of the nominees of the plaintiffs on the register of shareholders. The plaintiffs rely upon a share certificate received by them from the secretary of the defendant company, which apparently was in proper order and issued in accordance with the company's articles of association. It was contended that the company was estopped from disputing the certificate as against the plaintiffs, who had, on the faith of it, incurred liability to Lazard & Co. for a loan of £20,000. The defendants contended that they were not bound by a certificate which was a forgery and which was shown to have been issued by the secretary to raise money, not for the company, but for his own purposes. It was not disputed that it was for the benefit of the company that provision should be made for the ready transfer of shares, and that the company followed the usual course in providing for that purpose a transfer department, which was in charge of a principal clerk and a clerical staff. When a transfer was sent to the company the duty of the transfer clerks was to see that the document was in order, to ascertain that the shares stood in the name of the proposed transferor, and to issue a certification. The matter was then referred to the auditors, whose duty it was to see that the old certificates were cancelled. When this was done the share certificate was filled up and taken to the secretary's office on the morning of a board meeting to be submitted to the board. The secretary had no duty to supervise what had been done in the transfer department. He was not always present at the board meetings, and it appeared that the certificates were usually brought to the board by one of the transfer clerks. The directors had the opportunity of making inquiries, and in a case of this magnitude it would be a neglect of their duty if they did not ask for information or adopt the precaution of comparing the proposed certificate with the share list. When the certificate passed the board the directors signed in accordance with the articles of association. The seal was affixed by the secretary or a director and countersigned by the former, and the certificate was left with him to be handed to the transferee This was a ministerial act only and might be performed by any trustworthy messenger. It seems clear that the defendant company were bound to take precautions to prevent their being made liable, as in the Bahia case, for forged or fraudulent transfers, and these regulations as to the conduct of the transfer business would seem to be sufficient for their protection.

It now becomes important to inquire into the transaction between the plaintiffs and Rowe in order to determine whether the estoppel upon which the plaintiffs relied was established; in other words, whether the company had lost the protection against fraud which their regulations were intended to secure. Rowe was a partner in the firm of Bewick & Co., who were the promoters of this and several other companies. He held the appointment under an agreement of the 31st of December, 1900, whereby Bewick & Co. undertook to provide the defendant company with suitable offices, a suitable secretary, and a sufficient clerical staff. The secretary was to be paid by Bewick & Co., but was to be deemed to be the secretary of the defendant company. The plaintiffs were stockbrokers with whom Rowe had done business on his own account. They did not know that he was secretary to the company. They believed him to be a director. Rowe was in good credit and the plaintiffs had entire confidence in him. In December Rowe saw Lindo and asked whether the plaintiffs could arrange a loan for £20,000 for him on 5,000 shares in the defendant company. He stated that he had a joint interest with a friend who wished to sell it, and he desired to take over the shares because he believed they would rise considerably in value. He wanted a loan for a short time only, and, as the 5,000 shares at the then price were ample security for £20,000, the plaintiffs agreed to try to find the money. The plaintiffs arranged with Lazard & Co., who are bankers, for the advance of £20,000 to themselves on the proposed security, and Lindo on the same day informed Rowe that the money would be ready on the 18th of December. Rowe said that he would at once have the share transfer executed. On the 17th of December a transfer in blank was taken by Lindo to Rowe, and later in the day was returned by Rowe and purported to have been executed by E. Storey. This document was forged by Rowe. On the transfer appeared the usual certification. Rowe told Lindo that his directors would be meeting the next day and that he would explain the transaction to them and would have the share certificate made out ready for Lindo at 11.30 next morning. It is important to notice that Lindo was in this way informed that the transfer must have the sanction of the board. The same afternoon Lindo brought back the transfer executed by the transferees. The next day Rowe delivered to Lindo the share certificate. It was perfectly regular in form, and purported, in accordance with the articles of association, to bear the seal of the company, to be signed by two of the directors, and to be countersigned by Rowe as secretary. Lindo did not notice until he got back to his office that Rowe was the company's secretary. It seems clear that up to this point Lindo dealt with Rowe in his personal, and not in his official capacity. As he stated in giving his evidence, he looked upon the loan as Rowe's private business. He supposed him to have authority to transfer the shares, and assumed when the certificate was handed to him that Rowe had taken the proper steps to carry the transaction through. The share certificate was handed to Lazard & Co. The money was advanced to the plaintiffs and paid to Rowe. Within a few days Rowe absconded, and it was discovered that the certificate was a forgery. Lazard & Co. applied to the defendant company for the registration of their nominees as the owners of the shares. This application was refused, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay Lazard & Co. the amount of the loan with interest. They then brought the present action.

In the argument much reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiffs on the admission (b) that the secretary was a proper person to deliver the certificate. But this guarded concession on the part of the defendant company does not displace and is not inconsistent with the course of business followed by the company. In these circumstances it seems to me there was no estoppel. There was no evidence that Rowe was held out or dealt with as the officer of the company who was empowered to represent to those who dealt in the shares of the company that a transfer was genuine and valid. The company, it seems to me, were no more liable in respect of the forged certificate than they would be upon a verbal statement to the plaintiffs that Storey could transfer the shares. There was no evidence that it was part of the business which Rowe was appointed to transact for the company to make any such representation. I am of opinion that the action fails and the loss must rest where it has fallen. The plaintiffs, and not the Fingall Co., are the victims of Rowe's dishonesty.

In the view which I take of the facts it is unnecessary to comment upon the cases cited in the course of the argument. With respect to the case of Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co., I wish to point out that the judgment proceeded upon the description in the special case of "the regular and authorized duty" of the secretary. The statements upon this subject were regarded as amounting to an admission that his fraudulent acts were within the scope of his authority. It was argued for the defendants that, even if this were so, the defendants were not liable because the fraud had been committed by means of a forgery. No distinction between frauds by forgery and frauds by any other means is to be found in the judgment in Barwick's case. It was contended for the defendants that Shaw v. Port Philip Gold Mining Co. had been overruled by British Mutual Banking Co. v. Charnwood Forest Railway Co. But, with great deference to the eminent judges who decided that case, it seems to me the judgment is not available as an authority for the defendants. The judges in that case did not agree as to the grounds for allowing the appeal. It is not easy to reconcile the judgment of Lord Esher with Barwick's case, and Bowen and Fry, L.JJ., base their judgments on the ground that a corporate body cannot be prevented by estoppel from denying that they had done what was beyond their powers to do. But this reasoning was not approved of in Balkis Consolidated Co. v. Tomkinson. The case of Whitechurch (Limited) v. Cavanagh related to an unauthorized certification, and not to a forged certificate. The appeal must be allowed.

DUVAL & CO. (LIMITED) v. GANS & PICK. (a.)

Practice—Writ—Service out of the jurisdiction—Contract to be performed within the jurisdiction—Action for price of goods sent abroad—No express stipulation as to place of payment—Ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

The court has jurisdiction to allow service of a writ or notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), if it appears, having regard to the contract generally and the circumstances, that the contract is one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, although it does not state in express terms that it is to be performed within the jurisdiction.

The rule to the above effect laid down in Reynolds v. Coleman, 35 W. R. 813, 35 Ch. D. 453, and followed in Rein v. Stein, [1892] 1 Q. B. 753, 40 W. R. Dig. 191, has not been overruled by Comber v. Leyland, [1898] A. C. 524, 47 W. R. Dig. 159.

Appeal by the defendants from the refusal of Bucknill, J., to set aside an order giving leave to serve notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs were an English company carrying on business as wine shippers and merchants, and having their registered office in London. The defendants were resident in New York, in the United States of America.

By a contract made in New York the plaintiffs appointed the defendants to be the sole agents for the sale of certain brands of the plaintiffs' champagnes in the United States, Canada, and Cuba.

By the terms of the contract wines of the specified brands were to be shipped by the plaintiffs to the defendants free on board at Havre at certain prices, and the defendants were to be allowed certain discounts on all payments made within certain specified times. Nothing was expressed in the contract as to where payment was to be made. The defendants in fact made payment by drafts on a London bank sent from New York to the plaintiffs in England.

The defendants having, as the plaintiffs alleged, failed to make certain payments which had become due under the contract, the plaintiffs applied ex parte under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), and obtained leave to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction in an action for the price of goods supplied and to serve notice of the writ on the defendants in New York.

Service of notice of the writ having been effected, the defendants applied to have the order giving leave to issue the writ and the service set aside, on the ground that the action was not founded on an alleged breach of a contract "which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction," and therefore the case did not come within ord. 11, r. 1 (e).

Bucknill, J., dismissed the application.

The defendants appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C. (Lincoln Reed with him), for the defendants.—Service out of the jurisdiction can only be allowed under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), where the contract appears from its terms to be one which must be performed within the jurisdiction: Comber v. Leyland, [1894] A. C. 524, 47 W. R. Dig. 159. Here it does not appear from the contract where it is to be performed; the contract is silent as to where payment is to be made. The defendants might make payment at any place where they could find an agent of the plaintiffs to receive it. Comber v. Leyland has overruled the previous decisions which construed the rule less strictly.

Norman Craig, for the plaintiffs.—In Comber v. Leyland the House of Lords did not treat the contract as being silent as to where payment was to be made, but as distinctly providing that payment should be made outside the jurisdiction. There is abundant authority to show that, where the contract is silent as to the place of payment, and the creditor is in England, service out of the jurisdiction may be allowed: Reynolds v. Coleman, 35 W. R. 813, 35 Ch. D. 453; Robey v. Snaefell Mining Co., 36 W. R. 224, 20 Q. B. D. 152; Rein v. Stein, [1892] 1 Q. B. 753, 40 W. R. Dig. 191; Bell & Co v. Antwerp, London, and Brazil Line, 39 W. R. 84; [1891] 1 Q. B. 103; The Eider, [1893] P. 119, 41 W. R Dig 4.

STIRLING, L.J.—Under this contract it is the duty of the defendants, after making certain deductions for discount, to pay to the plaintiffs the price of the wines shipped. But nothing is said in the contract as to where payment is to be made. The plaintiffs, alleging that the defendants have failed to make payments which are due, have obtained leave under ord. 11, r. 1 (e). to serve notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction. The rule is as follows: "Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons may be allowed by the court or a judge whenever . . . the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract, wherever made, which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction." The defendants object that leave under that rule ought not to have been given in this case, because the contract for payment is not a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction.

Having regard to the decisions of the Court of Appeal on the construction of this rule, I think that leave has properly been given in this case to serve notice of a writ out of the jurisdiction. In the case of Reynolds v. Coleman, in which the construction of the rule came up for discussion for the first time, Cotton, L.J., said: "The question we have to consider is this—What is the meaning of 'which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction'? It was said by the appellant to mean that it must be an express term of the contract that it should be performed within the United Kingdom. In my opinion that is not the true construction. The difficulty arises from the words 'according to the terms thereof'; but in my opinion those words mean that you must look at the contract and at the facts which existed at the time when the contract was made, and then determine whether, having regard to the terms, the contract was one which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and do not mean that there must be an express provision that the contract is to be performed within the jurisdiction." That was followed in the case of Rein v. Stein, which was a case very similar to the present. The action was for the price of goods consigned by the plaintiff, a merchant in England, for sale in Germany by the defendant, a German subject carrying on business in Germany. There was no express stipulation as to the place of payment for the goods; but, according to the course of business in similar transactions between the plaintiff and the defendant, such payment would be made in England. The court held that there was sufficient evidence that the action was founded upon a breach, within the jurisdiction, of a contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, and that the plaintiff was entitled to an order for service out of the jurisdiction. In the later case of The Eider the court approved of Reynolds v. Coleman and Rein v. Stein.

The defendants now rely on the case of Comber v. Leyland in the House of Lords. The contract in that case contained very special terms as to the mode of payment. The defendants, who carried on business at Pernambuco, contracted to sell goods sent to him by the plaintiffs and to remit the proceeds to the plaintiffs in England by first-class bank bills on England not exceeding ninety days' sight made out in the plaintiffs' favour. The House of Lords held that the contract to pay was to be performed by putting the bank bills into the post office at Pernambuco. The ground of their decision was that this was a contract no part of which was to be performed within the jurisdiction. None of the learned lords expressed any intention to overrule the previous decisions of this court, and The Eider was approved of. I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The plaintiffs are an English company, having their registered office in England, and they have no existence out of England. The intention of the parties clearly was that payment should be made where alone it could be made—viz., at the office of the company.

Appeal dismissed.

Covenant in an ante-nuptial settlement by the father to pay £10,000 to his daughter absolutely in the event of there being no issue and of her surviving her now intended coverture,

Held, the marriage having been dissolved by a decree of the Divorce Court, that she had survived her coverture so as to entitle her to the money under the covenant, although her former husband was still alive.

Semble, that she was also entitled under an order of the Divorce Court directing that the settlement should be read as if the husband had died in the lifetime of the wife.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture of settlement of the 26th of July, 1881, made on the marriage of Donald Crawford to Virginia Mary Smith, Thomas Eustace Smith, the father of the lady, covenanted with the trustees of the settlement that his executors or administrators should within twelve calendar months after his death, in case the said D. Crawford and V. M. Smith or either of them or any issue of the said marriage should be living at his death, pay to the trustees the sum of £10,000; and it was declared that the trustees should stand possessed of the trust fund and the investments for the time being representing the same in trust during the joint lives of the said D. Crawford and V. M. Smith to pay the income to the said V. M. Smith for her separate use and without power of anticipation, and after the death of either of them upon trust to pay the income of the trust fund to the survivor during his or her life, and after the death of such survivor to stand possessed of the trust fund upon certain trusts for the children of the intended marriage. It was further agreed and declared that if there should be no issue of the said intended marriage in whom the trust fund should become absolutely vested under the foregoing trusts, then the trustees should stand possessed of the fund "in trust for the said V. M. Smith, her executors, administrators, and assigns, if she shall survive her now intended coverture, but if she shall die during her now intended coverture then in trust for the said T. E. Smith, his executors, administrators, and assigns."

The said marriage was dissolved by decree nisi on the 12th of February, 1886, which was made absolute on the 6th of August, 1886. There was no issue of the marriage.

On the 9th of December, 1886, an order was made by consent whereby it was ordered that from and after the date of such order the trustees for the time being of the said marriage settlement should pay and apply the trust fund and the income thereof upon such and the same trusts as would be applicable in respect of the same, in case the said D. Crawford were dead and had died in the lifetime of the said V. M. Crawford.

The said T. E. Smith died on the 5th of December, 1903.

The executors of the will and codicil of the said T. E Smith were prepared to pay over to the trustees of the marriage settlement the sum of £10,000 which T. E. Smith covenanted to pay. But questions arose as to the trusts upon which the trustees were to hold the same. This application was therefore made by by one of the trustees of the settlement in order to obtain the opinion of the court as to the trusts upon which the sum of £10,000 should be held by the trustees.

E. K. Corrie, for the trustees of the marriage settlement.

Borthwick, for the executors of the will of T. E. Smith.—The lady is only entitled to take the money if she has survived her coverture. The fair construction of these words is that the coverture was intended to last during the joint lives of the husband and wife. The court will not assume that the parties were contemplating the coverture being put an end to in any other than the natural way, for that would be against public policy. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 45, only gives the court jurisdiction to make an order altering the settlement of the parties concerned, it does not say anything about altering the property of any other person. The father covenanted to pay £10,000 to the daughter absolutely in the event of there being no issue and of her surviving her coverture. The statute does not compel the father to give what he did not covenant to give; still less does the order of the Divorce Division, which was a consent order between third parties, compel that.

(a.) Reported by R. FRANKLIN STUBBING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Although the lady is not deprived of the benefit of the father's covenant in the settlement, it is submitted that she cannot take advantage of the order or of her own wrong to bring about an acceleration of the increase to her property: FitzGerald v. Chapman, 24 W. R. 130, 1 Ch. D. 563; Cartwright v. Cartwright, 10 Hare 630.

Methold, for the lady.—The husband's life interest has been got rid of, and as the marriage has been dissolved the wife has survived her coverture, and therefore she is entitled to the money absolutely. If this form is held bad, the common form of marriage settlements in the conveyancing books which have exactly the same provision will be bad also. Cartwright v. Cartwright and other cases were discussed in the case of In re Hope Johnstone, [1904] 1 Ch. 470, 52 W. R. Dig. 156. The gift was an absolute gift to the wife which ought not to be taken from her. This is not a condition which may be held void, but a limitation.

Borthwick replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—This is one of those cases in which an event has happened which was not in the contemplation of the parties to the agreement in the sense that they really thought about it, although, if the parties have expressed themselves in adequate language, it does not follow that, notwithstanding the event was not in their contemplation, the court may not give effect to the language used.

Upon the marriage of D. C. to this lady V. M. S., the father of the lady, T. E. S., covenanted that his executors should, within twelve months after his death, in case the said D. C. or his wife, or any issue of the marriage be living at such death, pay to the trustees of the marriage settlement the sum of £10,000. T. E. S. died on the 5th of December, 1903, and his daughter is still living, so that in accordance with that covenant the executors are bound to pay to the trustees of the marriage settlement £10,000. There is no escape from that. But the question then arises, Upon what trusts are the trustees to hold it? The settlement declared that the trustees should hold this trust fund during the joint lives of D. C. and V. M. S., to pay the income to the wife, and upon the death of either of them to the survivor, and upon the death of the survivor to hold the trust fund in trust for the children, and if there should be no issue in trust for the said V. M. S. if she shall survive her now intended coverture, but if she shall die during her now intended coverture then in trust for the said T. E. S. It is obvious that the draftsman in framing this clause neglected the words of the covenant, as he did not make the two fit; under the covenant the lady is to be paid £10,000 if she survives her father, who, under the trust, is not to get the money back unless she dies during her coverture, and the two are not the same in fact. The coverture has been dissolved by the Divorce Court, and is no longer existing. Marriage may come to an end in three ways—by the death of the husband, by the death of the wife or by divorce. In this case it has come to an end by divorce, which, although not a natural way of termination, is a way whereby the coverture has none the less come to an end, although the husband is still living. How can I construe this trust as meaning anything else than what it says? There is no issue of the marriage, and the interest of the husband having been put an end to, the trust for the lady takes effect. The words are "if she shall survive her now intended coverture." The coverture has come to an end. She is still living. Therefore she has survived her "now intended coverture," and the father's estate was only to get the fund back if she should die during her intended coverture.

That being so it is unnecessary to consider what the effect of the order of the Divorce Court was. But that appears to me equally to give the fund to the wife. By the order, the trustees of the marriage settlement were directed to hold the fund upon the same trusts as would be applicable in case the husband were dead and had died in the lifetime of the wife. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 45, gave the Divorce Court power to alter settlements where there was issue of the marriage. This was followed by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5, but the power of the court was still limited to where there were children of the marriage. This was amended by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, s. 3, by which the court might exercise the powers vested in it by the previous Acts, notwithstanding there were no children of the marriage, and could vary the provisions of the settlement either for the benefit of the children or of either parent. The Divorce Court has in the present case ordered that the settlement should be varied and should be read as if the husband were dead, and so the coverture has come to an end in that way. It has been argued that the Divorce Court has no power to make an order interfering with the rights, liabilities, and interests of persons who are not parties before it, so that it could not vary the covenant of the father so as to make him liable to pay the money on other conditions than what he had covenanted to do. This argument will deserve very careful consideration when the point arises, but it does not arise here. The Divorce Court did not touch the father's covenant; it only ordered the money to be paid as if the husband were dead. The wife's title is complete. The father's covenant was to pay the money if the daughter was living at the time of his death; she was, and therefore her title is complete, and his executors are bound to pay the money to the trustees of the settlement, and the trustees must pay it to the lady as having survived her coverture.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Stamp—Old age endowment with life assurance—Policy of life insurance—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 98.

By an instrument headed "Old Age Endowment with Life Assurance" an insurance company agreed, in consideration of a weekly premium until the assured should attain the age of sixty-five or during the life of the assured, to make one or other of the following payments according to the event which happened: "(1) If the assured shall attain the age of sixty-five years, then, upon proof . . . the company shall pay to the assured such sum as, according to the age of the assured at entry, is ascertainable from the tables, or (2) in the alternative, if the assured shall die under the age of sixty-five, then upon proof . . . the company shall pay to the executors or administrators of the assured the sum of £30," subject to certain conditions.

Held, that the instrument was a policy of life insurance "within the meaning of section 98, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891, and should be stamped as such, and not under the heading 'Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant.'"

Case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

On the 13th of January, 1904, an instrument was presented on behalf of the appellants, the Prudential Assurance Co., to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument in question was headed "Old Age Endowment with Life Assurance from entry to sixty-five years. For ages from eleven to fifteen next birthday after entry," and contained provisions to the effect that upon payment of a premium of sixpence weekly until the age of sixty-five was reached or death ensued the company would make one or other of the following payments according to the event which happened: "(1) If the assured shall attain the age of sixty-five years, then, upon proof being given to the reasonable satisfaction of the directors of the company of the assured having attained that age, the company shall pay to the assured such sum as, according to the age of the assured at entry, is ascertainable from the table annexed as payable in the event; or (2) in the alternative, if the assured shall die under the age of sixty-five years, then . . . the company shall pay to the executors or administrators of the assured the sum of £30. . . ."

The commissioners, being of opinion that the main part of the contract was the promise to pay the sum of £95 upon the assured attaining the age of sixty-five years, and that the promise to pay the lesser sum on his dying before that age was merely incidental thereto, decided that the instrument was not, as contended by the appellants, a policy of life insurance within the meaning of the definition contained in section 98, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891; and they assessed the duty thereon, under the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, at 2s. 6d. as being for the payment of a sum of money not exceeding £100.

The appellants appealed from this decision, and the question for the opinion of the court was whether the instrument was properly chargeable with the duty so assessed by the commissioners, and, if not, with what duty it was chargeable.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Vaughan Hawkins with him), for the appellants.—The commissioners were wrong, for the instrument comes within both branches of the definition of policy of insurance in section 98 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as it certainly depends upon "any life or lives or upon any event or contingency relating to or dependent on any life or lives." Policies of insurance are referred to in section 91 and include "every writing whereby any contract of insurance is made or agreed to be made or is evidenced; and the expression 'insurance' includes assurance." It is necessary to constitute a contract of insurance that the contract must be an insurance against something. That may not be true as regard fire and marine policies which are in fact indemnities. A man cannot insure that a fire shall not take place or a ship be lost, but he can insure the payment of a sum of money on the happening of a certain event. In Law v. London Indisputable Life Policy Co., 1 K. & J. 223, p. 228, Page-Wood, V.C., deals with this question and held that the plaintiff could recover.

He cited also section 7 of the Policies of Assurance Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 144), as to what is a policy of insurance, and from Bunyon on Life Assurance, p. 1, on the same point.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and Rowlatt, for the respondents, relied on section 91 of the Act of 1891. The instrument was not a contract of insurance at all. It was a contract by the company to pay a fixed sum when the assured reached a certain age; the contract to pay £30 being merely subsidiary. In Limmer Asphalte Co (Limited) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 20 W. R. 610, L. R. 7 Ex., at p. 217, Martin, B., says: "There is no better established rule as regards stamp duty than that all that is required is that the instrument should be stamped for its leading and principal object, and that this stamp covers everything accessory to this object." It was moreover not a contract of insurance, for it did not insure against something, and that element being absent, the instrument was not a policy.

Danckwerts replied.

CHANNELL, J.—The question I have to decide is whether the instrument embodying the contract entered into by the appellant company was a policy of insurance upon any life or lives within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue decided that the document must be stamped as a covenant, and it is in one sense, of course, a covenant. It is under seal, and it contains an undertaking to pay a certain sum of money in certain events. It is agreed on both sides that if it comes within the specific and particular definition of a policy of insurance, then it must be stamped as a policy of life insurance. What I have to see, therefore, is whether this contract comes within the definition in the 98th section of the Stamp Act, 1891. The document was headed "Old Age Endowment with Life Assurance," and that was relied on by the Attorney-General to a certain extent as showing that the parties did not call it a life assurance, but something else coupled with life assurance. That is a sort of advertising heading to induce people to enter into this contract, and it is necessary to look at the contract itself to see what it really was. In order that it should come within the definition in the Stamp Act the document must be a policy of insurance, and then if it is a policy of insurance it has to be "upon any life or lives or upon any event or contingency relating to or dependent upon any life or lives." The first question, therefore, I have to determine is whether the contract was a policy of insurance. If it was a policy of insurance, then it is a policy "upon any event or contingency relating to or dependent upon any life or lives." Policies of insurance are also referred to in the 91st section of the Act, where it is said: "For the purposes of this Act the expression 'policy of insurance' includes every writing whereby any contract of insurance is made or agreed to be made or is evidenced, and the expression 'insurance' includes assurance." What is a contract of insurance? The Attorney-General contended that to constitute a contract of insurance at all, it must be an insurance against something, and as to that Mr. Danckwerts said that that might be true as regarded fire and marine policies, but that it was not true as regarded life policies. The former contracts were indemnities, and in that sense were insurances against loss, but a contract of life insurance was not a contract of indemnity. It is quite clear to my mind on the authorities that it is not an indemnity. The question then arises, that being so, whether that makes any real difference. It seems to me that it is necessary to see what a contract of insurance really is. You cannot insure that a fire will not take place or that a ship should not be lost, but you can insure the payment of a sum of money on the happening of a certain event,

That is one of the requirements of a contract which is a contract of insurance. It must be a contract whereby for some good consideration you secure to yourself some benefit, usually, but not necessarily, the payment of a sum of money upon the happening of some event. That is what is generally known as insuring against something. The next thing that is necessary is that the event should be one which involves some uncertainty. There must be either uncertainty as to whether the event will happen or not, or if it is an event that must happen at some time there must be some uncertainty as to the time when it may happen. The next point is that raised by the Attorney-General, that it must be an assurance against something. The line between contracts which are mere bets or wagers and those which are insurances is a very fine one, and a contract which otherwise might be a mere bet or wager might become an insurance by reason of the possession of an interest in the subject-matter on the part of the person who is the assured. Then the word insurance itself seems to involve that the event, the happening of which was necessary to constitute the contract one of insurance, must be an event adverse to the interest of the assured in some way. By effecting an insurance you insure to yourself a sum of money to meet some possible loss or some detriment which you will suffer upon the event happening. I think, therefore, that what the Attorney-General meant when he said that an insurance involved the idea of insuring against something was that you must insure in reference to some event for a sum of money or some benefit to become payable by reason of the happening of some event, and that that event must be a thing which was primâ facie adverse to your interests. I myself do not think that that proposition was fully answered by Mr. Danckwerts's proposition, which was correct in point of fact, that a policy of insurance upon a life was not an indemnity, and that loss by reason of death was not necessary in order to get the money due. By statute it was necessary that at the time of the making of the contract there should be an insurable interest in the person making it, but it is unnecessary that the interest should continue, and the interest is not the measure of the amount recoverable as in the case of a marine or fire policy. Mr. Danckwerts's argument was correct in point of fact, but I cannot help thinking that, in order to make a contract an insurance, it is necessary that the event should primâ facie be an adverse event. That is indicated by the doctrine as to insurable interest. A mere contract depending upon the dropping of a life would not necessarily be a contract for life insurance. For instance, a contract by which two people, with a view to obtaining the advantage of survivorship, agreed to become joint tenants of a property instead of tenants in common, or a tontine agreement, would not be a life insurance, although they both are contracts relating to events depending upon lives in one sense.

I think, therefore, that the contract, in order to make it a contract of insurance, must be one which involved the payment of a sum of money or some other benefit, to become due upon the happening of an event, which event must have some amount of uncertainty about it, and must also be of a character more or less adverse to the interest of the person effecting the insurance. So far I agree with the Attorney-General; but it seems to me to be necessary to consider the present contract as a whole and see what the entire contract was. A contract in consideration of the payment of sums of money, to pay a sum of money at a fixed time, and nothing more, would not be a contract of insurance. The present contract, treating the endowment part of it separately, was a contract to pay £95 if the person assured, a child who would be fourteen years of age next birthday, lived until the age of 65. The time of payment was therefore a fixed time. Notwithstanding this, however, there is an uncertainty as to whether the £95 would ever become payable because it was only payable if the person lived to the age specified. Therefore, treating this part of the contract separately from the other, so far as regarded the point of certainty or uncertainty, this was a contract to pay a sum of money at a time certain but on an uncertain event. Therefore there was an element of uncertainty about it. That uncertainty depended upon the duration of human life, and that was why I have said that if this was a policy of insurance at all, I think it was a policy of life insurance within the meaning of section 98, sub-section 1, of the Stamp Act, 1891. The only question remaining to be considered is whether it is in fact a life insurance policy within that section. Looking at the contract as a whole, it seems to me that it was a contract that, in consideration of the payment of a weekly premium of 6d., if a person on whose behalf such payments were made died under the age of sixty-five, then £30 should be paid, and if he lived to sixty-five then £95 should be paid. Is not that an insurance in the sense of its being a contract to pay money upon the happening of events which were primâ facie adverse to the interests of the person assured? Here the point is that the sum of money was to be paid in the event of death before the age of sixty-five, and a larger sum in the event of no death before that time. Is that so obviously an event favourable to the person insured that it could not be considered an event upon which you could insure? The very object of these policies was to provide for old age, and in the case of persons who would be likely to be assured at the rate of sixpence a week, the event of living to sixty-five, at which age there would be greater difficulty in earning a living, was a sufficiently adverse event to constitute a contract, entered into for the purpose of securing a payment of money upon the happening of that event, a contract of insurance. When the whole contract was taken together there was no real difficulty. You had to consider whether the events upon which the money was to become payable were sufficiently adverse to the interests of the assured at the time of making the contract to make it the subject of a contract which could be called a contract of insurance. On the whole I have come to the conclusion that the present contract is a contract of insurance within the ordinary meaning of the words policy of insurance. Accepting the Attorney-General's argument that a contract of insurance was a contract against the happening of some event, and that that meant that the event upon which the money to be paid became payable was an event to some extent adverse to the interest of the person assured, it seems to me that, looking at this contract as a whole, there is no doubt that the events were quite sufficient to bring it within the words of section 98, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1891. Admitting it to be a policy of insurance, it is impossible to say that it was not a policy of life insurance within the meaning of the same section. The appeal will therefore be allowed, and the policy declared a policy of life insurance.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Broome v. Speak, 51 W. R. 258, [1903] 1 Ch. 586) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Romer and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), affirming the decision of Buckley, J. (50 W. R. 614).

The London and Northern Bank (Limited) was incorporated on the 6th of April, 1898, with a capital of £2,000,000, divided in 25,000 preference shares of £10 each and 175,000 ordinary shares of £10 each, for the purpose of carrying on the business of bankers in all its branches. The appellants and one Speak became directors. Mr. Bowden was a promoter, and on the 9th of May, 1898, an agreement was made between Bowden and the company under which he was to receive £20,000 for promoter's expenses. Later on negotiations took place for the acquisition by the company of the assets and business of the Leeds Bank. The purchase price was to be £142,500, and a deposit was required of 10 per cent.—£14,250—which Bowden agreed to advance. The London and Northern Bank in a letter of the 21st of September, 1898, wrote to one Craig, who was a nominee of Bowden, in the following terms: "The London and Northern Bank (Limited), 30-31, Clement's-lane, London, E.C., September 21st, 1898. Charles Craig, Esq., Lawrence-buildings, Manchester. Dear Sir,—In consideration of your advancing me the sum of £14,250 to enable me to pay the same to the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited), as deposit on purchase of their undertaking and assets, and your taking the risks of forfeiture, I hereby agree to repay the same on the directors going to allotment or on October 30 next altogether with £7,500 bonus for such loan."

On the 26th of September, 1898, the purchase agreement was signed and the sum of £14,250 deposited, and on the 27th the agreement was adopted, and the company's seal affixed.

On the 1st of October the agreement to repay the amount of the deposit and to pay the bonus of £7,500 to Craig was adopted at a meeting of the board, and a letter was written to Craig in the following terms: Dear Sir,—I am instructed to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 21st ult., which I placed before my directors at their meeting to-day, and to say that, in consequence of your having introduced the business and carried through the negotiations and found the deposit in connection with the purchase of the Leeds Joint Bank (Limited), my directors agree to repay you the same together with a bonus of £7,500.—Yours faithfully, H. G. CLOSE (secretary pro tem P.). J. D. H."

A meeting between the directors of the company and the directors of the Leeds Bank was held on the 10th of October, 1898, and the following resolution was passed: "That after full discussion and hearing the views of the directors of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited) and upon the chairman giving Mr. Bowden his assurance that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission on introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited) and raising the necessary deposit shall be honourably met at a future meeting of the directors of the London and Northern Bank (Limited), it is resolved with the assent of Mr. C. E. Craig that the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September, 1898, be cancelled, and that the subject be adjourned to a future meeting of the board." At the same meeting the prospectus, proofs of which had already been printed, was altered by striking out the reference to the letter of the 21st of September, 1898, which it had previously contained. On the 18th of October, 1898, Craig wrote to the trustee of the London and Northern Bank (Limited): "Referring to the letter which you wrote to me dated the 21st of September, 1898, I understand that the directors of the London and Northern Bank have passed a resolution to the effect that the claim which I may have for commission in introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited) or for raising the necessary deposit shall be honourably and properly met. Having regard to that assurance, I am quite willing to agree to the terms of your letter to me being cancelled and the arrangement there suggested as being considered at an end."

On the 20th of October, 1898, a meeting of the board took place, at which both the appellants Shepheard and Clayton were present, and the prospectus as altered was adopted and issued soon after.

On the faith of the prospectus the respondent applied for and was allotted shares in the company. The company went into voluntary liquidation, and respondent brought this action against the directors (the appellants Shepheard and Clayton, and against Speak, the chairman) to recover damages for the non-disclosure in the prospectus, on the faith of which he had taken shares, of the contract made by the letters of the 21st of September and the 1st of October, and the resolution of the 10th of October; and it was held by Buckley, J., and by the Court of Appeal, that the contracts should have been disclosed under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867.

Shepheard appealed from these decisions.

Haldane, K.C., and Cassel, for the appellant.—The contracts relied on were not legally binding and were not material. As to the words "knowingly issue," Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 586, 2 C. P. D. 469, was referred to. Lord Westbury, in Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149, restricted the maxim ignorantia juris neminem excusat to the general law. It cannot be considered applicable to the construction of a contract. It was a mistake of fact. The appellant did not know it was a contract: Earl Beauchamp v. Winn, 22 W. R. 193, L. R. 6 H. L. 223, 21 W. R. Dig. 269; Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 29 W. R. 181, 5 C. P. D. 455, at p. 460, Thesiger, L.J., as to the limitation to be placed on section 38.

Astbury, K.C., and Roskill, K.C., for the respondent.—The contract of the 21st of September was only modified and was material, and the subsequent arrangement was also material. Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, is not applicable.

Haldane, K.C., replied.

same view which both Buckley, J., and the Court of Appeal have taken as to what the evidence proves. And to my mind it is quite immaterial to go through the whole narrative of events, which have been carefully analyzed by Buckley, J.

It comes practically to this—that the appellants issued a prospectus with the knowledge in their minds that certain contracts had been entered into which were not referred to or stated in the prospectus. That the contract in question was immaterial I should have thought was hardly arguable; and, indeed, once the facts are understood, it is very difficult to argue "that he (Shepheard)" (in the language of Romer, L.J.) "did not appreciate the legal effect of the circumstances he knew, or did not understand that those circumstances caused such a liability to be cast upon the company as had to be set forth in the prospectus under section 38." It is hardly necessary to add that, if this is the true result of the evidence, no advice given him by any one can relieve him from the consequences of being a party to that prospectus.

I feel with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., that it is a painful duty to be obliged to treat that as fraudulent which in truth is not fraudulent; but section 38 of the Act of 1867 compels us to say that it shall be deemed to be fraudulent. The statute, rightly or wrongly, contemplated the possibility of there being no actual fraud, and intentionally enacted that, even if there was no fraud in the ordinary sense, yet, if the facts established the issue of a prospectus which did not mention a contract under the circumstances contemplated by that section, and which exist in this case, such prospectus should be deemed fraudulent.

While, therefore, I quite agree with every judge who has dealt with this case that it would be wrong to attribute fraud to Mr. Shepheard, yet I cannot doubt that his act has brought him within the section of the Act of Parliament, and therefore that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I should have been very glad if it had been possible to relieve the appellant from the consequences of what has occurred, but I see no reason to differ from the conclusion of the courts below. I must say I am very sorry for him.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—It is with great regret that I have also come to the conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed. There certainly seems to be two documents—a letter of the 21st of September, 1898, and a resolution of the 10th of October, 1898, which were material and important in the interests of the company and its shareholders. That the appellant knew of them is admitted; and, that being so, the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, renders the director issuing a prospectus which omits to refer to such contracts liable in damages. That the appellant took the best advice he could obtain upon the disclosure that should be made in the prospectus, and has acted in perfect good faith with the fullest intention and desire to omit nothing he ought to have disclosed, does not afford any defence against an action founded upon this statute.

I think also that, a primâ facie cause of action being established, the plaintiff in the action (the present respondent), must be afforded an opportunity by an inquiry of showing whether he has sustained any damage. I express no opinion whether the facts established at the hearing do or do not sustain a claim for damages.

Lord LINDLEY.—It is impossible not to sympathise with the appellant in this case, but I cannot say that the decision from which he has appealed is wrong in point of law. The Acts of Parliament which he has been held to have infringed are very stringent and are not very happily expressed. To be compelled by Act of Parliament to treat an honest man as if he were fraudulent is at all times painful; but the repugnance which is naturally felt against being compelled to do so will not justify this House in refusing to hold the appellant responsible for acts for which an Act of Parliament clearly declares he is to be held liable. He is said to have infringed two statutory enactments—namely, section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. The first of these has happily been repealed; but its repeal was too late to render the Act inapplicable to this case. The appellant is alleged to have infringed these enactments by not noticing in a prospectus certain letters and resolutions of the board which ought to have been referred to in it, and especially a letter of the 21st of September, 1898, and a resolution passed on the 10th of October of the same year. There can, in my opinion, be no doubt that these letters and resolution were extremely material, and ought not to have been suppressed. The appellant knew of their existence, but he honestly believed that it was unnecessary to refer to them. He took legal advice on the subject, but whether he was wrongly advised or whether he misunderstood the advice given is not clear. If the case had turned only on section 38 of the Act of 1867 it would have become necessary to consider the effect of the waiver clause inserted not only in the prospectus, but also in the applications for shares. But it is not necessary to decide this question, for the waiver clause has no application to the appellant's liability under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

The prospectus unfortunately stated a fact which was not true—namely, that the only contracts to which the bank was a party were the two which were mentioned in it. This untrue statement brings the case clearly and unmistakably within section 3, subsection 1, of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. It is contended for the appellant that he is not liable under this Act because he had reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, that the statement in the prospectus was true. But he knew of the documents, and he knew they were not disclosed; he thought they were not such as required disclosure. This is a question of law, and I agree with Buckley, J., and the Court of Appeal that a mistake of this kind does not furnish a defence to an action founded on the statute in question. Twycross v. Grant is an authority in favour of this view, although it turned on the Act of 1867.

It was then contended that there was no evidence that the plaintiff, who took shares on the faith of the prospectus, had sustained any damage by reason of the untrue statement contained in it. The company failed about a year after it was formed, and the plaintiff has lost the money he paid for his shares. This appears to me to be sufficient primâ facie evidence of some damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the untrue statements in question. All that has been done by the court as yet has been to decide that the plaintiff has proved enough to entitle him to an inquiry as to the amount of damages which he has sustained by reason of such statements. This is quite in accordance with the usual practice in actions of this kind when brought in the Chancery Division, and it is extremely convenient. It saves the trouble and expense of going into evidence which will be useless if the plaintiff fails to establish any liability of the defendant to him.

The appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

ILLINGWORTH v. HOULDSWORTH AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Company—Floating charge—Assignment of present and future book debts — Registration — Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 14.

A mortgage of the present and future book debts of a trading company which contemplates the carrying on of the business in the ordinary way, and leaving such debts for the time being under the control of the directors, is a floating charge within the meaning of section 14 of the Companies Act, 1900, and therefore void, if not registered, as against the creditors of the company.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Houldsworth v. Yorkshire Woolcombers Association, [1903] 2 Ch. 284) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.), affirming decision of Farwell, J.

In April, 1900, the Yorkshire Woolcombers Association (Limited) by deed specifically mortgaged all its freehold and leasehold properties to trustees to secure its debenture stock, and as beneficial owner charged "by way of floating security all its other property and assets, both present and future, and its undertaking, but not including capital for the time being uncalled." By clause 21 of this deed the association was given power to sell, specifically mortgage, or deal with the property by way of floating security, until the trusts to sell, &c., should be exerciseable.

The association having to give security to its directors who had guaranteed large amounts due to the bankers of the association, by a deed of mortgage dated October, 1902, after reciting that the association would require advances, and that the guarantors had requested the association to discharge them from liability, but had agreed not to take any immediate steps to obtain their discharge on having the indemnity and specific security thereinafter appearing, the association thereby covenanted to indemnify the guarantors, and thereby assigned to a trustee (the appellant) by way of mortgage all the book and other debts now owing, or which might at any time during the continuance of the security become due and owing to the association, and the full benefit of all the securities for the present and future book and other debts, in trust for the guarantors The mortgage also provided that the trustee should at any time, if required by the guarantors, give notice of this assignment to the debtors of the association, but that it should not be incumbent on the trustee to give notice unless he thought fit; there were also provisions that the trustee might at any time give notice, appoint a receiver, and exercise the statutory power of sale, but meantime he was not to be answerable for allowing the association to receive the book debts.

In November, 1902, the appellant appointed a receiver of the book and other debts, and notice was given to the debtors of the association of the mortgage and appointment.

A receiver was subsequently appointed in a debenture-holders' action brought by the respondent and the trustees under the deed of 1900, and in that action the appellant applied for liberty to collect the book debts.

Farwell, J., refused the motion, and the Court of Appeal upheld this decision.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—It does not appear to me that this case is susceptible of much discussion, nor do I think it necessary to give an abstract definition of what a floating security is; it is enough to say that this instrument is one, and I think it is one for many reasons. In the first place you have that which in a sense I suppose must be an element in the definition of a floating security, that it is something which is to float, not to be put into immediate operation, but such that the company is to be allowed to carry on its business. It contemplates not only that it should carry with it the book debts which were then existing, but it contemplates also the possibility of those book debts being extinguished by payment to the company, and that other book debts should come in and take the place of those that had disappeared. That seems to me to be an essential characteristic of what is properly called a floating security. The recitals, I agree with Cozens-Hardy, L.J., are not without their importance. They show an intention on the part of both parties that the business of the company shall continue to be carried on in the ordinary way—that the book debts shall be at the command of, for the purpose of being used by, the company. Of course, if there was an absolute assignment of them which fixed the property in them, the company would have no right to touch them at all. The minute after the execution of such an assignment they would have no more interest in them; whereas, as a matter of fact, it seems to me that the whole purport of the instrument is to enable the company to carry on its business in the ordinary way, to receive the book debts that were due to them, to incur new debts, and to carry on their business exactly as if this deed had not been executed at all. That is what is meant by a floating security. It appears to me, notwithstanding the argument we have heard, that it is impossible to doubt that the bargain between the parties which is evidenced by this instrument is one which could only be carried out at all by its being a floating security such as I have indicated, and which must comprehend those incidents.

I am not able to deduce more from the instrument itself than the Court of Appeal have done, and I entirely agree with the judgment pronounced by them, and it appears to me that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment of Farwell, J., affirmed by the Court of Appeal, is perfectly correct. With regard to the criticism which Vaughan Williams, L.J., passed, not I think unkindly, on some words of mine in the Manila case, I only wish to observe that what I said was only intended as a description, not as a definition, of a floating security. I should have thought there was not much difficulty in defining what a floating charge is in contrast to what is called a specific charge. A specific charge, I think, is one that without more fastens on ascertained and definite property or property capable of being ascertained and defined; a floating charge, on the other hand, is ambulatory and shifting in its nature, hovering over and, so to speak, floating with the property which it is intended to affect until some event occurs or some act is done which causes it to settle and fasten on the subject of the charge within its reach and grasp.

I agree that this is a clear case, and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord JAMES.—I concur.

Lord LINDLEY.—So do I.

MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. SHARPE. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Earnings"—Lodging allowance—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), First Schedule, clause 1 (a) (i).

A goods guard, in the employment of a railway company, received in addition to his ordinary wages a certain sum per night for lodging allowance when he was obliged to sleep away from home on the company's business. The object of the allowance was to cover the guard's out-of-pocket expenses, and its amount about equal to the reasonable cost of board and lodging. No inquiry was ever made as to the actual expenses incurred by the guard, or whether he spent the amount or any part thereof.

Held, that the allowance must be taken as part of his "earnings" within the meaning of Schedule I., par. 1 (a) (i), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 481, [1903] 2 K. B. 26) affirmed.

Appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Mathew, L.JJ.), affirming a decision given by the county court judge.

The applicant for compensation, the present respondent, was the widow and legal personal representative of Sharpe, who was at the time of his death a goods guard in the employment of the appellants. On the 9th of September, 1902, when he was preparing to couple waggons on to the train of which he had charge at Chellaston East Junction, he was run over by a passing train and killed.

At the hearing of the arbitration the liability of the appellants to pay compensation to the extent of £236 9s. 10d. was admitted, and upon the evidence before him the learned judge found as a fact that the earnings of the deceased for the three years preceding his death amounted to £259 11s. 10d. This amount was made up of the £236 9s. 10d. and of the further sum of £23 2s. admitted by the appellants at the hearing to have been paid to the deceased during the same period, as lodging allowances.

The terms on which these allowances were made are given in Lord Davey's judgment.

The county court judge and the Court of Appeal held that the lodging allowance must be taken as part of the guard's earnings.

Lord DAVEY.—The appeal in this case is from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, which affirmed a judgment by his Honour Judge Lindley. We have therefore a concurrence of judicial opinion, and the appellants ask us to differ from what has been held by the courts below. The question before your lordships is a short and simple one, and it is this: By the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "if a death results from injury (which is the present case) the amount of the compensation under this Act shall be, if the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death, a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury." The question really is, what were the deceased man's "earnings" at the time of his death? He was in the employment of the Midland Railway Co. as a goods guards, and a person in that kind of employment has sometimes to sleep away from his ordinary residence or to take his meals away from his home. Accordingly an arrangement is made by the Midland Railway Co. for the remuneration of their guards having regard to that fact. They have a scale by which the wages are of a certain amount, varying with the time during which the guards have been in the company's service. Sixty hours constitute a week's work, and then there is a heading called "lodging allowance," and under that heading we find these allowances: "When men are required to lodge away from home they are allowed one shilling per night in the provinces, and one shilling and sixpence in London if the company's lodging house is used. Three shillings in London and two shillings elsewhere for private lodgings. In the exceptionally long periods of rest for the company's convenience, where men have to lodge for over fifteen hours, an extra shilling is allowed, and two shillings where over twenty hours' rest has to be taken—except in London, where the extra allowances are one shilling and one shilling and sixpence respectively. This extra allowance is not given unless the time occupied on the outward and return journeys together equals twenty hours."

The question is, whether the allowances which were thus made for the purpose which is pointed out in the rules I have read, form an element in arriving at the amount of the earnings of the deceased guard, or, in other words, whether his earnings are to be merely the fixed wage which he received, without taking into account those extra allowances which were made to him. I ought to add this—that I think the county court judge showed that those allowances are carefully adjusted and arrived at, so that not much profit is to be made out of them: but it is, of course, perfectly conceivable that if a man had, for instance, a relative or a friend living in one of the places away from home where he had to pass the night, he might very easily make a profit out of the allowance. The guards are not bound to account to the company for the allowance, and whether their annual expenditure is less or more their allowance remains exactly the same. Now, what are the man's "earnings"? The first answer one would give would be, what he earns; but what does he earn? It appears to me that he earns whatever is the sum which is the fruit of his labour—whatever he receives by way of remuneration for the services he gives, or, as my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten appears to have answered the same question in the case of Abram Coal Co. v. Southern, [1903] A. C. 306, 51 W. R. Dig. 102, a man's "earnings" are the full sum for which the man is engaged to work. Now does it make any difference that, from the conditions of the employment, part of the remuneration that he receives without accounting for the use of it to the company is in consideration of peculiar conditions affecting his employment? I think not. For instance, if wages were three shillings a day, and the company, instead of making a time allowance, gave a fixed addition to the wages, so that, instead of the wages being twenty-one shillings a week the company said, We will give twenty-four shillings and no time allowances. I think nobody could doubt that in that case the earnings would be twenty-four shillings a week, and none the less so because the conditions of the employment were such that the workman had to incur some expenses in order to enable him to perform the services for which he was to be remunerated.

It appears to me that the converse case which has been before your lordships in the case of the Abram Coal Co. v Southern, and before the Court of Appeal in Houghton v. Sutton Heath Colliery Co., 49 W. R. 196, [1901] 1 K. B. 93, is very illustrative. In that case, like the present, the workman had to incur certain expenses, of which I will take lamp-oil as one, for the purpose of his stipulated remuneration. The company, his employers, were willing to supply him with lamp-oil, making a deduction from his wages in respect of it. If the defendants were right in their contention that one must look, not at the wages, but at the amount of profit which the man makes out of his wages, as the test of the amount of compensation under this Act, one would have thought that those deductions, being deductions from his wages for the purpose of enabling him to earn his wages, ought not to be taken into account as against the company for the purpose of ascertaining that compensation. But the contrary was the decision. It was held that what must be looked at was the actual amount of the man's remuneration for his services, and that the expense he had to incur for the purpose of putting himself into a condition to earn that remuneration could not be taken into account.

I think the only difficulty and the apparent differentia of this case is the fact that the company, instead of making a fixed addition to the wages to cover those casual and incidental expenses to which guards may be put, give an allowance varying according to the time during which the man is obliged to be away from home at rest; but whether a man's wages have a fluctuating character based upon the time not merely during which he is actually employed, but including also the time during which he is at rest, as is the fact in this case, does not seem to me to make the slightest difference in principle. If the appellants are right, one would in every case have to analyze the remuneration by way of wages or salary which has been paid to an injured or deceased employee, and to ascertain the conditions of his labour and what expenses he was put to in order to earn that remuneration. It appears to me that it would be impossible to analyze that in every case. I think that that cannot have been within the contemplation of the Legislature in framing the Act; and I think that you must take, for the purpose of assessing the compensation, the actual remuneration for his services which was received by the workman quite irrespective of the question of what expenses he was put to for the purpose of earning that remuneration. I therefore move your lordships that the present appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I entertain no doubt in this case, being clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is correct.

The question before your lordships is the construction to be put upon the word "earnings" in the schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The meaning of the word appears to me to be the amount received by the workman on account of, and in return for, his services. In this case we must ask, What did the allowances received by the deceased workman represent? They appear to me to represent a return for the services which he rendered; and if we were to go beyond the question of what was the amount he received in return for those services, your lordships would be making the mistake of inquiring as to profits instead of inquiring as to receipts.

In the argument at the bar the illustration was put of a case where a man received a certain sum of money for a specific object, to which he was bound to apply it, and if he did not so apply it he would have been guilty of a breach of trust, and would probably have committed the crime of embezzlement; but that is not the case. The deceased workman and the other workmen are paid a certain sum of money weekly—a smaller sum if they remain within the neighbourhood of their own homes, a larger sum if they are absent from those homes. In both cases the sums paid are wages; in both cases the workman is entitled to make as much profit as he can out of the sum so received; to be as abstemious as he will; to receive, as it has been said, hospitality, and to obtain the advantages which a man who chooses not to afford himself comforts beyond the necessaries of life obtains over his fellow-workman who is more luxurious in his habits. I cannot understand how it can be said that that is not an "earning." One could give many instances. For example, if a workman were told, you will receive so much wages if you are in uniform, and you will have to find your own uniform, then it is a gross sum he receives. The application of a certain part of it to a particular output—namely, the payment for the uniform—does not render the money he receives any the less "earnings." So in the same way here. If the man is told by the railway company, you will receive if you are away from home so much,, and having received it do what you will with it, we, the railway company, do not ask you to account for it,—it seems to me to be quite clear that the sum so received is an "earning," although no doubt at the time when the sum was fixed the object of fixing the higher rate was to meet a corresponding expense. That is not the question: the question is "earnings" as against "profits"; and, looking at the application of that word in this case, it seems to me, as I have said, quite clear that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is correct.

LORD ROBERTSON.—The contract with this guard is that, plus what is called his wages, he is entitled to so much for each night he is away from home, and no inquiry is made whether that sum has been spent on board and lodging or spent at all. This being so, it seems to me that, not the less because the purpose of these extra payments was to meet the cost of board and lodging has this man a right to the money, and not the less because they bear the name "allowances" does the guard earn them each time he, being on the service of his employers, has to spend the night away from home; and if he earns them they are earnings.

The tenant for life and remaindermen of a settled estate mortgaged the estate in fee as security for an advance to the remaindermen, who alone covenanted with the mortgagee to repay the advance and interest thereon. By an indenture of even date the remaindermen covenanted to indemnify the tenant for life against any liability or loss in respect of the mortgage debt, and out of another estate belonging to them created a rent-charge in favour of the tenant for life for the performance of their covenant. The tenant for life was in fact kept indemnified.

Held, that the whole property, without deduction of the mortgage debt, was liable to estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894, upon the death of the tenant for life.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 326, [1903] 1 K. B. 483) reversed, and that of Phillimore, J. (50 W. R. 270, [1902] 1 K. B. 429), restored.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L.JJ.), reversing a decision of Phillimore, J.

By the will of the Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry, the testator's Ditton estate, in the counties of Bucks and Middlesex, was settled to the use of the testator's wife for life without impeachment of waste, and from and after her decease to the use of the testator's second son, for life without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of his sons successively in tail male, with remainders over.

The duke died on the 16th of April, 1884.

By an indenture dated the 28th of May, 1888, the Ditton estate was disentailed, with the consent of the duchess as protector of the settlement, and a joint power of appointment over it given to Lord Montagu and his eldest son, John Walter Edward Douglas Scott Montagu. By an indenture dated the 29th of May, 1888, and made between the duchess dowager of the first part, the respondent Lord Montagu of the second part, John Edward Walter Douglas Scott Montagu of the third part, and certain mortgagees of the fourth part, Lord Montagu and his son, in consideration of £27,000 lent to them by the mortgagees, jointly and severally covenanted with the mortgagees to repay them the said sum with interest; and the duchess dowager, as tenant for life in possession under the will of the late duke, granted, and the respondent Lord Montagu and John Walter Edward Douglas Scott Montagu, in exercise of the joint power of appointment given to them over the fee simple in remainder expectant on the decease of the duchess dowager by the indenture of the 28th of May, 1888, appointed, the Ditton estate to the use of the mortgagees in fee simple, subject to a proviso for redemption by Lord Montagu and his son.

By another indenture dated the 29th of May, 1888, and made between Lord Montagu of the first part, John Walter Edward Douglas Scott Montagu of the second part, the duchess dowager of the third part, and certain trustees of the fourth part, an estate called the Clitheroe estate, in the county of Lancaster, was charged with a yearly rent-charge of £1,500 in favour of the duchess dowager to keep down the interest on the mortgage debt of £27,000, or on so much thereof as should from time to time be owing on the mortgage, to the intent that the life interest of the duchess dowager in the Ditton estate might be wholly exonerated therefrom

The dowager duchess died on the 28th of March, 1895.

The mortgage for £27,000 was created wholly for the benefit of Lord Montagu and his son, and the dowager duchess and the Ditton estate were in fact kept wholly indemnified by them, or one of them, against the mortgage and all claims in respect thereof. The interest on the mortgage debt was throughout paid by Lord Montagu.

The Crown claimed that upon the death of the dowager duchess, estate duty became payable under the Finance Act, 1894, on the whole of the Ditton estate free from the mortgage debt.

Phillimore, J., so decided, but the Court of Appeal reversed his decision, and held that duty was only payable on the equity of redemption.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. Carson, S.G. (Vaughan Hawkins with them), for the Crown.—The duty is payable on the whole estate. The dowager duchess in fact enjoyed the whole life interest. The case is different from Cowley (Earl) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 525, [1899] A. C. 198, where it was only the equity of redemption which was settled. Here the settled property was the whole property. You have a right to look and see what was the effect on the life estate, and therefore at the indemnity deed. How is the value to be ascertained without looking at the real transaction. A purchaser of the life estate would have been entitled to the whole.

Danckwerts, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell, for the respondents.—The only thing that has been kept in the settlement is the equity of redemption. The extraneous arrangements should not affect the question.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., replied.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case, with the greatest respect for the learned judges in the Court of Appeal, I think they have allowed validity to be given to what is mere form, and not substance, and with that I cannot concur. If one looks at the whole arrangement, it seems to me that the substance of the matter was this—not that there should be a mere contractual relation between the remainderman and this lady who was entitled to this property, but that the property should remain hers as between those two persons, and that she should never have one farthing less than she was entitled to being secured by the property to which she was entitled; and all the analogies which Mr. Danckwerts has endeavoured to put before your lordships seem to me to be beside the question.

It may be that the same deed may have a legal operation as between one set of persons, and yet, as between other parties to it, the real substance of the transaction may be such that it cannot be treated as if it had its full legal operation. That I think is the case here. As between the duchess and Lord Montagu there never was the relation which is insisted upon by Mr. Danckwerts. It seems to me that Lord Montagu, wanting to borrow money, gets the security of this lady's estate, which enabled him to borrow the money; but the parties to the instrument which they executed point out—and I think point out very distinctly—that the effect of it is to be, as between those two persons, such that the duchess is to be entitled for the rest of her life to retain and to keep that which she then had—namely, a right to the property and to the results of the property. And she did so. She paid nothing in the way of interest on the mortgage, and she received the rents and profits. As between those two persons, looking at the instrument, I think that it affected nothing, although it afforded security to the persons who lent the money. But the notion of its not being liable to estate duty when that transaction comes to an end, and when the whole of what she had goes back to Lord Montagu, seems to me a very forced construction of these legal instruments, which are effective for the object that they were designed to effect, but which never were intended to pass the estate itself out of the dowager duchess.

Under those circumstances, with great respect to the Court of Appeal, I am of opinion that the true question was that which was put by my brother Phillimore. He said that what she had to give up, what she relinquished by her death, was the thing that she enjoyed during her lifetime.

That being so, it seems to me that the Crown are perfectly right in the contention which they have set up. I therefore move your lordships that the judgment be reversed.

Lord DAVEY.—I am of the same opinion. I adhere to everything which I am reported to have said in Lord Cowley's case, and in particular to the passage from my judgment on which the Court of Appeal found in the decision which they have given. If this were a simple case of mortgage by a tenant for life and a remainderman, or by successive tenants for life and the ultimate remainderman, I think that the property would be taken out of the settlement as from the date of the mortgage, and on the death of the first tenant for life the estate duty could be claimed only on the equity of redemption. But there appear to me to be circumstances in the present case which take it out of that rule. I am not prepared to say—and it is not necessary to express an opinion—whether, if there had been a mere indemnity, such, indeed, as the law would imply from the fact of the mortgage being for the benefit of the remainderman, if there were a mere personal covenant of indemnity to the duchess (to take this concrete case) by Lord Montagu and his son, I am not prepared to say whether that would be sufficient or not; I do not say that it would not be, and I do not say that it would. But in this case it appears to me that we have far more than that. We have what, in my opinion, amounts to an express contract by Lord Montagu and Mr. Montagu with the duchess that under no circumstances, although she had at their request joined in the mortgage in order to effect a mortgage of the fee, should she be called upon to pay anything out of the income of her Ditton property; and provision was made by which, in case any such claim was made upon her, she might have recourse to another fund. Another fund was provided out of which the interest should be obtained. The arrangement between the parties was, in fact and in truth, that the duchess should continue to enjoy the whole income of the Ditton estate discharged, as between them, from any liability by reason of her having joined in the mortgage.

What, then, was the property which passed on the death of the duchess? First, I will take it under section 1. It is admitted that the equity of redemption at any rate passed—that is to say, the property subject to the mortgage. But did the residue of the property pass upon the death of the duchess? Now, if the true transaction between the parties was that as between themselves the mortgage should not effectually attach to the estate until the duchess's death, then I think it may fairly be said that the whole property passed under section 1. But supposing that not to be so—and I quite admit there is a little technical difficulty about it—I am quite satisfied that the property passed under the combined operation of section 1 and section 2. As regards section 1, the equity of redemption—that is, the property subject to the incumbrance—passed undoubtedly under section 1; but, as regards section 2, it appears to me that so much of the income of the Ditton estate as represented, or was equal to, the interest on the mortgage comes exactly within section 2, sub-section 1, heading (b). If I am right in the views which I have expressed as to the effect of the arrangements between the parties, the duchess had a beneficial interest, notwithstanding the mortgage, in the whole of the income, including £1,080 a year, which was equivalent to the interest on the mortgage. She had, as between her and Lord Montagu, an undoubted beneficial interest to receive and to retain without incumbrance or charge upon it that portion of the income.

Section 2, sub-section 1, heading (b), is this: "Property in which the deceased or any other person had an interest ceasing on the death of the deceased." Now I think that portion of the rents which was equal to £1,080 a year was property in which the duchess had an undoubted beneficial interest ceasing on her death. Then the sub-section says that the property is to be deemed to pass—to what extent?—"to the extent to which a benefit accrues or arises by the cesser of such interest." Lord Montagu thereupon acquired the benefit of receiving that sum of £1,080 a year for the purposes of discharging his mortgage interest. He was under liability for the interest on the mortgage during the duchess's lifetime, but he had no fund out of which to pay it. He now receives a fund out of which he will be enabled to discharge the interest on his mortgage. In my opinion, that is "a benefit which accrues or arises" to him. The property represented by that £1,080 a year, if it did not pass under section 1, is to be deemed to pass under section 2.

To complete the case, I may as well point out that to determine the value which is to be deemed to pass section 7, sub-section 7 (b), provides that, "if the interest extended to less than the whole income of the property," the value of the benefit accruing shall be "the principal value of an addition to the property equal to the income to which the interest extended." So that, quacunque viâ, I am of opinion that, whatever technical difficulties there may be and whatever was the form of the conveyancing which the parties assumed for the purpose of carrying out the transaction, the Crown is entitled to say that the whole value of the Ditton estate either passed, or should be deemed to have passed, under either section 1 or section 2.

I confess, if there were any difficulty in this view—which I think there is not—I should have thought it was quite open to your lordships to say that if the £1,080 a year is to be deemed a charge upon the Clitheroe annuity, then the case is as broad as it is long, because if Lord Montagu is relieved from the payment of estate duty on the ground that the estate to the extent of the mortgage did not pass by the duchess's death, he would still remain liable to pay an equivalent amount of duty in respect of the cesser of the annuity he created out of the Clitheroe money for the duchess's indemnity.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should succeed, and that the judgment below should be reversed.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I concur in the results which have been arrived at by my noble and learned friends who have addressed your lordships' House.

No doubt there was in form a mortgage—a mortgage that was good as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee—and I accept Mr. Danckwerts' submission that there was only besides that mortgage a contractual obligation; but I differ from his submission that that contractual obligation cannot affect the estate passing on the death of the tenant for life. It seems to me that the contractual obligation did affect the estate, because it relieved the tenant for life from bearing any of the burden of the mortgage. The result is that in substance there was, as between the tenant for life and the remainderman, no mortgage, and that by the death of the Dowager Duchess of Buccleuch, the tenant for life, Lord Montagu, obtained the estate without the mortgage affecting him, or at all events obtained the benefit of it to a greater degree than during her life. He had then to bear the burden of the mortgage. By the death of the tenant for life he has become seised of the estate and receives the benefit of it, which he did not receive before. Therefore I concur in thinking that the judgment appealed from ought to be reversed.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I entirely concur.

Where the owner of a house in London has given an adjoining owner a building owner's notice, under section 90 of the London Building Act, 1894, of his intention to pull down a party structure and rebuild it under section 88, sub-section 7, and the adjoining owner has thereupon given the building owner a notice under section 89 requiring him to execute certain specified works, and a difference with respect to the execution of such works is referred to arbitration under section 91, *the jurisdiction of the arbitrators is limited to settling differences with regard to the execution of the works to which the notice relates. Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., granting an interim injunction restraining the defendants from raising or building on a party-wall between premises belonging to the plaintiffs and premises belonging to the defendants, without serving on the plaintiffs a building owner's notice in accordance with the London Building Act, 1894.

The plaintiffs were the freeholders of a house known as No. 33, John-street, Marylebone; the defendants were the freeholders of the adjoining house, which was known as No. 34, John-street. In April, 1902, one Ecclestone, in pursuance a building agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and himself, pulled down the building which then stood on the site of No. 33 and proceeded to erect a new building. By the terms of the agreement, when the building reached a certain stage, the plaintiffs were to grant Ecclestone a long lease of the premises. The building operations involved the necessity of dealing with the party-wall between No. 33 and No. 34, and Ecclestone proposed to pull down the party-wall and rebuild it of greater strength, as he had the right to do under section 88, sub-section 7, of the London Building Act. He accordingly served a building owner's notice, as required by section 90 of the London Building Act, on the defendants, stating his intention of so doing. The defendants, who were then contemplating the erection of a block of a workmen's dwellings on the site of No. 34, served on Ecclestone a notice, under section 89 of the Act, of certain requisitions to be complied with by him in the rebuilding of the party-wall. A difference having arisen between Ecclestone and the defendants with regard to these requisitions, they each appointed a surveyor, and the two surveyors appointed a third surveyor, for the purpose of settling the matter in dispute in pursuance of section 91 of the Act. The surveyors made an award by which it was provided, inter alia, that the party-wall should be of certain specified dimensions, involving a greater thickness than would be necessary in ordinary circumstances, and that the extra thickness of the wall should be on the defendants' land, and it was further provided that the defendants should be entitled to raise the wall at any time as they thought fit. Ecclestone proceeded with the building operations following the requirements of the award, and in September, 1902, he obtained a lease of No. 33 from the plaintiffs in accordance with the building agreement. He subsequently surrendered the lease to the plaintiffs.

The defendants having proposed to increase the height of the party-wall in the carrying out of their scheme for erecting workmen's dwellings, the plaintiffs brought this action for an injunction to restrain them from raising or building on the party-wall without first serving a building owner's notice on the plaintiffs.

By section 5, sub-section 31, of the London Building Act, 1894, "The expression 'building owner' means such one of the owners of adjoining land as is desirous of building, or such one of the owners of buildings, storeys, or rooms separated by a party-wall or party structure as does, or is desirous to do, a work affecting that party-wall or party structure."

By sub-section 32, "The expression 'adjoining owner' means the owner or one of the owners, and 'adjoining occupier' means the occupier or one of the occupiers of land, buildings, storeys, or rooms adjoining those of the building owner."

By section 87, "Where lands of different owners adjoin and are unbuilt on at the line of junction, and either owner is about to build on any part of the line of junction, the following provisions shall have effect: (1) If the building owner desire to build a party-wall on the line of junction, he may serve notice thereof on the adjoining owner describing the intended wall."

By section 88, "The building owner shall have the following rights in relation to party structures (that is to say) . . . (7) a right to pull down any party structure which is of insufficient strength for any building intended to be built, and to rebuild the same of sufficient strength for the above purpose, upon condition of making good all damage occasioned thereby to the adjoining premises or to the internal finishings and decorations thereof."

By section 89, "(1) Where a building owner proposes to exercise any of the foregoing rights with respect to party structures, the adjoining owner may by notice require the building owner to build on any such party structure such chimney copings jambs or breasts or flues or such piers or recesses or any other like works as may fairly be required for the convenience of such adjoining owner and may be specified in the notice, and it shall be the duty of the building owner to comply with such requisition in all cases where the execution of the required works will not be injurious to the building owner or cause to him unnecessary inconvenience or unnecessary delay in the exercise of his right. (2) Any difference that arises between a building owner and adjoining owner in respect of the execution of any such works shall be determined in manner in which differences between owners and adjoining owners are hereinafter directed to be determined."

By section 90, "A building owner shall not . . . exercise any of his rights under this Act . . . in relation to any party-wall or party structure other than a party fence wall unless at least two months before doing so he has served on the adjoining owner a party-wall or party structure notice stating the nature and particulars of the proposed work and the time at which the work is proposed to be commenced."

By section 91, "(1) In all cases not specially provided for by this Act, where a difference arises between a building owner and adjoining owner in respect of any matter arising with reference to any work to which any notice given under this part of this Act relates, unless both parties concur in the appointment of one surveyor they shall each appoint a surveyor, and the two surveyors so appointed shall select a third surveyor, and such one surveyor or three surveyors or any two of them shall settle any matter from time to time during the continuance of any work to which the notice relates in dispute between such building and adjoining owner, with power by his or their award to determine the right to do and the time and manner of doing any work, and generally any other matter arising out of or incidental to such difference; but any time so appointed for doing any work shall not, unless otherwise agreed, commence until after the expiration of the period by this part of this Act prescribed for the notice in the particular case."

The plaintiffs having obtained an interim injunction, the defendants appealed, and it was agreed that the appeal should be treated as the trial of the action.

English Harrison, K.C., and G. A. Scott, for the defendants.—It is not necessary for the defendants to serve a fresh building owner's notice. The powers of a building owner who desires to deal with a party structure are laid down in section 88 of the London Building Act, 1894. Ecclestone proposed to exercise the powers given by sub-section 7 of that section, and, under section 90, he served a building owner's notice on the defendants as adjoining owners. Section 89 gives power to an adjoining owner to serve notice of requisitions with regard to the proposed work. The defendants served such a notice, and a dispute which arose thereon was settled by arbitration in accordance with section 91. The award made in that arbitration is binding between the parties, and by it the defendants are entitled to raise the party-wall at any time as they think fit. The defendants now desire to raise the party-wall. That does not turn them into building owners within the meaning of the Act. The award is not ultrà vires, for section 91 empowers the arbitrators "to determine the right to do, and the time and manner of doing, any work, and generally any other matter arising out of or incidental to such difference."

They referred to In re Stone and Hastie, 52 W. R. 130, [1903] 2 K. B. 463.

J. Eldon Bankes, K.C., and A. H. Poyser, for the plaintiffs.—The award is ultrà vires. In re Stone and Hastie shows that the arbitrators have no jurisdiction to decide anything beyond the dispute which is submitted to them by virtue of the statute.

COLLINS, M.R.—The legislation dealing with the rights of building owners and adjoining owners in London is now settled by a code which is contained in sections 87-101 of the London Building Act, 1894. We considered that code with some minuteness in the recent case of In re Stone and Hastie, and it is not necessary to do so again. In the present case a dispute under the Act has arisen in these circumstances: The defendants, the corporation of Marylebone, desire to erect a substantial building adjoining a house which was built a year or two ago by Mr. Ecclestone, who was at that time tenant to the plaintiffs under a building agreement. When Mr. Ecclestone was about to build that house the corporation took steps to protect their rights as adjoining owners. He had given them a building owner's notice of his intention to proceed under section 88 of the London Building Act, and they gave him a notice under section 89. This latter notice imposed on him an obligation to comply with the requisitions contained in it. A dispute having arisen with regard to the execution of the required works, the matter was referred to arbitration in accordance with the Act. The duty of the arbitrators was to consider how far the adjoining owners, the corporation, were right in the demands which they made. They had to adjust the difference which had arisen between the building owner and the adjoining owners with regard to the work to which the notice related, but in making their award they purported to deal with something more. They not only awarded how far they thought the adjoining owners were entitled to the special securities which they demanded, but they also purported to deal with the adjoining owners' future relations to the party-wall. The award provided that they should be entitled at any time to increase the height of the wall. The time has now come when the corporation desire to raise the height of the party-wall. The plaintiffs object that the corporation have no right to build on the top of the wall without following the procedure provided by the Act, and they have brought this action for an injunction. The corporation say in answer that they have power under the award to build as they propose to do, and that they ought not to be restrained from doing so. Phillimore, J., has granted the plaintiffs an interim injunction, holding that the award was a statutory award, and that it did not confer on the adjoining owners the right of building on the party-wall after it had once been built. The question resolves itself into this: What is the law when an adjoining owner proposes to build? In such circumstances an adjoining owner seems to become a building owner. When the corporation in this case proposed to build on the top of the party-wall they wanted to exercise the rights of building owners; and they came under the same obligation to the plaintiffs, their adjoining owners, as Ecclestone had previously come under to them, the corporation. The plaintiffs are therefore right in saying that they are entitled to notice before the corporation begin to build. The defendants rely on the language of section 91, "with power by his or their award to determine the right to do and the time and manner of doing any work, and generally any other matter arising out of or incidental to such difference," and argue that this confers on the arbitrators jurisdiction with regard to what the adjoining owner may be allowed to do hereafter without resorting to the machinery provided by the Act. But the section is expressly limited to differences in respect of matters arising with reference to work to which the notice relates. The differences over which the arbitrators have jurisdiction must be taken to be defined by the notice. The section does not give a general jurisdiction to deal with differences. The words "any other matter arising out of or incidental to such differences" do not oust the jurisdiction of new arbitrators when the adjoining owner in his turn desires to build. In my opinion the section negatives the defendants' contention, and there has been in the award an excess of jurisdiction which does not bind the parties. The appeal will therefore be dismissed, and, the parties agreeing that the hearing of this appeal shall be treated as the trial of the action, there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for the injunction which they claim.

Bankruptcy—Adjudication—Practice—Notice to debtor—Adjudication under Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 20, sub-section 1—Bankruptcy Rules, rr. 27, 28, 190-192a.

If a receiving order is made against a debtor, and the creditors pass a resolution that he be adjudged bankrupt, it is in the power of the court, under section 20, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, on the application of the official receiver, to make such an adjudication, although no notice has been given to the debtor that such an application is intended to be made. But, as a general rule, it is more convenient that notice should be given.

This was an appeal by the debtor from a decision of a Divisional Court (Bigham and Darling, JJ.).

The facts were as follows:

In 1903 a petition in bankruptcy was presented against the debtor in the Newport (Mon.) County Court. At the hearing of the petition, although the debtor was absent on account of illness, the registrar made a receiving order against him. The debtor did not appeal from this order, but in November of the same year he submitted a scheme of arrangement with his creditors. This scheme was considered at an adjourned meeting of creditors on the 15th of December, at which the debtor was present. At the meeting the scheme proposed was rejected, and a resolution was passed for adjudicating the debtor a bankrupt. The official receiver immediately applied for an adjudication in bankruptcy which was made. The debtor had received no notice of the intention of the official receiver to apply for such an adjudication.

In January, 1904, he gave notice of appeal from this order, and on the 23rd of March the appeal was dismissed. He also applied that this adjudication should be annulled as being made without notice and during his absence. This application was dismissed by the registrar, and on appeal to the Divisional Court it was again dismissed, mainly because of the delay in making the application.

The debtor appealed, leave having been given by the Court of Appeal.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—After the delay which has taken place the application is hopeless, and the appeal must be dismissed. But as regards the practice under section 20 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, whether notice should or should not be given to the debtor of the intention to apply for an adjudication of bankruptcy against him, I wish to say I have no doubt that under that section the court has jurisdiction in a proper case to make an adjudication without any notice to the debtor. But although I feel no doubt as to the jurisdiction, I have equally no doubt that the practice—which has been adopted in the High Court since 1885 under the direction given by Cave, J.—of giving notice to the debtor in such cases is the most convenient practice to adopt. I agree with what counsel for the debtor said as to the effect of an adjudication of bankruptcy in altering the status of the debtor. Therefore, although I think the court has the jurisdiction under section 20 to make an adjudication without notice to the debtor, I think it is the most convenient practice that as a general rule notice should be given. I doubt whether the direction given by Cave, J., governs the practice of the county courts; but I think that generally speaking, unless there is some reason to the contrary, the most convenient practice is that which has been adopted in the High Court, and no doubt it will in future be adopted in the county courts. The Divisional Court decided the present case simply on the ground that the delay of three months was fatal to the bankrupt's application. I agree in that view.

An action in rem was brought in the Admiralty Division to recover remuneration for salvage services rendered by the plaintiffs' vessel to the defendants' vessel when the latter took the ground in crossing the bar of a river. The defendants, besides denying that any salvage services had been rendered, counterclaimed in personam against the plaintiffs, who were foreigners resident abroad, as charterers of their vessel, for damages for breach of charter-party in delay in loading the defendants' vessel, whereby she was too late in crossing the bar. The judge having refused to strike out the counterclaim, Held, that the judge of the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to try the counterclaim, and that he had rightly exercised his discretion in refusing to strike it out.

Appeal from an order of Barnes, J., reversing an order of the registrar of the Admiralty Division.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners, masters, and crew of the steamship Oscar Dickson, brought an action in rem against the owners of the steamship Cheapside and her freight to recover remuneration for salvage services alleged to have been rendered to her in the River Petschora, in Northern Russia, when loaded with a cargo of wood for London. The owners of The Oscar Dickson were foreigners resident out of the jurisdiction.

The plaintiffs alleged in their statement of claim that while their vessel was piloting The Cheapside down the river, owing to the accumulation of ice many of the beacons which marked the fairway across the bar had been knocked down and covered with ice, thus rendering navigation difficult, and The Cheapside took the ground and The Oscar Dickson towed her off.

The defendants, in their defence, denied that any salvage services had been rendered, and they counterclaimed in personam against the owners of The Oscar Dickson as charterers of The Cheapside for this particular voyage for damages for breach of the charter-party in delaying to load the vessel, in consequence of which she was late in attempting to cross the bar.

The plaintiffs applied to strike out the counterclaim upon the grounds—(1) that the Admiralty Division had no jurisdiction to entertain such a claim; and (2) that, if there was jurisdiction, it would embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action, within ord. 19, r. 27, if the counterclaim were tried with the claim. The registrar was of opinion that the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to try the counterclaim, but that it would embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action, and he accordingly struck it out.

Barnes, J., held that the Admiralty Division had jurisdiction to try the counterclaim, and that to try it in the same action with the claim would not embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action. He accordingly reversed the order of the registrar and allowed the counterclaim to stand.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Dawson Miller, for the plaintiffs.—The old Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action in personam by charterers against shipowners to recover damages for breach of a charter-party. That still applies. A counterclaim is only a cross-action, and therefore there is no jurisdiction to try the counterclaim. To do so would be to turn an action in rem into an action in personam. [He referred to Griendthoven v. Hamlyn & Co., 8 Times L. R. 231; The Bowesfield, 5 Asp. Mar. Cas. N. S. 265.] Secondly, if there is jurisdiction, the counterclaim ought not to be tried in the same action. The claim would have to be tried with Trinity Masters, whereas the defendants would be entitled to have the counterclaim tried with a jury: see ord. 36, r. 6; The Germanic, 44 W. R. 394, [1896] P. 84. The defence to the salvage claim is delay in loading, which prevented the ship going down the river until the ice formed, and thus caused her to go aground. That is also the foundation of the claim for breach of charter-party. There might thus be two inconsistent decisions in one action upon the same facts. This would tend to embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action.

D. Stephens, for the defendants.—The judge of the Admiralty Division, being a judge of the High Court, has power to try the counterclaim: sections 16 and 24, sub-section 3, of the Judicature Act, 1873. Nor will the trial of the counterclaim embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action. The plaintiffs have no right to have the claim tried with nautical assessors. In salvage and collision cases the judge has a discretion to allow a jury. The difficulties of navigation which were the cause of the salvage services arose from the delay in loading the ship—that is, arose from a breach of the charter-party. The facts, therefore, are the same both on the claim and on the counterclaim. The only difficulty the learned judge felt was whether, as the plaintiffs, who were foreigners resident abroad, could not have been served with a writ or notice of a writ, they could be sued by way of counterclaim. That difficulty was removed by the case of Griendthoven v. Hamlyn & Co.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from Barnes, J., refusing to strike out a counterclaim. The action is brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Oscar Dickson, the owners being foreigners resident out of the jurisdiction. The defendants, the owners of The Cheapside, put in a defence to the claim, and also counterclaimed against the owners of The Oscar Dickson, as charterers, for damages for delay in loading the defendants' vessel. That cross-claim was a claim in personam and not in rem. The plaintiffs apply to have the counterclaim struck out, and they do so upon two grounds. In the first place they say that the Admiralty Division has no jurisdiction to entertain such a claim. But the judge of the Admiralty Division is a judge of the High Court, and as such he has all the jurisdiction of a judge of the High Court, and has therefore jurisdiction to try the counterclaim. Whether he will exercise that jurisdiction is a matter within his discretion, subject to an appeal to this court. This brings me to the second ground—namely, that to try the counterclaim will embarrass or delay the fair trial of the action. In the present case a judge of great experience has come to the conclusion that he would be enabled to do full justice if he tried the claim and counterclaim in the same action, seeing that the plaintiffs are foreigners resident out of the jurisdiction and that there would thus be a difficulty in serving them with a writ or notice of a writ in an action. The defendants desire to avail themselves, as they are entitled to do, of the fact that the plaintiffs have brought the action here, and the learned judge, founding himself upon the case of Griendthoven v. Hamlyn & Co., and upon the reasoning so cogently expressed by Lord Coleridge in that case, came to the conclusion that he would be justified in exercising his discretion in allowing the counterclaim to be tried in the action. In the present case there is no such difficulty as there was in The Germanic, which was an action in rem for damages by collision, because in that case, if the plaintiffs had been allowed to add the pilot as a defendant and proceed against him in personam, the question of contributory negligence would have arisen and a different rule of damage would have to be applied as against the ship and as against the pilot, the Admiralty and common law standards being different.

There was also the complication of a jury in the case of the pilot and the ordinary method of trial in the Admiralty Division in the case of the ship. In the present case there is no such complication. There is no question of negligence or contributory negligence. So also as to a jury. The defendants may apply that the counterclaim be tried with a jury, and if the judge thinks that a judge and jury are the proper tribunal to try it, he has a discretion, if he chooses to exercise it, to try the whole case with a jury. The elements of difficulty which were present in The Germanic do not exist in the present case. The learned judge has exercised a sound discretion, and the appeal must be dismissed.

In re POOLE AND CLARKE'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Purchase of freeholds subject to restrictive covenants — Covenants for indemnity by purchaser.

On a purchase of freehold land subject to restrictive covenants, the vendor having covenanted with his vendor to perform and observe those covenants and to indemnify his vendor, the purchaser ought to enter into a similar covenant with his vendor, but the covenant should be prefaced with the words, "with the object and intention of affording to the vendor, his heirs, executors, and administrators, a full and sufficient indemnity in respect of the restrictive covenants, but not further or otherwise."

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J.

By an agreement dated the 16th of May, 1903, and made between C. E. Poole of the one part and E. Clarke of the other part, it was agreed that Poole should sell and Clarke should purchase the hereditaments described in the schedules thereto and the inheritance thereof in fee simple "subject respectively to the restrictive covenants and conditions contained in the indentures of conveyance respectively referred to in the first schedule hereto" at the price of £975. The second schedule comprised a piece of land at Woodside, Croydon, "subject nevertheless to the restrictive covenants and conditions contained" in an indenture of the 31st of August, 1887. The present summons was taken out by the purchaser to determine whether he was bound to enter into any covenant with the vendor with reference to the restrictive covenants contained in the said indenture of the 31st of August, 1887.

The purchaser maintained that the property should be conveyed to him subject to the restrictive covenants, but that he was not bound to enter into any covenant with the vendor with reference thereto.

The vendor insisted that the purchaser should covenant with him to observe and perform the restrictive covenants and conditions, so far as they related to the premises conveyed to the purchaser, and to indemnify the vendor, his estate and effects therefrom.

Kekewich, J., declared that the vendor was not entitled to have inserted in the conveyance a covenant by the purchaser that he would perform and observe the stipulations in question, but that the vendor was entitled to have inserted in the conveyance a covenant that the purchaser would indemnify the vendor, his estate and effects, from liability in respect of these stipulations.

The vendor appealed.

Micklem, K.C., and Ashton Cross.—The vendor is entitled to a complete indemnity, and this can only be obtained by the purchaser entering into a covenant to perform and observe the original covenants and to indemnify the vendor therefrom. It has been the universal practice of conveyancers to insert a covenant in this form. [They cited Staines v. Morris, 1 V. & B. 8; Moxhay v. Inderwick, 1 De G. & Sm. 708; Lukey v. Higgs, 3 W. R. 306, 24 L.J. Ch. 495.] [ROMER, L.J.—Would you object to prefacing the covenant to observe and perform the restrictive covenants and to indemnify the vendor with the words "with the object and intention of affording to [the vendor] his heirs, executors, and administrators, a full sufficient indemnity in respect of [the restrictive covenants] but not further or otherwise"?] The vendor would not object to that.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and S. P. Butler, for the plaintiff.—The purchaser will accept the covenant with that preface. [ROMER, L.J.—I think the covenant with this preface will sufficiently protect the vendor, and he will not be able to obtain an injunction to restrain a breach of covenant in any case in which the original covenantee does not complain.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think there ought to be no costs on either side in either court. I wish to add that the practice of conveyancers with regard to the covenant to be entered into by an assignee of leaseholds must stand unaltered, and there is nothing in our judgment which would render it necessary to introduce into the covenant any other words, but, in my opinion, even in that case the covenant ought to receive the same construction as if it had been prefaced with the words which we have suggested in the present case.

A statement by a debtor that he is unable to pay his debts in full is not an act of bankruptcy, unless it amounts to a statement that he intends to deal with his creditors as a body. Permission given by a debtor to each of his Stock Exchange creditors individually to close his account at once does not amount to such a statement.

Decision of Wright, J. (52 W. R. 302), reversed.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A covenant by a husband in a settlement, made in consideration of marriage, to settle all his after-acquired property except business assets is not fraudulent and void as against creditors under 13 Eliz. c. 5, nor is it too vague and uncertain to be enforced. Such a covenant, for a breach of which specific performance would be an appropriate remedy, is not barred on the covenantor obtaining his discharge from bankruptcy.

An assignment of personal chattels in pursuance of such a covenant, is a marriage settlement within the exception contained in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and does not require registration as a bill of sale.

This was an appeal against the decision of Wright, J. (reported 52 W. R. 302).

By an indenture of settlement dated the 9th of September, 1879, executed upon and in consideration of the marriage of the debtor, "a banker and bullion merchant," with his wife, the debtor settled certain property on his wife and children, and the debtor thereby covenanted to convey to the trustees all his after-acquired real and personal property, except business assets, to be held by the trustees upon trusts in favour of his wife and the children of the marriage.

The debtor was adjudicated bankrupt on the 6th of September, 1880, and obtained his discharge on the 22nd of October, 1882. The trustees of the settlement lodged no proof under this bankruptcy in respect of the covenant contained in the settlement.

In 1894 the debtor engaged in the business of an outside stockbroker, and by 1901 his profits exceeded £50,000, and he then invested some £17,000 in purchasing and furnishing a freehold house, in which he resided with his wife and family. In April and May, 1903, he got into monetary difficulties, and on the 26th of May it was alleged that he committed an act of bankruptcy by giving notice to his creditors of suspension of payment under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4 (h).

The 29th of May, 1903, was pay day on the Stock Exchange, and on the 26th of May the debtor's solicitor saw two of his largest Stock Exchange creditors, Messrs. Lumsden and Hart, and by the debtor's authority informed them that the debtor would have difficulties in meeting his liabilities on pay day, and that they were at liberty if they thought fit to close his accounts. They agreed to avail themselves of this permission, but one of them said that if there were any other Stock Exchange creditors they ought to have the same liberty, and this suggestion was carried out, a like permission being given to the other Stock Exchange creditors. There were other creditors of the debtor besides his Stock Exchange creditors to whom no reference was made and no communication given. Each broker acted for himself in closing the debtor's accounts, and each brought an action against him and recovered judgment for the amount due to him.

On the 10th of June, 1903, in pursuance of a written notice served on him by the trustees on the 23rd of May, the debtor executed two deeds respectively conveying the house and assigning the furniture to the trustees of the settlement, the assignment of the furniture not being registered under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. On the 22nd of June, 1903, a judgment was recovered against him in an action by one of his Stock Exchange creditors commenced on the 29th of May. On the 14th of July a receiving order was made against him, the act of bankruptcy being non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice founded on the judgment, and on the 23rd of July he was adjudicated bankrupt.

The trustee in the present bankruptcy claimed the house and furniture on various grounds, of which Wright, J., only considered one, since he held that an act of bankruptcy had been committed by the bankrupt on the 26th of May, and that he became bankrupt within the meaning of section 47, sub-section 2, on that day, and that therefore the two deeds of the 10th of June were void as against the trustee in bankruptcy under that section; and on this view it became unnecessary for him to go into the other points.

The bankrupt appealed.

The following provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, were referred to in the arguments and judgments of the Court of Appeal:

The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4, sub-section 1: "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy . . . (h) if the debtor gives notice to any of his creditors that he has suspended, or that he is about to suspend, payment of his debts."

Section 43: "The bankruptcy of a debtor . . . shall be deemed to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the act of bankruptcy being committed on which a receiving order is made against him, or if the bankrupt is proved to have committed more acts of bankruptcy than one, to have relation back to, and to commence at, the time of the first of the acts of bankruptcy proved to have been committed by the bankrupt within three months next preceding the date of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition."

Section 44 describes the property of the bankrupt divisible amongst his creditors.

Section 45, sub-section 1, restricts the right of an execution creditor, "unless he has completed the execution or attachment before the date of the receiving order, and before notice of the presentation of any bankruptcy petition by or against the debtor, or of the commission of any available act of bankruptcy by the debtor."

Section 46 deals with the duties of the sheriff as to goods taken in execution.

Section 47, sub-section 1: "Any settlement of property not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof." Sub-section 2: "Any covenant or contract made in consideration of marriage, for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or children of any money or property wherein he had not at the date of his marriage any estate or interest, whether vested or contingent in possession or remainder, and not being property or money of or in right of his wife, shall, on his becoming bankrupt before the money or property has been actually transferred or paid pursuant to the contract or covenant, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy."

Section 48 avoids certain preferential conveyances, transfers, charges, payments, obligations, and proceedings if the person is adjudged bankrupt on a bankruptcy petition presented within three months after the date thereof.

Section 49: "Subject to the foregoing provisions of this Act with respect to the effect of bankruptcy on an execution or attachment and with respect to the avoidance of certain settlements and preferences, nothing in this Act shall invalidate in the case of a bankruptcy—(a) any payment by the bankrupt to any of his creditors; (b) any payment or delivery to the bankrupt; (c) any conveyance or assignment by the bankrupt for valuable consideration; (d) any contract, dealing, or transaction by or with the bankrupt for valuable consideration."

Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 12: "Where a debtor shall be adjudicated a bankrupt, no creditor to whom the bankrupt is indebted in respect of any debt provable in the bankruptcy shall have any remedy against the property or person of the bankrupt in respect of such debt except in manner directed by this Act. . . ."

Section 31: "Demands in the nature of unliquidated damages arising otherwise than by reason of a contract or promise shall not be provable in bankruptcy, and no person having notice of any act of bankruptcy available for adjudication against the bankrupt shall prove for any debt or liability contracted by the bankrupt subsequently to the date of his so having notice. Save as aforesaid, all debts and liabilities, present or future, certain or contingent, to which the bankrupt is subject at the date of the order of adjudication, or to which he may become subject during the continuance of the bankruptcy by reason of any obligation incurred previously to the date of the order of adjudication, shall be deemed to be debts provable in bankruptcy, and may be proved in the prescribed manner before the trustee in the bankruptcy. . . . 'Liability' shall, for the purposes of this Act, include any compensation for work or labour done, any obligation or possibility of an obligation to pay money or money's worth on the breach of any express or implied covenant, contract, agreement, or undertaking, whether such breach does or does not occur, or is or is not likely to occur or capable of occurring before the close of the bankruptcy, and generally it shall include any express or implied engagement, agreement, or undertaking, to pay, or capable of resulting in the payment of money or money's worth, whether such payment be as respects amount fixed or unliquidated; as respects time present or future, certain, or dependent on any one contingency or on two or more contingencies; as to mode of valuation capable of being ascertained by fixed rules, or assessable only by a jury, or as a matter of opinion."

Section 49: "An order of discharge shall not release the bankrupt from any debt or liability incurred by means of any fraud or breach of trust, nor from any debt or liability whereof he has obtained forbearance by any fraud, but it shall release the bankrupt from all other debts provable under the bankruptcy," with certain exceptions in favour of the Crown and public revenue.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 17.—The judgments of the court were delivered in the following order:

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the order of Wright, J., declaring certain deeds executed by the bankrupt in June, 1903, pursuant to a covenant contained in his marriage settlement of 1879, void under section 47, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as against the trustee, on the ground that he had "become bankrupt"—that is, had committed an act of bankruptcy—on the 26th of May. The act of bankruptcy relied on was that Mr. Reis on that day gave notice to his Stock Exchange creditors that he had suspended, or that he was about to suspend, payment of his debts: see section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Now the meaning of that sub-section has been fully explained by Vaughan Williams, L.J., in two cases: In re Scott, Ex parte Scott, and Hill's Trustee v. Rowlands. The result of the authorities is that a statement by a debtor that he is unable to pay his debts in full is not by itself an act of bankruptcy, although it may be such if it amounts to a statement that he intends to deal with his creditors in a body.

The transaction of the 26th of May does not, in my opinion, fall within this category. Mr. Reis and his solicitor gave each of his Stock Exchange creditors individually permission at once to close his account, which they could not have done without such permission. Each broker acted for himself; each brought an action for the balance due. I cannot regard this as falling within the sub-section. This was the only point on which Wright, J., gave a decision, although various other points were argued before him upon which it was not necessary for him to express an opinion. But, as we are differing from the learned judge, the respondents have relied before us upon other grounds.

It is urged that the covenant by the husband in the marriage settlement of 1879 was first void under the statute of Elizabeth against creditors—13 Eliz. c. 5; secondly, that it was so vague and general that the court ought to decline to grant specific performance of it; and thirdly, that it was released by the bankruptcy of the husband in 1880, with the result that the deeds of the 10th of June, 1903, were voluntary, and therefore void under section 47, sub-section 1, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

In order to succeed upon the first contention—that is, that the deeds were void under the 13 Eliz. c. 5 against creditors—it is necessary to show that the wife was party or privy to the fraud. Of this there is, and can be, no direct evidence. But it is urged that the deed itself to which she was a party is of such nature that it cannot be deemed other than a fraudulent deed. The decision of Chief Judge Bacon in In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, undoubtedly supports this view. But in my opinion that decision is inconsistent with a line of authorities of which Hardey v. Green need alone be referred to. The judgment of Lord Langdale in that case seems to me to establish that such a covenant is not on the face of it fraudulent. Then as to the next point, that the covenant is so vague and general that the court ought to decline to grant specific performance of it, I think the husband's covenant is not too vague and general to be enforced. Lord Eldon in Lewis v. Maddocks held that such a covenant on construction must attach to and affect capital only, and not income, unless "laid up as capital," and that the court ought to give effect to the covenant. Hardey v. Green is to the same effect. As to the third point, that the covenant was released by the bankruptcy of the husband in 1880 with the result that the deeds of June, 1903, were voluntary, and therefore void under section 47, sub-section 1, I think this objection cannot prevail. When once it has been decided that the covenant is one of which specific performance can be obtained, it follows that the right to specific performance is not barred by the bankruptcy. The covenant was not ancillary to a debt which was released by the bankruptcy, and there is no evidence of any breach of the covenant before the bankruptcy was closed. There is nothing in Hardy v. Fothergill which justifies the respondent's contention upon this point. Lastly, an objection was taken to the assignment of the furniture on the ground that the deed was not registered as a bill of sale, and that the furniture remained in the apparent ownership of the bankrupt. The only act of bankruptcy which can be relied on was on the 29th of of June, and that is the date to which the title of the trustee relates. Now, a marriage settlement is not a bill of sale within the definition of the Bills of Sale Acts, and it is urged by counsel for the appellants that the furniture was bound in equity by the covenant in the marriage settlement of 1879, which did not require registration, and that the deed of the 10th of June was only for the purpose of completing the legal title by means of an actual transfer of the property. There has not been any transfer of the furniture by delivery to the trustees. They must rely upon the deed of the 10th of June, 1903, as transferring the property to them. The question arises whether that deed is a "marriage settlement" within the exception in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, or is an absolute assignment of personal chattels within the meaning of section 8 of that Act, which cannot be the foundation of a title as against the trustee in bankruptcy. Now, the deed of the 10th of June may, I think, be fairly regarded as forming part of the marriage settlement. It was executed in pursuance of a covenant in the deed of 1879, and was in the nature of a further assurance. A post-nuptial settlement executed in pursuance of an ante-nuptial deed falls within the term "marriage settlement" in the Bills of Sale Act. This is the conclusion at which I should have arrived apart from authority, and it accords with the view taken by the Court of Appeal in the case of Courcier v. Bardili, a note of which is found in the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL for 1883, but which is not fully reported anywhere else.

The result is that, in my opinion, the appellant succeeds both as to the leasehold house and as to the chattels.

STIRLING, L.J.—The first question to be considered in this case is whether Mr. Reis committed an act of bankruptcy on the 26th of May, 1903. Wright, J., finds that he did, the act being that he gave notice to his creditors, or some of them, that he was about to suspend payment of his debts, that being an act of bankruptcy under section 4, sub-section 1 (h), of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. It is my misfortune to differ from the conclusion at which Wright, J., arrived, and in that respect I only differ from him on the question of fact which he decided, and I do not quarrel with any of the law which he laid down in his judgment. In considering the meaning of the sub-section with which we have to deal particularly, it has to be borne in mind that by sub-section (f) it is an act of bankruptcy if there is filed in the court a declaration of inability on the part of the debtor to pay his debts. These two sections were much considered in the House of Lords in the case of Crook v. Morley, where Lord Selborne, in advising the House, says: "It is undoubtedly possible, that there might be a document speaking of inability to pay a man's debts in such a context and in such a manner as not to imply 'that he had suspended, or that he was about to suspend payment of his debts.' But on the other hand there might be a document of which the language might amount to 'a declaration of his inability to pay his debts,' which, taking it with all its circumstances and in its context, would practically and according to the common sense of mankind, be a 'notice to his creditors that he had suspended, or was about to suspend payment of his debts.'" In the same case Lord Watson says: "A declaration of his inability to pay his debts may be made by a debtor to one or more of his creditors, in terms and under circumstances which do not suggest that he means to stop payment of his debts as they fall due. But that such a declaration may be couched in language which clearly implies that the debtor means to pay nobody in full, and to place his assets at the disposal of his creditors, does not appear to me to be doubtful." The result is that in each case all the circumstances must be looked at; and we have to find, beyond a simple declaration of inability to pay, some evidence of an intention on the part of the debtor to suspend payment of his debts—that is to say, to abstain from paying his debts as they fall due at least for a time. Now, in the present case Mr. Reis was an outside broker who found himself in difficulties as to the settlement which was to take place on the Stock Exchange at the end of May, 1903. He consulted a solicitor, and that solicitor, by his instructions, saw two of the largest Stock Exchange creditors, Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Hart, on the 25th of May. This was the day on which at midday the amount which would have to be paid by Mr. Reis at the settlement would be ascertained. But that amount would not be actually payable till the 29th of May. The solicitor informed these two Stock Exchange creditors that Mr. Reis would have difficulty in paying them, they being large creditors, on the 29th of May. He informed them that he had Mr. Reis's authority to give power, if they saw fit, to close the accounts between them and Mr. Reis before the 29th of May, a step which might be for the benefit of the Stock Exchange creditors, and which he was willing they should take if they saw fit so to do. They agreed to avail themselves of this permission, but one of them said to the solicitor that if there were any other Stock Exchange creditors they ought to have the same liberty. Thereupon the solicitor undertook to communicate a like liberty to the other creditors, who were not creditors to nearly the same extent as the two with whom he was dealing, and he did in point of fact communicate with them they were at liberty to close their accounts in the same way as Mr. Lumsden and Mr. Hart. Besides those Stock Exchange creditors there were others—two at least, one of considerable importance—namely, Mr, Reis's bankers—and no reference was made as to any dealing with them whatever. In these circumstances I am unable to agree with Wright, J., that the debtor did give notice to any of his creditors that he had suspended or was about to suspend payment of his debts. Certainly he did nothing which would indicate an intention on his part to place his assets entirely at the disposal of his creditors or to preclude himself from dealing as he might think fit with others, with whom no communication appears to have been made, nor I think with the Stock Exchange creditors, Lumsden and Hart. For these reasons I am unable to agree with the conclusion of fact at which Wright, J., arrived.

The next point which I have to consider is this: whether Mr. Reis was released from the covenant in his marriage settlement by the previous bankruptcy. The marriage settlement was executed on the 9th of September, 1879. Mr. Reis became bankrupt in 1880, and he received his discharge in 1882. At that time, so far as appeared, Mr. Reis had not acquired any property within the covenant in the marriage settlement; there was no proof by the trustees of the settlement in the bankruptcy. But it is said that the liability of Mr. Reis under the covenant was provable in the bankruptcy, and consequently that the bankrupt was released from it by the order of discharge. At the time in question the Bankruptcy Act in force was that of 1869, the material sections of which are sections 12, 31, and 49. The material provisions of these sections were incorporated in the present Act of 1883. Now those sections were considered in two cases—namely, Collyer v. Isaacs, by the Court of Appeal, and the case of Hardy v. Fothergill in the House of Lords. In Collyer v. Isaacs the case to be considered was one in which there was given as the security for the debt an assignment of future chattels. The debtor became bankrupt, and after the bankruptcy and the order of discharge he acquired chattels which answered the description in the security—but the creditor did not prove his debt in the bankruptcy—and it was held that the security so far as affected his future chattels was discharged by the bankruptcy. It is obvious that the case there was entirely different from the present case, in which we have to deal with a covenant in a marriage settlement for the settlement of after-acquired property. The Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel), in giving his judgment in that case, carefully guards himself against saying that what was decided in that case would apply to the case of a marriage settlement containing a covenant to settle after-acquired property, saying that when you have a debt and a covenant to secure that debt in a particular way it would be a strange result if it barred the debt and not the ancillary covenant. In the case of Hardy v. Fothergill the question again was of an entirely different nature, the question relating to the liability of the assignee of a lease for a term of years who had covenanted to indemnify the lessees against damages for breach of their covenants. In that case it was held that the claim of the lessee was barred under section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the effect of section 31 being to make the assignee's future and contingent liability on his covenant to indemnify a debt provable in the bankruptcy unless an order of court declared it to be a liability incapable of being fairly estimated. In advising the House of Lords Lord Selborne says this: "There may be contracts—such for example, as a promise to marry (not broken), or a covenant not to molest, or not to carry on a particular trade within certain limits, &c.—which on a fair interpretation of these words ought to be excluded as having a different object from the payment of money in any contingency; although if they were broken a jury might award damages for their breach. I must guard myself against being supposed to lay down any rule applicable to cases of that kind, or to any others in which an injunction for specific performance would be the most proper remedy." These observations of Sir G. Jessel and of Lord Selborne of course do not amount to decisions, but I think they afford guidance in the decision of the present case. In my judgment, the covenant in the present case is one in which specific performance is the appropriate remedy, and it ought not to be held barred by the order of discharge in the first bankruptcy.

The next point to be considered is whether the covenant is too vague or too wide to be capable of specific performance in a court of equity. On this we have the guidance, as it appears to me, of clear authority. In the case of Lewis v. Maddocks there was a covenant in a marriage settlement on the part of a husband that he would "by deed or will convey, give, devise, and assure, all and singular his ready money, goods, chattels, personal estate and effects, to and for the use and behoof of him the said Richard Maddocks, and Ann, his said intended wife, and the survivor of them for ever," upon certain trusts. Lord Eldon decreed specific performance of that contract after the death of the husband. The form of judgment is stated at the end of the report, and it began with a declaration that the personal estate of which the husband was possessed during the coverture was liable under the contract. In a subsequent case, Hardey v. Green, Lord Langdale held that property coming to a husband after marriage was bound by a stipulation contained in articles executed previous to the marriage "by which the husband and wife agreed that all property, estate and effects, to which the husband or wife might thereafter become entitled, should be settled to such use as the wife should appoint, and in default on trusts for the husband, wife, and children." The decree gave specific performance of the stipulation in the articles. These cases have never been overruled, and they form strong authority in favour of the proposition that the language of the covenant with which we have to deal in the present case is not too vague to be binding. If anything more is required, I should desire to refer to the judgment of Bowen, L.J., in In re Clarke, Coombe v. Carter, and the observations of Lord Macnaghten on that case in Tailby v. Official Receiver.

But a further objection was made that the covenant was so wide that it would be wrong of the court to enforce it, on the ground that if fully carried into effect it would prevent the husband from paying his debts and deprive him of the means of subsistence. In that the observations of Cotton, L.J., in the case of In re Clarke, Coombe v. Carter and In re Turcan were referred to. Now, to this objection there appear to me two answers—first, from the covenant in the marriage settlement in the present case the business assets of the husband are expressly excepted, and that appears to me to constitute a substantial exception. Secondly, if there were no such exception, it would still seem to me that the same case of Lewis v. Maddocks, at a subsequent stage, is an authority for holding that a covenant is not to be construed so as to prevent the husband from paying his debts and maintaining his family. Lewis v. Maddocks came on for further consideration, and in the course of the argument Lord Eldon said "he could not adopt the construction, that annual produce, for instance, dividends of stock, was property acquired during the coverture in the sense of this bond, except only to the extent in which the husband himself might think proper to lay up that produce as capital; otherwise they would not be at liberty to spend a shilling; but in providing for their maintenance and comfort they could not go beyond income." For these reasons I think that effect ought not to be given to this objection.

Next it was urged that the covenant was void under the statute of Elizabeth. As a general rule a marriage settlement cannot be set aside as a fraud on creditors of the husband unless evidence is given that the wife was party to the fraud: see Kevan v. Crawford. No such evidence was adduced in the present case. It was said, however, that the wife must be taken to have known the terms of the settlement, and those terms were on the face of them, in the language of the Lord Justice in In re MacBurnie, Ex parte MacBurnie's Trustees, grossly out of proportion to the station and circumstances of the husband, or so extravagant as that they ought to awaken inquiry. I am unable to come to that conclusion. On this point of the case Hardey v. Green, already referred to, is a direct authority. The case of In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, which was much relied upon on behalf of the creditors, if rightly decided, is distinguishable, for there the covenant extended to all after-acquired property—property of the husband; while here, as I have already pointed out, the business assets constitute an exception.

Last of all it was urged that there had been no actual transfer pursuant to the contract before the commencement of the bankruptcy under section 47, sub-section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. In the present case the bankrupt, in pursuance of the written notice served on him on the 23rd of May, 1903, by the trustees of the settlement executed on the 10th of June, 1903, before the commencement of the bankruptcy, two deeds, by one of which the house was conveyed to the trustees, and by the other of which the furniture in that house was assigned to them—in both cases upon the trusts of the settlement. No question was raised as to the conveyance of the house being an actual transfer sufficient to prevent the operation of section 47, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1883. But it is contended that the assignment of the furniture is a bill of sale within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and is void against the trustee in bankruptcy under section 8 by reason of its not having been registered in accordance with section 10 of the Act of 1878. To this it is answered that by section 4 of the Act of 1878 marriage settlements are excepted from the operation of the Bills of Sale Act, and that the assignment of the 10th of June, 1903, is a marriage settlement within the meaning of the exception. I think that this is a valid answer to the objection. Unquestionably a wide meaning has been given to the expression "marriage settlement" in these Acts. Thus it was held in Wenman v. Lyon by the Divisional Court and by the Court of Appeal that an agreement for a marriage settlement which provided for the execution by a subsequent assignment to trustees of certain property of the intended husband was such a marriage settlement, and was effectual to protect the property against the trustee in the husband's bankruptcy, although the agreement was not registered and no assignment to the trustees was ever executed. In Courcier v. Bardili, which appears to be only reported in the SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, it was also held by the Divisional Court and by the Court of Appeal that a post-nuptial settlement in pursuance of an ante-nuptial settlement was within the exception of the enactment of 1878, and did not require registration. In my opinion the principle of these decisions applies. The assignment of the 10th of June, 1903, was a marriage settlement within the exception in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and did not require registration, and the objection founded upon the point of registration appears to me to fail. I think, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I have had the advantage not only of reading the judgment of Cozens-Hardy, L.J., but of having communicated to me the views of Stirling, L.J., in this case; and that being so, I did not consider that I should be doing any good service to the law in merely multiplying judgments which were intended to say the same thing as other judgments had already said. I feel that the judgments of Cozens-Hardy and Stirling, L.JJ., have covered the whole ground, and I therefore propose to say very little. First, I propose to say, out of respect for Wright, J., that I entirely agree in the view of Stirling, L.J., that there is nothing in our judgment to-day which interferes with any proposition of law which was laid down by Wright, J. All that we are doing to-day in differing from Wright, J., is as to a conclusion in fact. Wright, J., came to the conclusion that the solicitor who was acting on behalf of the bankrupt, Mr. Reis, was making a communication which was intended as a communication having reference to all his creditors—a communication that he intended to suspend payment—a communication of such a character that if he had made that statement the bankrupt would have been guilty of a breach of faith if he had, after making that statement, made any arrangement with any particular creditor for the discharge of his debt. I have come to a different conclusion in fact. I have come to the conclusion that all that the solicitor was doing on behalf of the bankrupt when he made the communication to Messrs. Lumsden and Hart was to negotiate with particular creditors as regards their particular debts. He agreed that they should be entitled to do that which they could not have done without his consent—that is, to close the accounts. Upon that point I have no more to say.

I do propose to say a few words as to two of the many points which were raised in this case; but before I do so I should like to say at once a word in respect of the case of In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland. I do not know really that I have anything to add to what Stirling, L.J., has said about it. This case of In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, I can say of my own personal knowledge and experience as a bankruptcy judge is a case which has been frequently dealt with. I think that hereafter that case of In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, ought not to be treated as a standing authority. I am quite well aware that there is a distinction in the fact that the property covered was much wider in the case of In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, than it is in the present case, and that one might decide the present case without impugning at all the authority of that case on the ground of these differences that have been referred to. But, speaking for myself, I prefer to say that I do not think that In re Clint, Ex parte Bolland, ought any longer to be regarded as a standing authority.

Having said that, there are two points upon which I mean to say a few words. First, the point as to the effect upon the marriage settlement of the prior bankruptcy; and secondly, the point of the necessity of registration of the formal instrument of assignment which followed the original marriage settlement. Now with regard to the first of these points, the facts are simply these—that Mr. Reis made a marriage settlement in 1879—a marriage settlement as to which I may mention in passing that to my mind it is impossible with regard to that marriage settlement to suggest that the execution of it involved any participation by Mrs. Reis to defeat and delay creditors so as to bring the case within the operation of the statute of Elizabeth. That marriage settlement contained a covenant very wide in its terms with regard to the future property of the bankrupt, not comprising the whole of his future property, but future property, to put it shortly, to the exclusion of his business assets. Subsequently to 1879 Mr. Reis became bankrupt. The suggestion made is that the effect of that first bankruptcy was to relieve Mr. Reis, the bankrupt, for ever from the obligations in that marriage settlement under that covenant. Of course, if that were so the result would be that there would be no instrument in the field of operation under which it could be said that, as the husband from time to time acquired property other than his business assets, such property would in equity pass to the trustees of this marriage settlement. I really should not have mentioned this point at all, seeing that I entirely agree with the observations that have been made by my brethren about it, if it were not for the fact that this is a new point as to which there is no positive authority whatsoever. There is the passage in the judgment of Sir G. Jessel in Collyer v. Isaacs, to which Stirling, L.J., referred, and there is also the passage in the judgment of Lord Selborne in Hardy v. Fothergill. I do not propose to go into those two passages in detail—they have been read; it is sufficient to say of those passages that they certainly show that neither of those learned judges was then prepared to affirm the proposition that the bankruptcy and discharge of the husband after a marriage settlement like this would discharge him from all obligations under a marriage settlement. But I propose to read two or three words from the same passage to which Stirling, L.J., referred in the advice given by Lord Selborne to the House of Lords. After quoting the words of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, Lord Selborne proceeds: [His lordship here read the passage already referred to by Stirling, L.J., and continued:] It will be observed that among these contracts which Lord Selborne suggests might upon a fair reading of the construction of the definition which I have read from the Act of Parliament be excluded from it, there are not only negative covenants, but there is in one example certainly a positive covenant, as a promise to marry, not broken. In concurring as I do entirely with the judgments of my brethren on this point, I wish to say shortly that the ground upon which I concur is that in my judgment the marriage settlement does not fall within this definition of liability. It is a contract which has been made with a different object from that of the payment of money in any contingency. I wish to add by way of caution that no amount of difficulty in the estimate of the value would justify the exclusion in this court of a proof of debt, because in my judgment the plain words of the statute show that if once the debt or liability, as the case may be, is shown to come within the definition, the only court which can exclude that debt from the operation of bankruptcy and its consequent discharge in freeing the debtor is the court of banbruptcy, and the court of bankruptcy dealing with the particular bankruptcy which has occurred. Therefore in this case it would not make the very slightest difference that the debtor, Mr. Reis, was the same in the 1881 bankruptcy as he is in the later bankruptcy. This court would not have jurisdiction now to declare the value of the debt or liability incapable of estimate. The ground upon which I have come to the conclusion that this liability of the bankrupt under his marriage settlement is not discharged by the earlier bankruptcy is because in my judgment it does not fall within the definition of "liability" which I have read. As to this point I may say, in passing, that Wright, J., did not have to deal with any of these matters because, having arrived at the conclusion there was a prior act of bankruptcy, that was sufficient for the point he had to decide.

The only other matter to which I propose to refer at all is the necessity for the registration of the instrument which was executed in pursuance of the marriage settlement of 1879. The marriage settlement of 1879 contemplates that there may be executed from time to time by the husband a formal instrument assigning to the trustees of the marriage settlement the property in the goods—the subject-matter of it—as they came into existence. That being so in 1903, the year of his last bankruptcy, the trustees of the marriage settlement apparently became anxious in the matter, and they thought it desirable to get the debtor to execute certain instruments in the nature of assignments—which he did, and the date of those instruments is the 10th of June, 1903. The petition itself was based on a subsequent act of bankruptcy at the end of the same month. We have negatived the act of bankruptcy by the notice of intention to suspend, which was the key of the decision of Wright, J. It has been said that the rights of the trustees under this marriage settlement had been avoided, because the second of these two documents had not been registered, as it ought to have been under the Bills of Sale Act. I think that there is sufficient authority already for the proposition that such a document does not require registration. But as the point has not been raised in very clear form, I thought it better to write a word or two upon that which I will read.

The last point made on behalf of the respondent was that the goods and chattels, the subject of the settlement of 1879, were not the property of the trustees of the marriage settlement as against the trustee in bankruptcy, because the title of the trustees of the settlement depends upon the deed of transfer of the 10th of June, 1903, and that that deed is void as a bill of sale for want of registration, or is void as falling within the operation of sub-section 2 of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. I say at once, in passing, so as not to have to mention it again, no point really arises under sub-section 2 of section 47, because, inasmuch as under our decision the commencement of the bankruptcy is not until the end of the month of June, the terms of the section, however strictly construed, are fully complied with by the execution of the instruments of the 10th of June. I think that this point under the Bills of Sale Act fails. The question of the necessity for registration depends upon section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, which excepts a marriage settlement from the definition of bills of sale. By the very terms of that section the expression "bill of sale" includes not only assignments, but "also any agreement, whether intended or not to be followed by the execution of any other instrument, by which a right in equity to any personal chattels, or to any charge or security thereon, shall be conferred." It is plain, therefore, that the antenuptial document would have required registration but for the exception, and that notwithstanding that the document was intended to be followed by the execution of another instrument; but the exception exempts this document as being a marriage settlement from the necessity of being registered, and I think there is nothing in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, which takes away the equitable rights conferred by such a marriage agreement if in fact it is followed in pursuance of its terms by an assurance or transfer which is not registered.

The case of Wenman v. Lyon, decided by Pollock, B., and Charles, J., which was confirmed on appeal, makes it clear that the words "marriage settlement" include a memorandum of a marriage settlement which conveys equitable rights only, and would include marriage articles intended to be followed by a formal marriage settlement. It seems to me impossible that the non-registration of an instrument intended to give legal effect to a prior instrument, which had by virtue of the exception in favour of marriage settlements already created valid equitable rights, could avoid or extinguish those rights. A marriage contract might be so drawn that it would manifest an intention that no property should pass unless and until a further instrument of transfer was executed. Such a contract would create a power to seize something in the nature of a floating security, and would, I think, undoubtedly be a bill of sale, and I am inclined to think a marriage settlement, but I do not think that the present marriage contract is such an instrument. [His lordship read the words, and continued:] I do not think that, according to these words, the execution of a transfer or the taking possession by the trustees is a condition precedent to the passing of the property. This being so, it follows, in my judgment, that the bill of sale point fails. The settlement of 1879 did not require registration, and the equitable rights arising under that settlement, as the subject-matter of it from time to time has come into existence, are not avoided by the non-registration of the instruments of transfer of June, 1903.

The result of all this is that the appeal is allowed, with costs.

REYNOLDS v. ASHBY & SON. (a.)

Fixtures—Machinery affixed by bolts and screws—Hire-purchase agreement—Rights of mortgagee in possession.

The lessee of a factory mortgaged it, together with the fixtures, machinery, and fittings erected thereon. Shortly afterwards, under a hire-purchase agreement entered into by the mortgagor, certain machines were fastened by the mortgagor in the factory on concrete beds by means of upright bolts and screws, but so that they could be removed without injury to the freehold. The premises were taken possession of by the mortgagee, and the vendor of the machines claimed them under the terms of the hire-purchase agreement.

Held, that the machines were fixtures, and therefore the mortgagee was entitled to retain them.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C. (whose judgment was read by Lord Macnaghten).—I cannot say that I am satisfied with the mode in which this case has been disposed of. There are various modes by which things when they are trade fixtures can be protected from being absorbed by the owner of the freehold or by a mortgagee, and I should hesitate very much before I agreed that such fixtures as are in question here, and which could only be used when fixed, must necessarily belong to the freeholder or to the mortgagee. By an express or implied contract between the parties interested, machinery for the purpose of working in a factory might be protected, so that an unpaid vendor who has lent on the hire system machinery to a person who wanted to use it in his mill might make it safe from being absorbed either by creditor or landlord. There is nothing, however, here from which I can infer either an express or implied contract for the removal of these articles, which undoubtedly were fixed; and under these circumstances I do not dissent from the conclusion at which this House has arrived. I only desire to say that I agree to affirm this judgment upon the special facts which I find, and from the absence of any evidence which can alter the rule which has been so many times affirmed, and upon which the learned judge acted when the case was before him.

Lord MACNAGHTEN concurred.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—In this case the question for decision is whether certain machines employed for use in a factory have by virtue of their being fixed to the building become a portion of it, or whether they are chattels, and so to be regarded as movable property.

It appears that the plaintiffs sold certain machines to a person named Holdway on what is known as a hire-purchase agreement. The plaintiffs knew that the machines would be used under ordinary conditions in a factory then in course of erection. This factory belonged to Holdway, who executed three mortgages upon the land upon which the factory was being built, "together with the buildings, machinery, and fittings erected thereon." The defendants were the third mortgagees, but having paid off the two preceding mortgages they are now entitled to the land and building of the factory, the further question arising whether the machines have or have not become part of the mortgaged property. The purchaser Holdway, the mortgagor of the factory, did not fulfil his contract with the plaintiffs, so that the goods are unpaid for. On the other hand, it must be taken that the plaintiffs were aware that the machines would be used in a factory and would be affixed in the usual manner to the building. There is also nothing unusual in effecting a mortgage upon a factory (whatever that may include) in the terms I have mentioned. In consequence of Holdway's default the plaintiffs claimed the machines as their property. The defendants resisted the claim upon the ground that, the machines being affixed to the mortgaged building, the property in them passed under the mortgage deed. At the trial, which took place before Lawrance, J., and a jury, the learned judge held that as there were no facts in dispute there was no question for the jury, and the learned judge, following the decision in Hobson v. Gorringe, held that the contention of the defendants was correct, and directed a verdict for them. The Court of Appeal has confirmed this judgment.

In the first instance I was disposed to think that the question of chattel or fixture, being one of fact, ought necessarily to have been submitted to the jury; but apparently the course taken by the learned judge in treating the question as one of law, or as one of fact upon which the jury were bound to accept his directions and apply the law as declared by him, was correct, and certainly was acquiesced in by both parties to the suit.

The manner in which the machines were affixed to the buildings has been clearly brought to the notice of this House, and is clearly shown by some sketches set out in the case. This affixing of the machines is to obtain steadiness, and effects the usual condition under which such machines are used.

The authorities controlling the questions respecting the difference between fixtures and chattels are very numerous, and have arisen between different parties. The rights of landlord or tenant, of mortgagor or mortgagee, and liability to being rated, have all brought this question to a legal issue for the determination of our courts. I do not propose to review those authorities in detail, but having consulted and considered them I have come to the conclusion that the weight of authority is in favour of the view that these machines must be held to be affixed to the building so as to pass under the mortgage as being a portion of the factory. The cases supporting this view are very numerous, but the principal case now generally referred to is that of Hobson v. Gorringe, the authority which Lawrance, J., acted upon. Doubtless there are cases and dicta upon which the appellants are entitled to rely. Hellawell v. Eastwood, Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens, (1875) 32 L. T. 486, 23 W. R. Dig. 150, Tyne Boiler Works v. Longbenton Overseers, Wake v. Hall, and several other cases were relied upon at the bar to show that these machines should be regarded as chattels; but in none of these cases did the question arise between mortgagor and mortgagee, and in some of them the decisions are explained upon grounds other than those existing in the present case. In the same way Trappes v. Harter, (1833) 2 Cr. & M. 153, a case arising out of a mortgage, was decided principally upon a question of local custom; and in Lyon v. London, City, and Midland Bank the decision in favour of some chairs being chattels appears to have been correctly decided upon the special facts of that case.

It was argued at the bar that as Holdway had not paid for the machines they remained the property of the plaintiffs, and could not by any act of Holdway be dealt with as fixtures; but the argument cannot, I think, prevail. The machines were sold by the plaintiffs for the purpose of being used in the manner in which they were used. In order so to use them it was necessary that they should be fixed, and so become part of the building.

For these reasons I feel that, following a great preponderance of authority, the judgment of this House should be in favour of the respondents.

Lord LINDLEY.—This is an action brought to recover certain machines bought from the plaintiffs by one Holdway on what is called a hire-purchase agreement. Holdway did not pay the instalments of his purchase-money as they became due, and the machines therefore never became his property. The plaintiffs knew that the machines were wanted in order to fit up a factory which Holdway was building, and he put the machines into the factory on beds of concrete prepared for them. The machines were worked by steam power transmitted from a steam engine by shafts, wheels, and gearing in the usual way. Each machine was complete in itself. Each was fastened down to its concrete bed by bolts and nuts. The bolts were firmly fixed in the concrete, and passed through and projected beyond holes in the machine. The nuts were screwed on the ends of the bolts where they projected, and the machines were thus held fast. By unscrewing the nuts each machine, although heavy, could no doubt be raised up and removed without injury to the building containing it, and without injury to its concrete bed and to the bolts embedded in it.

Whilst the factory was being erected, but before any of the machines in question were put into it, Holdway mortgaged to Burrows the land on which the factory was being built, together with "the buildings, fixtures, machinery, and fittings erected thereon." Holdway afterwards executed a second mortgage to one Hatt, and at a later date he executed a third mortgage to the defendants. The machines in question were put into the factory soon after it was mortgaged to the defendants. After they had been fixed the second mortgagee took possession, and the defendants then paid off the two prior mortgages and took transfers of them. The mode in which the machines were fixed has been stated. The circumstances under which they were obtained and fixed by Holdway have also been stated. The purpose for which they were so obtained and fixed seems to be unmistakable: it was to complete and use the building as a factory. It is true that the machines could be removed if necessary, but the concrete beds and bolts prepared for them negative any idea of treating the machines when fixed as movable chattels.

The question is whether they passed by the mortgage. But for the fact that Holdway had not paid for them the question would not in my opinion be open to the slightest doubt. There is a long series of decisions of the highest authority showing conclusively that as between a mortgagor and a mortgagee machines fixed as these were to land mortgaged pass to the mortgagee as part of the land. The decisions in question begin with Walmsley v. Milne, and include Ex parte Barclay, Mather v. Fraser, Climie v. Wood, Longbottom v. Berry, Holland v. Hodgson, Gough v. Wood, and Hobson v. Gorringe. Others were referred to in the argument, but I need only mention Southport and West Lancashire Banking Co. v. Thompson, 36 W. R. 113, 37 Ch. D. 64, where it was held that whether the mortgagor is an owner in fee or is only a leaseholder (as in this case) is immaterial with reference to the question now under consideration. It is quite impossible to overrule these decisions.

It must be conceded that there are dicta in other cases, and even decisions, which show that for some purposes even machines more or less like these have been treated as chattels. There is Hellawell v. Eastwood, a case of distress which has been much commented on in later cases, and is of questionable authority; there are rating cases, such as Chidley v. West Ham Churchwardens and Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. Longbenton Overseers; there is the case of the miners' huts—Wake v. Hall—which arose between miners in the Peak district and landowners, and turned entirely on a local custom; there is the tapestry case—Leigh v. Taylor—which arose between a tenant for life and remainderman; there is Fisher v. Dixon, 12 Cl. & Fin. 312, which arose between the heir and the executors of the deceased owner of the land and the machinery fixed to it.

I do not profess to be able to reconcile all the cases on fixtures, still less all that has been said about them. In dealing with them attention must be paid not only to the nature of the thing and to the mode of attachment, but to the circumstances under which it was attached, the purpose to be served, and last, but not least, to the position of the rival claimants to the things in dispute. In this case, and still regarding the question for the present as concerning the mortgagor on the one side and the mortgagee on the other, it is in my opinion impossible to hold that the machines did not pass with the mortgage. The only authorities on mortgages which present any difficulty are Trappes v. Harter and the very recent case of Lyon & Co. v. London City and Midland Bank. Trappes v. Harter was a reputed ownership case, and turned on the facts stated in a special case. The court there held that some trade fixtures did not pass by a mortgage of the property to which they were attached. The special case, however, stated facts showing that the machines as fixed were locally regarded as chattels, that the partners who put them up so regarded them, and that the mortgagee knew this and so treated them. This accounts for the decision. In Lyon & Co. v. London City and Midland Bank some chairs were hired for the plaintiffs by the owner of a place of public entertainment in Brighton. The Brighton Town Council required the chairs to be fastened so as not to be easily displaced, and this was done. The chairs were screwed to bars fastened to the floor. The building and fixtures were then mortgaged to the defendants. The mortgagees took possession and claimed the chairs, but the court held they did not form part of the property mortgaged, but remained so many chattels. Having regard to the nature of the things fixed, the mode of fixing, and the order of the town council, the decision was, in my opinion, quite right, and in accordance with the authorities above referred to.

I pass now to consider whether in this case the fact that the mortgagor Holdway had not acquired the ownership of the machines by paying for them entitles the plaintiffs to recover their value from the defendants. The title to chattels may clearly be lost by being affixed to real property by a person who is not the owner of the chattels. This was pointed out in Gough v. Wood, and is very old law. Holdway agreed to buy the machines; but the plaintiffs knew what he wanted them for, and that before paying for them he intended to put them up in his factory and to use them. They knew that the factory was mortgaged, and they ran the risk of the machines being claimed as fixtures. In effect, Holdway was authorized by the plaintiffs to convert the chattels into fixtures, subject to the right of the plaintiffs to enter and retake them if he did not pay for them. But, apart from this knowledge and authority, the result would be the same, although not so obvious. After the machines were fixed, and before the plaintiffs claimed them, the second mortgagee took possession; the plaintiffs' right to enter and remove the machines, resting as it did on their contract with Holdway, ceased to be exerciseable. The plaintiffs have no greater rights against the defendants than they had against the second mortgagee, whose rights the defendants have acquired. The machines had ceased to be chattels belonging to the plaintiffs; they were not chattels wrongfully detained by the defendants. The machines had become fixtures which the plaintiffs were not entitled to remove from the possession of the mortgagees. This was the view taken both by Lawrance, J., and the Court of Appeal, and was in accordance with Hobson v. Gorringe, which, in my opinion, was correctly decided.

There were really no facts in dispute, and nothing would have been gained by leaving any question to the jury. The legal questions arising on the undisputed facts were, in my opinion, rightly decided, and the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

LODDER AND ANOTHER v. SLOWEY. (a.)

Contract—Seizure of works and re-entry—Right to determine contract—Quantum meruit—Default or delay caused by parties suing.

A party to a contract for the execution of works cannot justify the exercise of a power of re-entry and seizure of the works in progress, when the alleged default or delay of the contractor has been brought about by the acts or default of the party himself or his agent. A contractor in such circumstances may treat the contract as at an end, and may sue for work and labour done, instead of suing for damages for breach of the contract.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand.

The facts are given at length in their lordships' judgment.

Cripps, K.C., and Northcote, for the appellants.

Skerrett, for the respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MAC-

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

NAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY) was delivered by Lord DAVEY.—In the month of December, 1897, a contract was made between the Corporation of Karori, in the Colony of New Zealand, acting by its borough council, with one John McWilliams for the construction by him of certain road works, including a tunnel. The contract was subject to certain conditions, by which it was provided (clause 1) that the contractor should execute the works according to the specification and to the entire satisfaction of Thomas Ward, civil engineer, (clause 4) that the engineer of the borough council should be the sole judge in all matters or questions arising out of the contract and of quality of materials or workmanship, meaning of specification, rate of progress, and general management, and that his decision should be final and conclusive in all cases, and (clause 8) that, should the contractor not proceed with sufficient expedition in the performance of the work or not execute the same in compliance with the specification or drawings, it should be in the power of the engineer on behalf of the borough council to enter on and take possession of the works and materials and complete the same at the expense of the contractor or re-let such works to another contractor, and any loss should be recoverable from the contractor or, in the alternative, to determine the contract, and on such determination the money paid under the contract should be accepted by the contractor in satisfaction of all claims under the contract.

The appellants entered into a bond with the borough council in the sum of £500 for the due carrying out by McWilliams of his contract. The bond itself is not printed in the record, and their lordships do not know the exact terms of it.

In September, 1898, McWilliams made default and, in fact, abandoned the works. The borough council thereupon called upon the appellants under their guarantee, and in the result a contract, dated the 15th of November, 1898, was made between the appellants and the respondent for the execution by the latter on or before the 2nd of March, 1899, of the works undertaken by McWilliams, and left incomplete by him. This contract contained a provision that the respondent should be deemed to have full notice of the contents and effect of all the various documents constituting McWilliams' contract and to be bound by all the terms and conditions of such contract so far as the same were then applicable to the present contract and capable of being carried into effect.

It may be useful at this point to consider the relation which was thus constituted between these three parties, the borough council for whom the works were to be executed, the appellants, and the respondent. The borough council and the appellants seemed to have assumed that on McWilliams' default the borough council had the right to call upon the appellants to complete the works, or that the appellants had an option whether they would do so or pay the penalty on the bond. At any rate they elected to take that course with the acquiescence of the borough council, without, however, binding the corporation by any contract with them. Probably all parties considered that they were subrogated to McWilliams' rights and subject to his liabilities. Instead of executing the works themselves, the appellants engaged the respondent to do so. Quoad the borough council the respondent was therefore in the position of a sub-contractor only, and there was no privity of contract as between them. But as between the appellants and the respondent each party was liable to the other one for any breach of the contract. The learned counsel for the respondent referred their lordships to some letters which passed between the solicitors of the appellants and the borough council respectively, in the month of February, 1899. It was then arranged, at the suggestion of the appellants themselves, that the respondent and the borough council should deal directly with each other, but without interfering with the position of the appellants towards the council, and, in answer to an inquiry from the solicitors of the borough council, it was explained that the meaning was that the respondent should be the agent of the appellants in making all arrangements about the tunnel, &c. These letters appear to explain the relative positions of the parties to each other with sufficient clearness.

Perhaps the expression that the respondent was to be deemed the agent of the appellants was not a very happy one, but it clearly meant that the appellants were, in a question between them and the borough council, to be bound by arrangements made with, and instructions given to, the respondent in the course of the execution of the works. On the other hand, by allowing the borough council to deal with the respondent directly, the appellants, in any question on the contract between them and the respondent, made the borough council, acting through their proper officer, the agents of the appellants as regards all matters relating to the execution of the contract, and quoad the respondent assumed the responsibility for any directions or instructions given by the council. In fact the execution of the works was proceeded with on this footing. The respondent dealt directly with Mr. Ward, the engineer of the borough council, and received his orders and instructions from him. And the appellants left the entire supervision and superintendence of the respondent's execution of the works to Ward.

The contractor failed to complete the works within the time specified in the contract, and in the month of July, 1899, letters were written by Mr. Ward to the appellants complaining of the condition of the works and threatening to take the works out of their hands and complete them at their expense. Copies of these letters were forwarded by the appellants to the respondent with an intimation that unless something was done to satisfy Mr. Ward, it would be necessary for the appellants to take the work out of the respondent's hands and complete it at his expense. On the 3rd of August, 1899, the officers of the borough council, purporting to act under the power contained in the eighth condition of McWilliams' contract, entered upon and took possession of the works.

The respondent shortly afterwards commenced the present action against the appellants, and by his statement of claim, dated the 6th of November, 1899, after alleging that the appellants had wrongfully entered and taken possession of the works and wrongfully determined, repudiated, and declined on their part to perform their contract, the respondent claimed for work and labour done and materials supplied by him at the request of the appellants and, alternatively, damages for breach of contract.

The corporation of Karori was afterwards added as a defendant.

The action was tried before Edwards, J., and a jury in July, 1900. The jury returned a special verdict in answers to twenty-seven questions left to them. For the purpose of his appeal the most material findings are those numbered 7, 10, 14, 17, and 24.

"7. Did the defendant corporation prior to the seizure of the works improperly prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with the works in the manner authorized by his contract?—Answer: Yes.

"10. Was such seizure wrongful. Answer: Yes.

"14. Did the plaintiff proceed with the works with the rate of progress required by the defendant corporation's engineer.—Answer: Yes, except that he did not comply with the letters of the 21st and 25th of July.

"17. Did the defendant corporation prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with the said works with sufficient expedition?—Answer: Yes.

"24. What would have been the profit which the plaintiff would have obtained if he had been allowed to finish his contract?—Answer: No evidence that any profit would have been made.

The learned judge, on cross-motions for judgment and non-suit by the plaintiff and both defendants respectively, held that the corporation were under no contractual liability towards the respondent and were liable only for the agreed value of certain plant which they had taken. There is no appeal from this part of the judgment. As against the appellants he held that there was an implied warranty by the appellants that the respondent should have undispossession of the land for the purposes of the contract and the appellants were liable to the respondent for breach of this implied warranty. But he held that the measure of damages was the amount (if any) which the respondent had lost by exclusion from the works before completion, and as there was no evidence before the jury that the respondent had suffered any loss, he gave them the option of a new trial. And the learned judge entered judgment, dated the 25th of August, 1900, accordingly.

This judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and by their judgment of the 1st of February, 1901, judgment was ordered to be entered for the respondent for £1,015 5s. with costs. The present appeal is from this judgment.

The learned judges in the Court of Appeal agreed with Edwards, J., that the appellants were liable to the respondent for the wrongful re-entry and seizure by the borough council, but on rather different grounds. Connolly, J., held that Ward must be treated as agent for the present appellants, with an almost unlimited authority to act for them and bind them in responsibility for his acts. Williams, J., while agreeing with the views expressed by Edwards, J., thought further that even if that conclusion were incorrect, there was an implied warranty or an implied condition of the contract that the respondent should not be wrongly interfered with by the person to whom by the contract the appellants had entrusted the superintendence of the respondent's work—viz., the engineer to the borough council. On the measure of damages the learned judges differed from Edwards, J. They adopted the statement of the law in the notes to Cutter v. Powell in Smith's Leading Cases, and they thought that Lord Cranworth's judgment in Ranger v. Great Western Railway Co., 5 H. L. Cas. 72, which had been relied on by the learned judge in the court below, had been misapplied. All that that case decided, in their opinion, was that the appellants had no claim to equitable relief. Accordingly they held that the respondent was in the circumstances entitled to treat the contract as at an end and to sue on a quantum meruit for work and labour done and materials supplied, the net amount of which the jury had found to be £1,015 5s.

Their lordships agree with the conclusion of the Court of Appeal. They do not dissent from the contention of Mr. Skerrett, in his very able argument for the respondent, that in the circumstances of this case it was an implied term of the appellants' contract with the respondent that the borough council would permit the respondent, who was in the position of a sub-contractor, to perform his contract. But they think that the simplest and safest ground on which to rest the liability of the appellants is that they made the borough council, acting through their engineer, their agents for superintending the respondent's execution of his contract with full power to act for them in respect thereto. Not only is this proved by the arrangements made by the appellants with the borough council that the respondent should deal directly with the council and by the actual course of dealing by all parties, but their lordships think that it was also in accordance with the contract which by clause 8 incorporated the conditions of McWilliams' contract so far as then applicable.

It was, however, contended for the appellants at their lordships' bar that according to the true construction and effect of clause 8 of the respondent's contract the borough council had the right to re-enter upon the works if, in the opinion of the engineer, the respondent was not proceeding with sufficient expedition in the performance of the work. For this purpose it was said the engineer was not acting as the officer of the borough council, but was placed by the contract in the position of an arbitrator or referee, and his decision was made conclusive on the rate of progress. No imputation, it was rightly said, had been made upon Mr. Ward's good faith, and, therefore, the re-entry must be held to have been rightfully made and no cause of action arose from it.

Admitting this to be so, and assuming that the true effect of the incorporation of the conditions of McWifliams' contract so far as the same were then applicable was to give the right of re-entry, under Clause 8 of McWilliams' contract, not to the appellants, but to the borough council, the answer to the argument appears to their lordships to be that the jury have found (7) that the corporation prior to the seizure of the works improperly prevented the respondent from proceeding with the works in the manner authorized by his contract, and (17) that the corporation prevented the respondent from proceeding with the works with sufficient expedition.

It was not suggested before their lordships that these matters were not properly before the jury, or that the questions were not properly left to them, or that there was not evidence before them on which they could properly find as they did. Their lordships do not think that the appellants are precluded by the express finding that the seizure was wrongful from raising any questions of law, but they think that the seventh and seventeenth findings are fatal to the appellants' argument. The corporation, of course, means the borough council, acting by their engineer, Mr. Ward. Their lordships have already expressed their opinion that the borough council and Ward were made the appellants' agents for the purpose of superintending the execution of the contract by the respondent, and the acts done and orders given by the borough council or Ward, which the jury have found prevented the respondent from proceeding with the works with sufficient expedition were therefore within the scope of the authority conferred by the appellants. Their lordships hold that a party to a contract for execution of works cannot justify the exercise of a power of re-entry and seizure of the works in progress when the alleged default or delay of the contractor has been brought about by the acts or default of the party himself or his agent: Roberts v. Bury Improvement Commissioners, 18 W. R. 702, L. R. 5 C. P. 310.

Their lordships also agree with the learned judges as to the proper measure of damages or (more accurately) as to the right of the respondent to treat the contract as at an end and sue for work and labour done instead of suing for damages for breach of the contract.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed. The appellants will pay the costs of the appeal.

ELLINGER & CO. AND SCHLESINGER v. MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. OF NEW YORK. (a.)

Insurance—Life—Policy for benefit of creditor—Undertaking not to commit suicide—Warranty—Condition.

An application for a policy of life insurance for five years, effected for the benefit of a creditor of the assured, was expressed to be the basis and a part of the proposed contract for insurance. It was signed by the assured, and it contained a number of statements which were warranted by him to be true. It also contained the following clause: "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract." Within the period of one year from the date of the policy the assured committed suicide during a fit of temporary insanity. In an action on the policy brought by the creditor, Held, that the clause as to not committing suicide must be read as a condition, and that the fact of suicide rendered the policy void, and did not merely give the insurance company a cross-claim against the estate of the deceased for damages.

Judgment of Bigham, J. (52 W. R. 366, [1904] 1 K. B. 832), affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bigham, J., at the trial of an action without a jury: reported 52 W. R. 366, [1904] 1 K. B. 832.

The action was brought on a policy of life insurance for £4,000 issued by the defendants to one Max Firnberg.

The plaintiffs Ellinger & Co. were the persons for whose benefit the policy was effected and to whom the insurance money was expressed to be payable. The plaintiff Schlesinger was the executor of Firnberg, and sued as trustee for Ellinger & Co.

On the 23rd of May, 1902, Firnberg signed an application addressed to the defendant company for a policy of insurance for £4,000 for five years on his own life.

The material parts of the document were as follows: "This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance. . . . I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers and all those that I make to the company's medical examiner in continuation of this application are by me warranted to be true and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract which I hereby agree to accept. . . ." Then followed twenty numbered statements, beginning with name of the applicant. The ninth statement was as follows: "The full name of the person to whom the insurance is payable is Ellinger & Co., Manchester." The twelfth statement was as follows: "The insurable interest of the said beneficiary in the life proposed for insurance other than that of family relationship is to cover debt." After these statements there were three clauses in the following words: "I hereby warrant and agree that during the next two years following the date of issue of the contract of insurance for which application is hereby made I will not travel or reside in any part of the torrid zone, or north of the parallel of 60° north latitude in the Western Hemisphere, or north of the parallel of 70° north latitude in the Eastern Hemisphere, and will not engage in any of the following extra-hazardous occupations or employments—retailing intoxicating liquors, handling electric wires and dynamos, blasting, mining, submarine labour, aeronautic ascensions, the manufacture of highly explosive substances, service upon any railroad, train, or track, or in switching or in coupling cars, or on any steam or other vessel, unless written permission is expressly granted by the company. I further warrant and agree that I will not engage in any military or naval service in time of war during the continuance of the said contract without first obtaining written permission from the company. I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract."

The policy was issued on the 24th of May, 1902. It commenced with the following words: "In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract, the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York promises to pay . . . unto Ellinger & Co. . . . creditors of Max Firnberg . . . their successors or assigns £4,000 . . . upon acceptance of satisfactory proof of the death of the said Max Firnberg provided such death takes place within the term of five years from the date hereof during the continuance of this policy upon the following condition, and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy, which are hereby referred to and made part hereof. The half annual premium of £56 16s. 8d. shall be paid in advance on the delivery of this policy and thereafter to the company at its principal agency in Great Britain on the 24th day of November and May in every year during the continuance of this contract until premiums for five full years shall have been duly paid to the said company." A number of provisions were printed on the back of the policy, one of which was as follows: "Military and naval service of any kind, the Volunteer service of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace excepted, whether as combatant or non-combatant, without permission in writing, signed by one of the officers of the company, is prohibited under this contract."

It appeared that when Firnberg took out the policy he owed money to Ellinger & Co. for some business debt. In November, 1902, Ellinger & Co. were pressing for payment of this debt, and then for the first time Firnberg told them that by way of securing the payment of their debt he had effected the policy.

On the 19th of February, 1903, Firnberg, during a fit of temporary insanity, committed suicide. He died insolvent owing Ellinger & Co. £4,000 or more.

On the 25th of November, 1903, the plaintiffs brought this action upon the policy.

The plaintiffs contended that the policy must be regarded as having been taken out by Firnberg on their behalf, and that they were therefore entitled to ratify and recover on it, and that the clause as to suicide amounted to nothing more than a personal undertaking or independent agreement by Firnberg, for the breach of which the defendants' remedy was limited to a claim against Firnberg's estate.

The defendants contended that the clause amounted to a condition, the effect of it being to exclude liability on their part if death was due to suicide.

Bigham, J., gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and Cabaté, for the plaintiffs.—Generally speaking, a policy of life insurance covers suicide, other than felonious suicide, unless there is an express provision in the policy that any sort of suicide shall avoid the policy. The general principle, which is founded on considerations of public policy, that a contract of insurance is avoided by suicide, only applies to felonious suicide, and not to suicide committed in a fit of insanity: Horn v. Anglo-Australian, &c., Assurance Co., 9 W. R. 359, 30 L. J. Ch. 511. There is no reason then, on grounds of public policy, why this insurance should be forfeited. We must therefore look at the terms of the application, which the defendants say take suicide committed during t mporary insanity out of the policy. The clause as to suicide is one of three promises as to the future which follow on a number of warranties properly so-called. It is not expressed that in case of suicide all rights under the policy should cease. If that had been intended, it ought to have been expressed: Stoneham v. Ocean Railway and General Accident Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 716, 19 Q. B. D. 237; Hambrough v. Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York, 72 L. T. 140, 43 W. R. Dig. 83. There is no case in which a policy has been held void for non-observance of a promise as to the future or of a condition subsequent, unless the policy itself by its terms provided that such non-observance should render it void. The provision as to military and naval service on the back of the policy in this case shows that, when the parties desired to make a stipulation a condition, they knew how to do so in apt terms.

They also referred to Thomson v. Weems, 9 App. Cas. 671; Barnard v. Faber, 41 W. R. 193, [1893] 1 Q. B. 340; and Newcastle Fire Insurance Co. v. Macmorran, 3 Dow, 255.

Haldane, K.C., and Rowlatt, for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., in this case is perfectly correct. In fact I might content myself with merely giving judgment in the very terms of his judgment. But out of deference to the argument which has been addressed to us I will shortly state my own reasons. We have to deal in this action with a policy of life insurance. The policy begins with these words: "In consideration of the application for this policy, which is hereby made a part of this contract," and it purports to be given "upon the following condition and subject to the provisions, requirements, and benefits stated on the back of this policy which are hereby referred to and made part hereof." Before the policy was granted an application form had been addressed to the insurance company by the assured. It begins thus: "This application made to the Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York is the basis and a part of a proposed contract for insurance. . . . I hereby agree that all the following statements and answers . . . are by me warranted to be true, and are offered to the company as a consideration of the contract which I hereby agree to accept." We start with this—that the application was the basis and a part of the proposed contract, and we also have statements warranted to be true and offered to the insurance company as the consideration of the contract. These are two matters which are emphasised by Lord Esher, M.R., in Hambrough v. Mutual Insurance Co. of New York. Then there follow in detail a number of statements and answers to questions. These again are followed by three express warranties. The previous statements and answers are made warranties by virtue of the original statement at the beginning of the application form. These latter are express warranties. The third express warranty is as follows: "I also warrant and agree that I will not commit suicide, whether sane or insane, during the period of one year from the date of the said contract." These warranties as well as the preceding statements and answers are, in my judgment, by the terms of the application form made the basis of the contract. The question is whether these warranties have the effect of what are ordinarily called warranties in policies of insurance. In a policy of insurance a warranty means a condition. In my opinion it was intended that these different statements and stipulations were to be conditions of the policy.

In Thomson v. Weems, 9 App. Cas., at p. 684, Lord Blackburn expresses himself as follows: "In policies of marine insurance I think it is settled by authority that any statement of a fact bearing upon the risk introduced into the written policy is, by whatever words and in whatever place, to be construed as a warranty, and primâ facie at least that the compliance with that warranty is a condition precedent to the attaching of the risk. I think that on the balance of authority the general principles of insurance law apply to all insurances, whether marine, life, or fire: see per Lord Eldon, C., in a Scotch appeal on a fire insurance, Newcastle Fire Insurance Co. v. Macmorran & Co." No question arises on that in the present case, but I do not think that this rule as to the construction of marine policies is also applicable to the construction of life policies. The rule he was referring to is the general rule that primâ facie any provision at all in a policy is a condition. Whether that dictum is sound or not, that which follows has a strong bearing on this case. Lord Blackburn continued: "But I think, when we look at the terms of this contract and see that it is expressly said in the policy, as well as in the declaration itself, that the declaration shall be the basis of the policy, that it is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that the truth of the particulars (which, I think, include his statement that he was of temperate habits) is warranted."

The question, then, is whether this particular warranty with which we have to deal in the present case is made a condition. Bowen, L.J., made an accurate statement of the law on this question in Barnard v. Faber: "It is, therefore, a term of this policy that there should be this promise; and, if this promise is one which goes to the root of the whole engagement and transaction, then it becomes, according to the ordinary principles of ordinary law, a condition—either a condition precedent, or, if the condition is one which cannot be construed as a condition precedent and must be a condition subsequent, then it becomes a condition subsequent. That arises from the materiality of the promise which is assumed to be made, and the making of which is to be a term of the engagement or transaction into which the underwriter has entered. When you have got as far as that, it is clear that it is the term as regards the risk which is material. A term as regards the risk must be a condition."

It is clear that the term of the policy with which we have to deal in the present case is a term as regards the risk. It provides that the company shall not be at the particular risk of the assured committing suicide within a certain time. It is, therefore, by the agreement constituted a condition.

Now how has Bigham, J., dealt with this case? This is what he said: "What did the parties, Firnberg and the defendant company, intend when they inserted the warranty that Firnberg should not commit suicide? I think it is clear that they intended that in the event of suicide the company should not be liable on the policy. It does not matter, I think, whether the clause is called a warranty or not. It constituted a limitation of the defendants' liability. Death within five years was the event upon the happening of which the defendants were to pay, but death by suicide within the first twelve months was excluded. Apt words have been used to express that intention, and it is, I think, impossible to read the clause as merely giving to the company a cross-claim against the estate of the deceased for damages." That sums up the whole situation in language on which I cannot improve. I therefore think the appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the term "warranty," though its primary legal meaning may not be to express a condition of liability, yet is very frequently used in that sense and may be so used. The question is whether it is so in this case. In marine policies the word "warranted" is constantly used in connection with conditions. This is a life policy, but in this very case it is not disputed that in the application form, which is made part of the contract, the word "warranted" is used in reference to conditions. It is not disputed that the truth of the statements and answers to questions is a condition precedent to liability, but it is said that the clause under consideration is not a condition. It seems to me that the fact of the word being used in this sense in the earlier part of the policy affords some ground at least for thinking it possible that it may be so used in the subsequent part; and, there being an ambiguity, I think we may consider the question of probability. I confess it seems to me impossible to believe that business people, dealing with a matter of this sort, where a company grants upon the application of a debtor a policy for payment to his creditor, meant that this clause should be treated not as a condition, but simply as giving the company a right to resort to the debtor, or rather the debtor's estate, whatever it might be, while they were compelled to pay the creditor themselves. I do not think that this is a reasonable view of the policy.

MATHEW, L.J., concurred.

TREDWAY v. MECHIN. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Weekly tenancy—Defective state of premises—Covenant to repair—Notice of want of repair—Personal injuries.

The defendant sublet the first floor of a house, of which he himself was the lessee under a repairing lease, to the husband of the plaintiff upon a weekly tenancy made verbally. The plaintiff went one day from her front room on to the balcony, when it gave way and she fell on to the pavement, receiving very serious injuries. The defective condition of the balcony was suspected by no one.

Held, assuming that the defendant had undertaken with the plaintiff's husband to keep the premises in repair (as to which the evidence was contradictory), nevertheless the defendant, not having received notice of any defect in the balcony and not knowing that it was unsafe, was not liable.

Application by the defendant asking for judgment or new trial in an action tried before Grantham, J., and a common jury.

The action was brought by Mrs. Catherine Tredway, and she claimed damages for personal injuries sustained owing to the non-repair of premises let by the defendant to her husband. The defendant, who was tenant of 16, Sidmouth-street, W.C., under a repairing lease granted him in October, 1902, sublet the first floor unfurnished to the plaintiff's husband in the following December upon a weekly tenancy of 10s. 6d. a week. On the 8th of August, 1903, the plaintiff went on to a balcony in front of the window, which gave way, and she fell on to the steps below and sustained the injuries now claimed for.

At the trial the plaintiff gave evidence that she did not know that the balcony was unsafe, but that she had pointed out to the defendant that the cement which covered the stonework of the balcony was defective. She also said the defendant was liable to do all repairs. There was no written contract between the defendant and her husband, but it appeared from the evidence called by the defendant that he had spent some £200 on repairs to the premises, which included the putting right of something wrong with the balcony to which the plaintiff had called his attention, and that the repairs were inspected and passed by the lessor's surveyor.

The jury found for the plaintiff with £150 damages, and judgment was entered accordingly by the learned judge, who, however, expressed his opinion that there was no evidence of any notice to the defendant of the defective state of the balcony.

During the argument, which sufficiently appears from the judgment, the following cases were cited: Makin v. Watkinson, 19 W. R. 286, L. R. 6 Ex. 25; Broggi v. Robins, 15 Times L. R. 224; Hugall v. M'Lean, 33 W. R. 588, 53 L. T. 94; Lane v. Cox, 45 W. R. 261, [1897] 1 Q. B. 415.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Grantham, J., with a jury. The action is one brought by a weekly tenant of certain premises against the landlord, and the cause of action was an accident which happened to the plaintiff's wife by reason of the falling of a balcony on the demised premises by which she sustained serious injury. The question is whether the defendant is liable to pay damages in respect of the injuries so sustained. The law on the matter has been repeatedly laid down and is quite settled. It seems to me to be the law that if there is a contract as between the landlord and tenant that the landlord will repair the premises (that is, during the currency of the term) the landlord is not under any obligation, unless there be an express contract to that effect, to perform repairs unless and until notice of the necessity for those repairs has been given to him. On principle, the tenant and not the landlord is the occupier of the house, and the landlord has no right of access to the house for the purpose, unless he stipulates for it, of examining its condition to see whether repairs are necessary. On the other hand, the tenant is the occupier, and the tenant is the person who has the means of knowing, and is the person most interested in knowing, what the condition of the premises is, and therefore it has been held that a naked undertaking on the part of the landlord to keep the premises in repair is not broken if they are out of repair, unless the tenant has given him notice of the fact. There seems to be no doubt that is the law. I think there was some evidence, it may have been unintentional evidence—that is to say, it may not have been intended to carry the meaning which the jury have put on it—that this was an undertaking on the part of the landlord with the tenant that he, the landlord, would keep the premises in repair. I cannot say there was no evidence on that, but I do not think it is really very material in the case. I assume there was that obligation on the part of the landlord. What happened, as I have said, was that this balcony fell. It seems to me that the evidence is all one way on this one cardinal point in the case, and no evidence to the contrary, because there were several witnesses who were quite unchallenged on cross-examination; and I think the result of the evidence in the case is that no one, from beginning to end, supposed there was any such defect in this balcony as led to this accident. The defendant, who took a long lease of the premises, was under contract with his landlord to put the house in repair. To do that he had to carry out specifications made by the landlord's surveyor, who, having no reason whatever for not putting everything into the specification which he thought was necessary, did not specify that anything should be done to this balcony. That contract was carried out, and certain minor defects in the shape of some want of plaster at the outer edge of the balcony were pointed out, but it never occurred to anybody that that indicated any defect in the structure of the balcony itself. That is quite obvious; in fact, it is common ground. Then it is suggested that the remedy adopted was putting on the small quantity of cement necessary to make good that defect. If there is one thing conclusively established in this case, it is this, that no one, neither those who were living in the house, or the person who had undertaken the repairs, or the persons, of whom there were more than one, who surveyed the repairs after they were done, had the slightest notion there was any radical defect in the balcony at all.

Under those circumstances, it seems to me, we cannot say there was any evidence of notice to the landlord, in the sense of the decisions which say that such notice is essential before the landlord can be held liable for not doing that which he had no notice was necessary to be done. If it were necessary to refer to it, there is one authority which Mr. Ashton called attention to (Broggi v. Robins), that even where the landlord has means of knowledge, and the tenant has not the means of knowledge, that is not enough to fix the landlord with the obligation to do the thing when he did not, in fact, know that it was necessary. That would be material if there was anything in the suggestion of the jury that the landlord when advised of the fact that there was a defect in the cement at the edge of the balcony might have dug out the whole of the cement, and if he had done so would have found there was a radical defect in the stone underneath at the point where it touched the wall. That cannot be put higher than means of knowledge. It does not amount to more than that, even if it amounted to that; but assuming it does amount to means of knowledge, it is then covered by the authority of that case, because he has no knowledge in fact; even if the jury were right in saying he had that means of knowledge, it does not make him liable.

It seems to me, therefore, on the undisputed facts of this case, there was no evidence for grounding liability on the part of the landlord to make good to the plaintiff the damages sustained by the accident. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and entered for the defendant.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the law of the case, it appears to me it is governed by the decision in Broggi v. Robins, which was a decision of this court. The judgment as reported is given by Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and he held in a very similar case that in order to establish a liability on the part of the landlord of premises let on a weekly tenancy it is necessary that the plaintiff should make out two things—first, that there was an agreement on the part of the defendant to repair; and, secondly, that the defendant must have notice of want of repair. I assume in the present case that there was evidence on which the jury might come to the conclusion that there was an agreement on the part of the defendant, the landlord, to repair. It appears to me that the plaintiff altogether fails on the second point, which it is necessary for him to establish—namely, that there was notice of want of repair. There was certainly notice that some cement ought to be placed on this balcony, but there is no evidence, as it seems to me, even on the part of the plaintiff that the balcony itself—that is to say, the slab which constituted the balcony—was out of repair, and the evidence which was given by the defendant's witnesses is distinctly to the contrary. I think, therefore, the action fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—It seems to me that the case may be disposed of on the assumption, as to which I do not say anything more than that it is an assumption, that there was an agreement between the plaintiff and defendant to keep the premises in repair. That supposed agreement was entered into when the tenancy began, and that was in December, 1902. In August, 1903, the accident happened. The previous June, the attention of the landlord was called to the condition of the balcony. What had he notice of? because he was entitled, on the authority of the cases which had been cited, to notice of the defect that he was called on to repair. The defect called to his attention was this flaw in the cement at the outer edge of the balcony. There is no indication by the plaintiff or any of the defendant's witnesses that there was anything wrong with the structure. An attempt was made to put right the defect which was pointed out; the cement was replaced which was supposed to be worn out. That had been done, and the landlord had no further notice there was anything wrong with the condition of the structure. The jury appear to have thought that he ought to have pulled up all the cement, because there was some wanted at the outer edge; and if he had pulled up all the cement it would have been discovered that the stone beneath had crumbled away. That was a mere suggestion of the jury. There was neither knowledge nor means of knowledge in the landlord of the defect which led to the accident occurring. With some regret I am constrained by the law to say that the verdict and judgment must be altered, and the judgment entered for the defendant.

MCGRUTHER v. PITCHER. (a.)

Sale of goods—Conditions as to re-sale—Notice to purchaser—Right to disregard conditions as to re-sale.

If, on the sale of goods, a condition is attached as to the price at which they may be re-sold, this cannot bind a subsequent purchaser, even though he bought with notice of the condition.

A retail trader purchased from H., who had purchased of the licensee of a patent an article manufactured by the licensee under the patent. Inside the boxes in which the article was packed was a printed condition, stating that the goods were not to be re-sold at less than a certain price specified therein. The retail trader having sold some of the goods at less than that specified price, in an action by the licensee to restrain the retailer from so doing.

Held, that the retailer had entered into no contract with the licensee; that the condition could not be made to run with the goods so as to bind the retailer, even though he was aware of such condition.

Decision of Farwell. J., reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Farwell, J.

The facts were as follows:

The action was brought to restrain the defendant, his agents, servants, and workmen, from selling or otherwise disposing of certain rubber heel pads, manufactured by the plaintiffs and purchased from them by the defendant, either directly at a less price than 10d. per pair for ladies' heels and 1s. per pair for gentlemen's heels, or indirectly at a less price than as aforesaid by pretending to sell the same at a less price than as aforesaid, by giving or returning to the purchasers thereof a monetary payment out of such prices as received or otherwise as a present or a gift, contrary to certain terms and conditions of an alleged contract or contracts under which the aforesaid rubber heel pads were purchased by the defendant, and for damages and costs.

The plaintiffs were rubber manufacturers and carried on business at Preston under the style of "The Palatine Rubber Co."

The defendant was a bootmaker at Brixton.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that they were the sole manufacturers of the Palatine revolving rubber heel pad under a licence, and that they always sold and disposed of their said revolving heel pads, whether bought directly from them or from any dealer, on the express agreement that the same should not be retailed at less than the above-mentioned prices, and also should not be resold except subject to these conditions, and also that the acceptance of the goods by any purchaser would be deemed to be an acknowledgment that they were sold to him on these conditions and on these conditions only, and that he agreed with the vendors as their agent to be bound by the same. The revolving heel pads were always packed in boxes and on the inside of the lid of each box were printed in large type the said conditions of sale.

The plaintiffs further alleged that early in the month of August, 1903, the defendant purchased from one C. Howes, one of the plaintiffs' factors, three pairs of the plaintiffs' said revolving heel pads and was orally informed of the said conditions of sale, which were accepted by the defendant, and that the defendant subsequently made further purchases of the heel pads from the said C. Howes, and on each occasion was orally informed of the conditions under which they were sold, and that in breach of and contrary to the said terms and conditions the defendant had sold and continued to sell the said revolving heel pads at a less price—that was, 8d. per pair for ladies' and 10d. for gentlemen's.

The defendant denied having had any notice, up to the 3rd of October, 1903, on which day he had received a letter from the plaintiffs, that the plaintiffs sold or disposed of the revolving heel pads on any condition of sale whatever, and if in fact they did, the said conditions were never binding on the defendant, and the defendant never entered into any contract with the plaintiffs regulating the price at which the defendant might sell the heel pads. He also denied having being orally informed by the said C. Howes of the conditions of sale.

On the 2nd and 3rd of October, 1903, the plaintiffs by letter complained to the defendant of, as they alleged, his breach of the said conditions of sale, and after some correspondence between the solicitors, the said action was brought.

Farwell, J., granted the injunction as claimed by the plaintiffs, but limited its duration to the continuance of the patent.

The defendant appealed.

They cited Incandescent Gas Light Co. v. Cantelo, 12 Rep. Pat. Cas. 262, 264.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my judgment this is both in substance and in form an action for breach of contract. So treating it, I suppose no one will deny the authority of Price v. Easton, 4 B. & Ad. 433, in which it was decided that "an action for breach of contract must be brought by the person from whom the consideration moved"; and that is confirmed by Twedale v. Atkinson, 1 B. & S. 393. Now, counsel for the plaintiffs very properly and frankly admitted that if an action were brought for the price of these heel pads it could only be brought by Howes. But he said that the plaintiffs, who are licensees from Roberts, the owner of the patent, are entitled to sue for the breach of contract. I cannot assent to that proposition. It is said that the defendant may be sued for breach of the condition as to the prices at which the pads are to be sold. Why? Because it is said the defendant bought with notice of that condition. Even if the defendant did buy with notice of the condition, I entirely deny that this would give any rights to a person who was not a party to the bargain. An attempt of this sort was made in Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co., 52 W. R. 152, [1904] 1 Ch. 354. The head-note of that case is as follows: "T. & Co., manufacturers of tobacco, sold packet tobaccos subject to printed terms and conditions fixing a minimum price below which they were not to be sold, and containing the following proviso: 'Acceptance of the goods will be deemed a contract between the purchaser and T. & Co. that he will observe the stipulations' (a much stronger case, be it observed, than the present). 'In the case of a purchase by a retail dealer through a wholesale dealer, the latter shall be deemed to be the agent of T. & Co.' T. & Co. sold to N., who resold for his own profit to S. & Co. tions, but sold to the public at a price below the stipulated minimum. Held, that there was no contract between T. & Co. and S. & Co. which T. & Co. could enforce, and that conditions cannot be attached to goods so as to bind all purchasers with notice." One need only look at paragraph 5 of the statement of claim in the present case to see that the pleader meant to affirm just the contrary to the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., in Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co. That paragraph contains really the gist of this action. [His lordship read it, and continued:] The plaintiffs say that because the defendant had notice of these conditions, although he entered into no contract whatsoever directly or indirectly with the plaintiffs, they can sue him for the breach of the conditions. I do not agree, and I think that the decision of Swinfen Eady, J., was perfectly right. He said: "Secondly, they contend that the goods were sold subject to certain conditions, and that even if Netten or any one else had purported to sell them free from the conditions, Sterious & Co., having notice of the conditions, could not sell goods except according to the conditions, and the plaintiffs were entitled to restrain them from doing so. With regard to this last contention there is a short answer. Conditions of this kind do not run with the goods, and cannot be imposed upon them. Subsequent purchasers therefore do not take subject to any conditions which the court can enforce. If there was a breach of contract the plaintiffs could no doubt sue. The question remains, therefore, whether there was any contract. There was no direct contract between Sterious & Co. and Taddy & Co., and the question does not arise as to the effect of a sale by Taddy & Co. direct to a retail trader subject to these terms as to minimum retail price." In my opinion that is perfectly sound, and I think the present plaintiffs have no cause of action. I desire to add that the case does not appear to have been presented to Farwell, J., in the way in which it has been presented to us. Farwell, J., seems to have dealt with the action as if it were brought to enforce the rights of the patentee through his licensees. I say nothing as to those rights, because in my judgment this is simply an action for breach of contract, and the plaintiffs were not parties to the contract.

ROMER, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. I have tried in vain to see on what ground this case could be successfully based by the plaintiffs, and I am bound to say that I cannot find any secure ground. In the first place, this case is not one in which the plaintiffs can be fairly regarded as seeking to enforce some patent rights which are vested in them. I can find no trace of such a case. The plaintiffs certainly say that the article is patented, but they state that they are mere licensees to manufacture it, and, as I gather also, to sell it. They do not say that as licensees they cannot do that, and if they could, so far as I can see, the person who would have a right to complain would be the patentee. The plaintiffs do not say that any of the rights of the patentee are vested in them beyond what they have as licensees. At any rate, I cannot find any case established which would justify the court in giving the plaintiffs relief on the footing of patent rights. That being so, they must succeed, if at all, on some other ground. Can the plaintiffs succeed on the ground that they are selling goods, and that they purported to attach a condition to the resale of the goods, and that the defendant was informed of this condition when he purchased the goods? Clearly, to my mind, they cannot. A vendor cannot in that way enforce a condition on the sale of his goods out and out, and, by printing the so-called conditions upon some part of the goods or on the case containing them, say that every subsequent purchaser of the goods is bound to comply with the condition, so that if he does not comply with the condition he can be sued by the original vendor. That is clearly wrong. You cannot in that way make conditions run with goods. The only other possible ground for the action is contract. Have the plaintiffs succeeded in showing that they have entered into a contract with the defendant? The evidence utterly fails to prove any such contract. On the contrary, so far as I can see, the defendant has throughout said that he always intended to sell the pads without regard to the conditions, and I certainly cannot find any evidence that he agreed with his vendor to comply with the conditions. And even if the defendant had so contracted with his vendor, I should have a difficulty in holding that that would constitute a contract between the defendant and the plaintiffs. Even if the intermediate vendor was the agent of the plaintiffs, I doubt very much whether the plaintiffs could maintain the action; but I need not consider that case. In fact, I cannot find any intermediate contract between the defendant and his vendor.

That being so, the ground of contract fails, and, as I have already said, I can find no sure ground on which to rest the plaintiffs' case. In my opinion the action fails, and the appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the evidence it is plain that there was no direct contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant when he purchased these goods. He purchased the goods not from the plaintiffs, but from Howes. The defendant and Howes were the only parties to that contract of sale. If there has been a breach of the terms of that contract, Howes is the only person who can sue in respect of it, and as it seems to me, it is in no way relevant to say that Howes, when he bought the goods from the plaintiffs, bought them subject to a condition of which the defendant had notice when he bought the goods from Howes. On that point I have nothing to add to what Swinfen Eady, J., said in Taddy & Co. v. Sterious & Co.

I cannot help thinking that in the argument in the court below some confusion was introduced by reference to patent rights.

Now this action is neither in form nor in fact an action by a patentee claiming an injunction to restrain an infringement of his patent. In such an action it is open to the defendant to plead a licence by the plaintiff. That licence may be express, or it may be implied from the sale by the patentee of the patented article, but if the defendant pleads a licence, then it is competent for the plaintiff to reply: "The licence which I granted is a limited licence, and you, the person who has now got the patented article, were aware it was only a limited licence, and you cannot, therefore, defend yourself against my claim for an infringement of my patent because you are going outside the licence which to your knowledge I have with reference to this article." Such a case would not depend upon any condition running with or attaching to the article. It would depend only upon the limits of the licence which the patentee had granted when he first parted with the goods. For these reasons I think the judgment of Farwell, J., cannot be supported, and the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

MOSELEY v. KOFFYFONTEIN MINES (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Shares—Issue of shares at discount—Issue of debentures at discount—Option of debenture-holders to take fully-paid shares.

A company proposed to issue debentures at a discount of 20 per cent. The debentures were to be payable on the 1st of November, 1909, and any debenture-holder was, up to the 1st of May, 1909, to have the option of exchanging his debenture for fully paid-up shares in the company at the rate of one £1 share for every £1 secured by the debenture. By the conditions of the debentures the debenture was to become immediately payable on the holder giving written notice to the company that he wished to exercise his option.

Held, that the scheme ought to be restrained by injunction, on the ground that it might be used as a means for issuing shares at a discount.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J.

The defendant company was incorporated on the 19th of May, 1893, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, for the purpose of acquiring certain mines known as the Koffyfontein Mines. The original capital of the company was £125,200, divided into 125,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and two shares of £100 each known as life governor's shares. The capital had since been largely increased.

The plaintiff was the largest shareholder in the company.

The company proposed to issue £85,000 5 per cent. first mortgage debentures upon the terms of a circular issued to the shareholders on the 25th of April, 1904. These debentures were to be issued at 80 per cent., in denominations of £10, £25, £50, and £100. They were to be secured by a specific first mortgage on the company's farm and buildings, and a general charge upon the remainder of the company's assets except its mining claims, and they were to be repayable on the 1st of November, 1909. Clause D of the circular was as follows: "Debenture-holders will have the right at any time prior to the 1st of May, 1909, to exchange their debentures for fully-paid shares in the company at the rate of one £1 fully-paid share for every £1 of the nominal amount of the debentures.

By the proposed form of debenture the principal moneys secured by the debenture were to be repaid on the 1st of November, 1909, or on such earlier date as the same might become payable in accordance with the conditions endorsed thereon. Condition 8 made these principal moneys immediately payable: (b) in the event of the registered holder giving to the company a direction in writing under condition 10. Condition 10 was as follows: "The registered holder hereof may at any time prior to the 1st day of May, 1909, direct the company, in writing addressed to it at its registered office for the time being, to allot and issue to him in exchange for and in satisfaction of this debenture fully-paid shares of the capital of the company, at the rate of one share of £1 for every £1 of the nominal amount of the debenture, and the company shall after the surrender of this debenture comply with such direction."

The plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other shareholders of the company, except the defendants, moved for an injunction to restrain the company and its directors until the trial of the action from carrying into effect the proposed allotment of debentures pursuant to the scheme set forth in the circular of the 25th of April, and from proceeding with the issue of any debentures pursuant thereto, and from issuing any debentures under the said scheme, or any other debentures pursuant to a similar scheme.

The ground of the application was that the transaction involved the issuing of shares at a discount.

Buckley, J., dismissed the motion.

The plaintiff appealed.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Greenwood, for the appellant.—Under this scheme a debenture-holder may exchange his debenture for shares at any time and he is not bound to wait for the arrival of the time for payment. The effect therefore is that he gets £100 worth of shares for £80. This is not like a case of a purchase by the company of goods or services, which do not admit of any exact money value being put on them, but the contract itself shows that the property in exchange for which the shares are to be given is less than the nominal value of the shares.

They cited Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, 41 W. R. 90, [1892] A. C. 125; Chapman's case, 43 W. R. 553, [1895] 1 Ch. 771; Welton v. Saffery, 45 W. R. 508, [1897] A. C. 299; In re Wragg (Limited), 45 W. R. 557, [1897] 1 Ch. 796; In re Almada Tirito Co., 36 W. R. 593, 38 Ch. D. 415.

Neville, K.C., Astbury, K.C., and Holmes, for the defendants.—This is not an issue of shares at a discount, but an issue of debentures at a discount, a transaction which is perfectly lawful. On the issue of the debenture share there becomes due from the company a debt of £100 and the company can pay off that debt by the issue of shares to that amount. The consideration for the shares is not the £80 paid by the debenture-holder but the quittance of the debt of £100 due from the company to the debenture-holders. The alternative view is to regard the debenture as an investment, and the giving of shares for property other than shares does not come within the rule against issuing shares at a discount so long as the consideration is not illusory. This cannot be treated as a colourable device for issuing £100 shares for £80. The shares can have no value unless the debentures are paid in full, and no one would exercise this option unless the shares were at a premium.

Buckmaster, K.C., replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The basis of the motion was that the issue of debentures, according to this scheme, constituted, or at all events would cover, the issue of shares at a discount—that is to say, the issue of one hundred £1 shares fully paid at a price of £80. There is, of course, no doubt about the obligation of a shareholder to pay to the company the full amount of his shares, as Lord Macnaghten pointed out in the Ooregum case, continuing as long as anything remains unpaid on his shares, but the liability, as the law now stands, and as it stood in 1862, can be discharged by payment in money, or (with the consent of the company) by payment in money's worth, and the court will not, if there is a valid contract, which, since the repeal of section 25 of the Act of 1867, no longer requires registration by the company for the acceptance of something of substantial value as money's worth, inquire into the adequacy of the consideration: see In re Wragg (Limited). But the cases decide that a man must really pay for the shares. And, further, that if the contract makes it manifest on its face that the taker of the share is paying less than their nominal cash value, he may be liable for the balance. If the consideration is illusory, or if it permits an obvious money measure to be made showing that discount was allowed, or if the shares are openly issued at a discount, the shareholder may be called on to pay the balance in cash. It seems obvious, therefore, that, if the company propose to issue shares under conditions which disclose any of the features to which I have referred, the person getting the allotment of shares would pay for them less than their nominal cash value, and such an issue ought to be restrained. It seems to me in the present case that the immediate consideration for the issue of shares to a debenture-holder demanding such allotment in exchange for, or in satisfaction of his debenture, is clearly the surrender of the debenture, and the mere fact that the debenture was purchased at a discount of 20 per cent. will not afford an obvious money measure showing that a discount was allowed in the price of the shares. Test it in this way: Suppose the debentures to have been issued at a discount of 20 per cent., and subsequently, quite independently of any contract at the time of the issue of the debentures, the company is minded to buy up as many of the debentures as the debenture-holders will sell, allotting one hundred £1 shares in exchange for a £100 debenture, could it possibly be said that those shares were issued at an obvious discount? I think not. The surrender of the £100 debenture might well be of the full money's worth of £100 cash, and in the great majority of cases would be so. The question therefore arises, does it make any difference that the bargain to issue the one hundred £1 shares in exchange for the £100 debenture issued at the price of £80 was part and parcel of the consideration for the issue of the £100 debenture at the price of £80? It seems to me that such a bargain might be a very good bargain for a company to make who wished to borrow on debentures a large sum of money required for the development of the enterprize of the company. It is true, however, that it might be a very bad bargain for the company, and, what is really essential, such a bargain might enable the debenture-holders who claim the allotment of shares to escape the statutory obligation to pay the full nominal amount of their shares. If the debentures were exchanged for shares immediately after the issue of the debentures, the practical result would be that the shares, although nominally issued in exchange for the surrender of debentures, would really be issued at a discount—i.e., one hundred £1 shares for a payment of £80. The answer given by the company to this is, that as a matter of business no man would surrender a £100 debenture, which would always be entitled to payment in full before the shareholders could touch a penny, in exchange for one hundred £1 shares, unless and until such shares were selling at par in the market, and probably not unless and until such shares were at a premium. It is said in answer to this that it is not impossible, especially as the circular contemplated the issue of debentures to shareholders, that such shareholders might, for the purpose of Stock Exchange operations, exchange immediately their debentures for shares. The fact, however, clearly appears that the bargain referred to in the circular has this blot, that it might result in shares being issued practically at a discount. I think that the real question is, Does this bargain give to the company that which the company as business men might fairly regard as money's worth for the full nominal value of the shares? It is not sufficient for the company to say the bargain was made in good faith. The company must at least establish that there is no obvious money measure on the face of this bargain showing that the shares were issued at a discount. Is this money measure made obvious by the fact that the company bind themselves at any time after the issue of the debentures to allot shares to the full nominal value of the debentures, although those debentures were issued at a discount of 20 per cent.? The case is on the border line, but I am inclined to think that Buckley, J., ought to have issued the injunction asked for, on the ground that the issue of debentures on the proposed terms was open to abuse, even if the agreement was not illusory, but a real agreement honestly made. The appeal must be allowed.

I wish to add one word before I leave this case. It was established long ago that the obligation of a shareholder to pay the full nominal value of his shares need not be satisfied in cash, but might be satisfied in money's worth. It has also been held that the court will not, if it is satisfied that there is an honest bargain under which the money's worth is paid, inquire into the adequacy of the consideration. These two propositions have been affirmed by the highest tribunal, and I am not suggesting for a moment that the cases which established them were not properly decided, having regard to the terms of the Companies Act, 1862; but I hope that the day may come when it will be gravely considered by the Legislature whether it is not for the advantage of the community, and in particular of the commercial community, that an Act should be passed that in all cases the full nominal value of the shares shall be paid in cash and nothing else. I am satisfied from my own judicial experience in the administration of companies that such a law would have a tendency to check a great deal of unwholesome speculation on the Stock Exchange which is largely fed and supported by operations undertaken by vendors, promoters, and others for the purpose of unloading fully-paid shares which they have been allowed to satisfy by giving what is called money's worth instead of making a cash payment.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal ought to be allowed on the short ground that there has been pointed out a blot in the scheme which entitles the plaintiff to relief.

We have before us the form of debenture which is proposed to be issued in pursuance of the scheme, and under condition 10 of that debenture any person having daid £80 to the company, and having received in exchange for such payment a debenture for £100, may forthwith leave at the registered office of the company a notice in writing directing the company to allot and issue to him one hundred fully-paid shares of £1 each in the company, and the company upon the surrender of the debenture will be bound to comply with the direction. If the company does not so comply, will the shares be validly issued? To my mind the result, obvious on the face of the transaction, will be the issue of shares of the nominal value of £100, in consideration of the payment of £80 only in cash—a transaction which is prohibited by the Legislature: see Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper and Welton v. Saffery. It is said that the issue of the debentures is not made with any intention of evading the rule which forbids the issue of shares at a discount, and I am quite willing to believe that no such intention exists on the part of the directors of this company. Nevertheless, if in fact the shares are issued at a discount, the honesty or good intentions of the contracting parties will not avail them, as is clearly established by the cases I have just mentioned. It is further said that although the result which I have pointed out may be possible, it is most improbable. I do not feel sure of this, for the shares of the company are dealt in on the Stock Exchange, and are of a highly speculative nature, and I cannot tell what steps the speculator in these shares may see fit to take in order to enable him to obtain control of the market. But I think that the possibility of such a transaction taking place is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff shareholders to an injunction of some kind. I desire in support of that view to refer to a passage in Lord Watson's speech in Ooregum Gold Mining Co. of India v. Roper, which was partly cited by Buckley, J., in his judgment. Lord Watson said: "It has been decided that, under the Act of 1862, shares may be lawfully issued as fully paid-up, for considerations which the company has agreed to accept as representing in money's worth the nominal value of the shares. I do not think any other decision could have been given in the case of a genuine transaction of that nature where the consideration was the substantial equivalent of full payment of the shares in cash. The possible objection to such an arrangement is that the company may over-estimate the value of the consideration, and therefore receive less than nominal value for its shares. The court would doubtless refuse effect to a colourable transaction entered into for the purpose or with the obvious result of enabling the company to issue its shares at a discount; but it has been ruled that so long as the company honestly regards the consideration given as fairly representing the nominal value of the shares in cash, its estimate ought not to be critically examined. That state of the law is certainly calculated to induce companies who are in want of money, and whose shares are unsaleable at a discount, to pay extravagant prices for goods or work to persons who are willing to take payment in shares. The rule is capable of being abused, and I have little doubt that it has been liberally construed in practice." Bearing in mind that the rule is capable of abuse, and it appearing, as I say, on the face of the documents we have before us that there is here a possibility of the scheme as it now stands being made use of with the result that shares will be issued at a discount, I think that an injunction ought to be granted.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This appeal raises a highly important and very difficult question. Is it competent for a limited company in consideration of £80 to contract to issue a fully-paid share of £100, whenever requested so to do? Put in that bare form the answer to the question admits of no doubt. The transaction would result in the issue of shares at a discount. It is, however, urged that all objection is removed if the £80 is advanced to the company by way of loan upon the terms that the company shall pay £100 at a future date with interest in the meantime, and shall give the lender the option at any time to demand a fully-paid £100 share in exchange for the £100 debenture. The issue of the debenture at a discount is admittedly lawful, and it is urged that the result of the issue of the debenture is that the company will be legally indebted in the sum of £100 payable at a future date, and that, if and when the debenture-holder gives a notice to the company, such as is contemplated by condition 8 (b) of the debenture in the present case, the £100 will become immediately payable by the company, and this debt will be cancelled on the allotment of a fully-paid share of £100. The company will thus have received £100, and the share will not have been issued at a discount. Now, it is obvious that such a scheme may be used as a means for issuing shares at a discount, the debenture being issued on one day and surrendered on the next day. It would be idle to deny in such circumstances that £80 was the only cash payment for the £100 shares. Nor would it avail the shareholder assert that he had paid for his share otherwise than in cash by surrendering his debenture for £100, inasmuch as, to use the language of Vaughan Williams, J., in Chapman's case, it would be manifest on the face of the contract that the shareholder was really paying less than the nominal cash value. I do not think we ought to consider the motive or intention of the company in issuing the debentures in this form. The Ooregum case disposes of any such idea. I assume in favour of the directors that, from a business point of view, the transaction is expedient, but that is unimportant if the transaction is contrary to the policy of the Act of Parliament. Nor do I think we ought to consider the probability that this option will not be exercised until some distant future date. But if we are to consider it, I regard shares in a mining company of this nature as gambling counters for use on the Stock Exchange, and I can readily imagine that, for the purpose of creating or destroying a "corner" an option of this nature may be of great and immediate value to speculators at the Stock Exchange. In my opinion, an injunction ought to be granted to restrain the directors from carrying into effect the proposed allotment of debentures pursuant to the scheme in the circular of the 25th of April, on this short and simple ground—that the directors propose thereby to confer an immediate right to demand a £100 share in consideration of a cash payment of £80 only. I desire to guard myself against the supposition that the conclusion at which I have arrived involves the proposition that under no circumstances can a debenture be issued at a discount which may confer a right at some future date to demand a fully-paid share in exchange for the debenture. It is sufficient to say that whenever such a question comes before the court it will be discussed and decided with the care and deliberation which its importance demands.

In re PALMER'S DECORATION AND FURNISHING CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debentures—Claims upon registered holder—Transfer—Rights of transferee—Conditions of debenture—Right to be registered,

A company issued debentures to B. under the misapprehension that B. had given value for them, which was not the case. The moneys secured were expressed to be payable to B. "or the registered holder thereof for the time being." One of the indorsed conditions was that the moneys secured would be paid "without regard to any equities between the company and the original holder," and that the receipt of the registered holder should be a good discharge to the company for the moneys payable. Another condition was that a transfer must be delivered with such evidence of title as the company might reasonably require. B. deposited these debentures with C. to secure moneys owing to C. by B. C. had no knowledge of the defectiveness of B.'s title. C. afterwards procured a transfer from B., but he did not get himself registered, or demand to be registered, as the holder of the debentures. The company having gone into liquidation, C. demanded to be paid the sums secured by the debentures, without regard to the claims of the company upon B.

Held, that, under debentures drawn in that form, C. had no right to demand to be registered as holder, and that not being registered he was only entitled to the debentures subject to all equities existing between the company and B. with regard to them.

Held, also, that under the indorsed condition the company could refuse to register C., as not having shown a good title to the debentures.

In re Goy & Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 425, [1900] 2 Ch. 149, explained and distinguished.

Summons.

The above company was formed for the purpose of acquiring a business of decoration and furnishing carried on by P. Burnand, under the name of Palmer & Co. It was incorporated in February, 1902.

In May, 1902, the company entered into an agreement with Burnand for the purchase of his business for the sum of £1,893, which was to be satisfied, as to £400 by debentures issued by the company, and as to the balance of £1,493 in shares.

By clause 10 of the agreement Burnand agreed to subscribe in cash for £1,800 in debentures of the company. Subsequently the directors of the company, being in the belief that Burnand had expended certain moneys of his own on behalf of the company to the amount of £1,425, treated that as being in satisfaction pro tanto of his obligations under the agreement, and they accordingly issued to him fifteen debentures for £100 each, as regards four of them as part of the consideration for the sale of the business, and as regards eleven of them, in pursuance of clause 10 of the agreement for sale.

By these debentures the company promised to pay the moneys thereby secured, in accordance with the indorsed conditions, to Burnand, "or other the registered holder for the time being."

The following were among the conditions indorsed:

"3. The registered holder, or his legal personal representatives, will be regarded as exclusively entitled to the benefit of this debenture, and all persons may act accordingly, and the company shall not be bound to enter in the register notice of any trust or to recognize any right in any other person save as herein provided."

"4. Every transfer of this debenture must be in writing under the hand of the registered holder or his legal personal representatives, or if the registered holder is a corporation, under the seal of such corporation. The transfer must be delivered at the registered office of the company with a fee of 2s. 6d., and such evidence of identity or title as the company may reasonably require, and thereupon the transfer will be registered and a note of such registration will be indorsed hereon. The company shall be entitled to retain the transfer."

"8. The principal moneys and interest hereby secured will be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original or any intermediate holder hereof, and the receipt of the registered holder for such principal moneys or interest shall be a good discharge to the company therefor."

By condition 11 the principal moneys became payable if (among other events) an effective resolution should be passed for the winding up of the company.

These eleven debentures were, however, issued to Burnand under a misapprehension. Burnand had not in fact expended his own moneys on behalf of the company, as his lordship found, and consequently had not performed so far his obligations under the agreement of sale; and he was not properly entitled to the debentures. At the time of the transaction next mentioned, and for long before, Burnand was indebted to the respondent, R. E. Campbell, for £7,500, which was secured by promissory notes and by the deposit of certain shares. On the 5th of July, 1902, at Burnand's request, Campbell, who was unaware of the circumstances under which the debentures had been issued to Burnand, gave him back the shares, and accepted from him in their place these fifteen debentures of Palmer's Decoration and Furnishing Co., and Campbell had ever since held them. In February, 1903, the company went into voluntary liquidation. In April, 1903, Campbell procured a transfer of the debentures from Burnand, but although he claimed to be entitled to the moneys secured, and later on sent the transfer to the liquidator of the company, he never made any demand to have the transfer registered. The facts with regard to the supposed payments by Burnand on behalf of the company having become known to the liquidator, he did not register the transfer, and the question arose as to the equities of the company in respect of the eleven debentures.

A further question arose between the company and the respondent Shand, and other respondents to the summons, in connection with Burnand, as to whether certain promissory notes held by Shand purporting to be drawn on behalf of the company were drawn with the authority of the company. These other respondents were indirectly liable for the payment of these notes. His lordship found that the company had in fact adopted the liability for these notes, and the case is not reported upon this question.

Under these circumstances the liquidator took out this summons against Shand, Campbell, the trustee in bankruptcy of Burnand, and other respondents asking (among other things) whether Campbell, as assignee of Burnand under the assignment of April, 1903, held or was entitled to hold the fifteen debentures in question subject to or discharged from certain disqualifications, equities, and rights of set-off, and otherwise, arising between the company and Burnand.

Sargant, for the liquidator.—The company has a right of set-off against Burnand, and Campbell as his assignee, against their claims under these debentures: Christie v. Taunton, Delmard, Lane, & Co., 41 W. R. 475, [1893] 2 Ch. 175. Any equity in respect of the debentures which the company has against the transferor is equally enforceable against the transferee: In re South Blackpool Hotel Co., Ex parte James, L. Schiller, for Shand.

Hughes, K.C., and Leuchars, for the guarantors of the promissory notes.—Until registration the transferee has no right as against the equities of the company. There may be circumstances which would entitle him to registration, but until he is registered he can only sue in the name of his transferor: In re Richard Smith & Co. (Limited), Ir. Rep. [1901] 1 Ch. 73.

Waggett, for Campbell.—Campbell has a right to demand to be registered, being a bonâ fide holder for value (In re Goy & Co. (Limited), 48 W. R. 425, [1900] 2 Ch. 149; In re Brown & Gregory (Limited), 52 W. R. 412, [1904] 1 Ch. 627, 632), and must be treated as being in the position of registered holder. He is therefore entitled to the debentures free from all equities between the company and Burnand under condition 8. Condition 4 only enables the company to require evidence that the share is unincumbered, and does not entitle the company to refuse to register because of equities.

BUCKLEY, J.—If Burnand held the eleven debentures in question they would have been of no value to him, having been obtained by misrepresentation. But Burnand is not the claimant, but Campbell; and Campbell is a person to whom Burnand owed money long before the 5th of June, 1902, when Campbell gave up the shares and accepted the deposit of fifteen debentures instead. On the 5th of February, 1903, the company was wound up. On the 26th of April, 1903, Campbell, as the depositee of the debentures, procured from Burnand a transfer of them to himself, and he gave notice to the liquidator not to pay the money secured to Burnand. But he made no demand for registration of the transfer. Now, has Campbell any better title that Burnand to those debentures? The debentures provide that the money secured shall be paid in accordance with the indorsed conditions to Burnand "or other registered holder for the time being." The relevant conditions are 3, 4, and 8. [His lordship read them.] Now, suppose Campbell to have made a demand to the liquidator to have the transfer registered, would he or his transferee have had the right to compel the company to register it, so as to destroy the rights which the company possessed as between itself and the transferor? In my opinion he would not. The object of the conditions as here expressed is that, if the transferree becomes the registered holder of the debentures, the company shall be precluded as from the date of the registration from setting up as against the transferee any rights it may have against the original holder. But I do not think that in this case there is any contract that the holder shall be entitled to transfer his debentures to another free from all equities existing between himself and the company. There is a form of debenture which will have that effect. But a debenture in the form of those before me only affords protection to the transferee when he has been put upon the register. The argument on behalf of Campbell is that as transferee he is entitled to have the transfer registered free from the equities of the company against the transferor; and In re Goy was cited as an authority for that view. But I do not think that Stirling, J., intended to decide this. In that case the transferee substantially demanded registration of the transfer at the time when it was sent in, and at that time the company were not setting up any claim against the transferor. I do not think that the learned judge meant to decide that if the company had had equities against the transferor at the date of the transfer, and had in consequence refused to register it, the transferee could have compelled the company to do so. Moreover, so far as appears from the report, the conditions upon the debentures in that case were not the same as those here. The words "and the receipt of the registered holder for such principal moneys or interest shall be a good discharge to the company therefor," which are in condition 8 here, were not there. These words show that it is the registered holder who is referred to in the condition. As regards condition 4, by which the company is entitled to require evidence of title, that gives the company, in my opinion, plenty of room to refuse to register Campbell, upon the ground that his title is deficient. I think, then, that even if Campbell had demanded registration from the company it would have been entitled to refuse and insist upon its equities against Burnand. But in fact he never made the demand. He only asked to be paid the moneys secured by the debentures. I therefore think that Campbell is in no better position as regards these eleven debentures than Burnand, and that the company can insist upon its equities against him. I hold, then, that the claim of Campbell fails, and that that of Shand succeeds.

Will—Estate duty—Death duties payable out of particular fund—Settlement estate duty—Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), s. 19 (1).

A direction in a will to pay out of a particular fund the death duties payable out of the testator's estate covers settlement estate duty.

Originating summons.

By her will dated the 3rd of July, 1889, the testatrix gave certain specific chattels to the trustees and executors appointed by the will upon trust for certain cestuis que trust as life tenants, with remainders over, and thereafter gave to her trustees all the moneys belonging and due to the testatrix and out of all investments of and securities for money of which she had absolute power of disposal, upon trust to pay thereout all her funeral and testamentary expenses and the death duties payable out of her estate, and to pay the net residue thereof to certain beneficiaries.

The summons was taken out by the executors and trustees of the will to determine (inter alia) whether the settlement estate duty payable in respect of the specific chattels settled by the will was payable out of the settled property or out of the fund provided for the payment of the death duties.

T. A. Nash, for the trustees.

Ward Coldridge, for the residuary legatees.

A. Adams, for the life tenants of the specific chattels.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question is whether the expression amounts to an "express provision to the contrary" within the meaning of section 19 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896. The language used in the will is broad, and there is no reason for a restriction of its generality. Settlement estate duty is a death duty; moreover, estate duty, which includes settlement estate duty, is declared to be a death duty in section 13 (3) of the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30). But for the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Lewis, [1900] 2 Ch. 176—where the direction was to pay "all duties payable by law" out of the testator's estate, out of a specific fund, and in which it was held that the provision did not include settlement estate duty—it would be clear that the direction to pay death duties would include settlement estate duty. That case is distinguishable from In re Pimm, Sharpe v. Hodgson, 52 W. R. 648, [1904] 2 Ch. 345. In the latter case estate duty was held payable out of the residuary estate under a direction to pay "my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and duties" out of the proceeds of the residuary estate.

There is in the present case an express provision within sub-section 1 of section 19 of the Finance Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 28), and the settlement estate duty payable in respect of the settled chattels must be borne by the fund expressly provided by the will for the payment of the death duties in exoneration of the settled articles.

Court of Appeal.

EARL v. LUBBOCK. (a.)

Negligence — Contract to repair van — Negligence in repairing—Injury to driver—Liability of repairer.

The defendant agreed with a mineral water manufacturer to keep his vans in good and substantial repair for a period of three years. During the period a servant of the defendant negligently repaired a van, and in consequence thereof one of the wheels came off and the plaintiff, who was a driver in the employment of the mineral water manufacturer and who was driving the van at the time, was thrown off and injured. Neither the defendant nor his servant knew of the defective condition of the van after it was repaired. In an action by the driver against the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant,

Held, that in the circumstances the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff, there being no contractual relation between them, and the action was not maintainable.

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.), affirming the decision of the judge of the Bloomsbury County Court.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries. The defendant, who was a master wheelwright, had contracted with Beaufoy & Co., who were mineral water manufacturers, "to keep in good and substantial repair" their vans for a period of three years. On one occasion the wheel of one of the vans required repairing, and the defendant's men repaired it.

While the plaintiff was driving the van later on the same day, the wheel came off and the plaintiff was thrown out and injured. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant's servant repaired the wheel of the van in a negligent and unskilful manner, whereby the accident happened. There was no evidence that the defendant or his servant knew of the defective condition of the van after it was repaired.

At the trial, at the close of the plaintiff's case, the county court judge directed judgment to be entered for the defendant upon the ground that, even assuming that there was negligence on the part of the defendant or his servant in repairing the van, he owed no duty to the plaintiff, with whom he had no contractual relation.

The Divisional Court affirmed this judgment.

The plaintiff appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and W. M. Thompson, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is liable for the negligence of his servant acting within the scope of his employment in negligently repairing the van whereby the plaintiff was injured. The act of repair being an act of misfeasance, the defendant is liable. For a mere act of non-repair—that is, mere nonfeasance, no one can sue except the person with whom the contract is made to do the repair. But a person who has undertaken to repair a chattel owes a duty to the person or to the class of persons who will to his knowledge use the chattel to exercise due care in repairing it: Hayn v. Culliford, 27 W. R. 541, 4 C. P. D. 182. It may also be put in this way: A person who represents himself as a skilled man, and who, having repaired a van, hands it over to another man to drive, owes a duty to the driver to exercise due care in repairing the van. Elliott v. Hall, 15 Q. B. D. 315, shows that such duty exists. Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109, was decided on demurrer to the declaration, and the declaration only alleged a negligent failure to repair the coach, a mere nonfeasance. That case, therefore, is not against the plaintiff's contention. Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, is not in point. In that case there was a sale of a lamp by a tradesman to a man to be used by himself and his wife, and the lamp exploded owing to a defect in its construction, and injured the wife. The seller did not know of the defect. It was held that there was no misfeasance towards the wife independently of the contract, and that she could not sue the seller. In the present case there was an act of misfeasance in negligently repairing the van, and there was a duty towards the person using the van to take reasonable care in executing the repairs, because want of such care would cause danger and physical injury, as distinguished from injury to the pocket, as in Scholes v. Brook, 63 L. T. 837, 64 L. T. 674, 39 W. R. Dig. 133. George v. Skivington, 18 W. R. 118, L. R. 5 Ex. 1, is exactly in point, and it has never been overruled. What had been said about it was that Cleasley, B., had apparently confused negligence and fraud, but the judgments of Kelly, C.B., and Channell and Pigott, B.B., were not open to that criticism. That case was referred to by Collins, M.R., in Clarke v. Army and Navy Co-Operative Society, [1903] 1 K. B. 155, at p. 158, 51 W. R. Dig. 138, apparently with approval. [COLLINS, M.R.—In Heaven v. Pender, 30 W. R. 749, 9 Q. B. D. 302, Field and Cave, JJ., treated George v. Skivington as being inconsistent with Winterbottom v. Wright, and said that they preferred the latter case; and Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ. (11 Q. B. D. 503), seemed to agree with that view.] The plaintiff's case comes within the principle laid down by Cotton and Bowen, L.JJ., in Heaven v. Pender, and it is unnecessary to rely upon the wider proposition laid down by Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 510, though, if necessary, that proposition can be supported.

They also referred to Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. N. S. 553, 10 W. R. C. L Dig. 16; Parry v. Smith, 27 W. R. 801, 4 C. P. D. 325; Thrussell v. Handyside, 20 Q. B. D. 359, 36 W. R. Dig. 140; Le Lievre v. Gould, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 1 Q. B. 491; Cunnington v. Great Northern Railway Co., 49 L. T. 392; Hopkins v. Great Eastern Railway Co., 60 J. P. 86; Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. Rep. 397.

Montague Lush, K.C., and Lincoln Reed, for the defendant, were not called upon, but referred to Lord Herschell's speech in Caledonian Railway Co. v. Mulholland, 46 W. R. 236, [1898] A. C. 216, as to the real effect of the decision in Heaven v. Pender.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action by the plaintiff, a driver in the employment of Beaufoy & Co., who owned a number of vans, to recover damages from the defendant, who was under a contract with Beaufoy & Co. to repair their vans, in respect of an accident to the wheel of the van which the plaintiff was driving, whereby the wheel came off and the plaintiff was injured. The county court judge, at the close of the plaintiff's case, directed judgment to be entered for the defendant upon the ground that he was under no duty to the plaintiff in the matter, and that therefore the plaintiff had no cause of action. The Divisional Court affirmed this decision. The Divisional Court have elaborately gone through the various cases, and it is unnecessary to do so over again. I think that the case is reasonably clear, and I confess that I do not share the difficulty felt by Kennedy, J., upon the point. The process of reasoning has been gone through in various cases, and the line of liability has been clearly laid down. In my opinion the case is concluded by the decision in Winterbottom v. Wright, which in its circumstances is indistinguishable from the present case, and which since its decision in 1842 has stood the test of repeated discussion. The law was laid down in that case and laid down in such a way as to bring this case within it. Lord Abinger, C.B., said (10 M. & W. 109, at p. 114): "Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who entered into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I see no limit, would ensue. Where a party becomes responsible to the public, by undertaking a public duty, he is liable, though the injury may have arisen from the negligence of his servant or agent. So, in cases of public nuisances, whether the act was done by the party as a servant, or in any other capacity, you are liable to an action at the suit of any person who suffers. Those, however, are cases where the real ground of the liability is the public duty, or the commission of the public nuisance. There is also a class of cases in which the law permits a contract to be turned into a tort; but unless there has been some public duty undertaken, or public nuisance committed, they are all cases in which an action might have been maintained upon the contract. Thus, a carrier may be sued either in assumpsit or case; but there is no instance in which a party who was not privy to the contract entered into by him can maintain any such action. The plaintiff in this case could not have brought an action on the contract; if he could have done so, what would have been his situation, supposing the Postmaster-General had released the defendant? That would, at all events, have defeated his claim altogether. By permitting this action we should be working this injustice, that after the defendant had done everything to the satisfaction of his employer, and after all matters between them had been adjusted, and all accounts settled on the footing of their contract, we should subject them to be ripped open by this action of tort being brought against him." It seems to me that the principle there laid down, which has been affirmed and re-affirmed in subsequent cases, is conclusive of the present case. In my judgment there is no question here of the delivery to a person of a dangerous article, one of the circumstances which would give rise to a cause of action in a person not a party to the contract. The circumstance was pointed out by Parke, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Ex. 761, at p. 767: "And it may be the same when any one delivers to another without notice an instrument in its nature dangerous, or under particular circumstances, as a loaded gun which he himself loaded, and that other person to whom it is delivered is injured thereby, or if he places it in a situation easily accessible to a third person, who sustains damage from it. A very strong case to that effect is Dixon v. Bell, 5 M. & S. 198. But it would be going much too far to say that so much care is required in the ordinary intercourse of life between one individual and another that, if a machine not in its nature dangerous—a carriage, for instance—but which might become so by a latent defect entirely unknown, although discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, should be lent or given by one person, even by the person who manufactured it, to another, the former should be answerable to the latter for a subsequent damage accruing by the use of it." In the present case there was a van which according to the evidence was not visibly out of repair in any particular which was likely to lead to the mischief which actually happened. The van cannot, in my opinion, be said to come within the category of dangerous articles to which the principle above referred to applies. It is then said that the case comes within the wider principle enunciated by Lord Esher, M.R., in Heaven v. Pender. That, however, was not the decision of the court, nor was it concurred in by the other members of the court, and it was subsequently qualified and explained by Lord Esher himself. It is sufficient to say that the judgment of the court is contained in the judgment of Cotton, L.J., with which Bowen, L.J., agreed, and this case does not come within measurable distance of that judgment. The plaintiff has failed to bring the case within this principle, and failing to do so, the decision in Winterbottom v. Wright is conclusive, a decision which has survived the controversy that has raged round the point for over half a century. The appeal therefore fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In order that the plaintiff should succeed he must bring himself within the proposition laid down by Cotton, L.J., in Heaven v. Pender, and concurred in by Bowen, L.J.: "Anyone who leaves a dangerous instrument, as a gun, in such a way as to cause danger, or who without due warning supplies to others for use an instrument or thing which to his knowledge, from its construction or otherwise, is in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to the use of such an instrument or thing, is liable for injury caused to others by reason of his negligent act." That passage was cited to the county court judge, and was mainly relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel. As to the first branch of that proposition, dealing with liability for leaving a dangerous instrument in such a way as to cause danger, I take it that that refers to an instrument dangerous in itself. That is shown by the illustration given of a gun, and also by what is dealt with in the second branch of the proposition—namely, an instrument or thing which is in such a condition as to cause danger, not necessarily incident to the use of such an instrument or thing. In my opinion a van does not fall within the first branch of the above proposition, and the plaintiff has accordingly to bring himself within the second branch, and so it was his duty to adduce evidence that, to the knowledge of the defendant, the van, when repaired, was in such a condition as to cause danger. Having read what took place in the county court, I do not see that the plaintiff was in a position to satisfy that requirement. The appeal therefore fails.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The counsel for the plaintiff has addressed to us a very courageous argument. If we were to adopt his contention, it seems to me that anyone in Beaufoy & Co.'s employment who sustained personal injury traceable to the defective condition of the van would have a right of action against the defendant. If the contention were well founded a great many branches of trade would necessarily cease to be carried on. What sane man would sell an article, it may be for a very small sum, if he were to be liable to an action by a third person who was no party to the contract of sale for injury caused by the defective condition of the article, a defective condition which was unknown to him? Suppose, again, that a man repairs an omnibus, and by his negligence it is sent back in a defective condition, though the defective condition is unknown to him, and in consequence of its condition an accident happens to it, according to the argument everyone who was in the omnibus at the time and who was injured by the accident would have an action against the man who repaired the omnibus, because he or his servant was negligent in repairing it. A person who makes a contract knows, or may be taken to know, the measure of damages to which he may be liable to his contractor, and he can regulate the price to be charged accordingly; but he cannot calculate his liability if he were, so to speak, an insurer against possible accidents to anyone arising from his negligence. I agree that there is no evidence here that this van was returned to Beaufoy & Co. in a dangerous condition, and I agree with the judgments delivered by my lord and my brother Stirling.

CHRISTY v. TIPPER. (a.)

Trade-mark — Word — Invented word — Descriptive — Patents, &c., Acts, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64 (1) (d) (e), and 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 10.

In order to determine what words are proper for registration as trade-marks, the court will look at the word itself in every case. "Absorbine," applied to an absorbent medicament, is not an invented word but a variation of "absorb," and has reference to the character or quality of the article; it is consequently not a proper word for registration.

Appeal from a decision of Joyce, J. (reported 52 W. R. 414, [1904] 1 Ch. 696).

The plaintiffs, Christy & Co., were agents in England for the sale of a veterinary preparation called "Absorbine," manufactured by the plaintiff Young in America, for use in the cure by absorption of swellings in horses and cattle.

They had registered the name as a trade-mark, and brought this action to restrain the defendants from infringing that trade-mark, and from passing off their goods as the goods of the plaintiffs.

The defendants were large manufacturers of horse and cattle medicines, and had for long sold an ointment of their own called "Absorbent," the name of which they had recently, in ignorance of the plaintiffs' preparation, altered to "Absorbine." They denied infringement and moved to expunge the plaintiffs' mark from the register as being not an invented word but one descriptive of the character or quality of the article sold thereunder, and therefore not registrable according the Patents, &c., Acts, 1883, s. 64 (1) (d) (e), and 1888, s. 10.

The charge of passing off was not pursued.

The learned judge held that the word in question had obvious reference to the character or quality of the goods, and that it was not an invented word, being a mere combination of syllables or parts not themselves invented, and he dismissed the plaintiffs' action and ordered the mark to be expunged from the register.

The plaintiff Young appealed.

Neville, K.C., and Sebastian, for the appellant, cited Eastman, &c. (Limited) v. Comptroller General ("Solio" case), 47 W. R. 152, [1898] A. C. 571, 581 (per Lord Herschell), and Wellcome v. Thompson ("Tabloid" case), 52 W. R. 581, [1904] 1 Ch. 736.

Younger, K.C., and E. P. Hewitt, for the respondents, were not called upon.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—Our decision will not deprive the trade of any advantage or of anything which, as has been argued, they have counted on as the result of legislation. In every case of this kind we must look at the word itself. In my opinion "Absorbine" is a mere variation of the word "absorb" and indicates that the article absorbs. I am of opinion that the word shows no invention, such as there was in the word "Solio" in Eastman v. Comptroller-General, which, though it may have been derived from "Sol," was not a mere variation of it. Under these circumstances the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., concurred.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. EARL OF LONDESBOROUGH. (a.)

Inland revenue — Estate duty — Exemption — Personal property settled by will of person dying before the Finance Act — Subsequent conversion of personal property into real estate — Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 21, sub-section 1.

A testator who died before the Finance Act, 1894, bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to convert it into money and to invest the money in real estate to the use of a tenant for life with remainder to the use of the eldest son of the tenant for life in tail male. Probate duty was duly paid on the personal estate, and the residue was invested in the purchase of real estate which was conveyed to the uses of the testator's will.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, reversing the judgment of Channell, J., that on the true construction of section 21, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty was not payable on the death of the tenant for life in respect of such real estate.

Information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty on the death of William Henry Forester, Earl of Londesborough.

The following facts appeared from the information and the answer of the defendant, the present earl, who was the eldest son of the deceased earl:

William Joseph Denison, by will dated the 3rd of August, 1848, devised all his manors, lands, and other hereditaments situate in the counties of York and Surrey or elsewhere to the use of his nephew, Lord Albert Denison Conyngham, for his life, with remainder to the use of William Henry Forester Conyngham, the eldest son of his said nephew, and his assigns for life, with remainder to the use of the first and every other son of William Henry Forester Conyngham severally, successively, and in remainder one after another in tail male, with certain remainders over. The testator bequeathed all his personal estate to trustees upon trust to convert into money all his residuary personal estate, and within ten years of his death to invest the money in the purchase of real estate and to settle the real estate so purchased in the same manner and to the same uses as were expressed in the will concerning the testator's real estate.

The testator died on the 3rd of August, 1849, and his executors, having paid probate duty on his personal estate, handed over to the trustees of the will the residuary personal estate, amounting in all to £1,594,175 19s. 2d. The trustees of the will invested that final residue in the purchase of hereditaments, which were duly conveyed to the uses of the testator's will.

Lord Albert Denison Conyngham was in 1850 created Baron Londesborough. He died in January, 1860, and was succeeded by his eldest son, the said William Henry Forester Conyngham, as the second Baron Londesborough, and also as tenant for life to the estates devised by and subject to the trusts declared by the will of William Joseph Denison, including the estates purchased with the residuary personalty of the testator.

By an indenture dated the 18th of May, 1886, made between the second Lord Londesborough, his eldest son (the defendant), and others, the estates held under the settlements in the will of William Joseph Denison were resettled.

The second Lord Londesborough, who in 1887 was created Earl of Londesborough, died on the 19th of April, 1900, when the defendant succeeded to the estates and title.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed that estate duty was payable under the provisions of the Finance Act upon all the property the subject of the resettlement of the 18th of May, 1886.

The defendant contended that he was entitled to exemption under section 21, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, from estate duty in respect of that portion of the real estate which was derived from the investment in land of personal estate upon which probate duty had been paid under the will of William Joseph Denison.

The question for the decision of the court was whether or not the defendant was entitled to the exemption claimed.

Section 21, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, is as follows: "Estate duty shall not be payable on the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of this Act, in respect of which property any duty mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the First Schedule to this Act, or the duty payable on any representation or inventory under any Act in force before the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, has been paid, or is payable, unless in either case the deceased was at the time of his death, or at any time since the will or disposition took effect had been, competent to dispose of the property." Probate duty is one of the duties so mentioned.

CHANNELL, J.—I think in this case my judgment must be for the Crown. I quite appreciate Mr. Danckwerts' argument and the proposition of Rigby, L.J., and I personally think that the object of the Legislature was to give the benefit to settled property of having paid, before the Act came into operation, a duty which would free it from further duty of a similar kind during the continuance of the settlement. That was the object of this particular section I have no doubt. But one has to consider whether that object has been carried out in all cases, and in order to do so it is necessary to go by the Act of Parliament. It is possible that if the case of property which was personalty at the time of the settlement and had been converted into realty at the time of the death in question had been contemplated by the Legislature, they would have used other words and have given that property the benefit which they were giving to property which was personalty at the time of the settlement and remained personalty all through the settlement. It is possible they would. On the other hand, it is possible they would not, because I think, as a matter of history, this Act was somewhat directed against landed property and owners of landed property, rather to bring land into taxation in a way in which it had not been before. Therefore it does not follow that the Legislature would, if they had had the case in their direct contemplation, have provided in the way which Mr. Danckwerts suggests they have in fact provided for the case of property which was personalty at the time of settlement and had become converted into realty at the time when the question arose as to whether it should pay duty on a particular death. But it is necessary really to decide all such questions by the language. Now again, in reference to the principle that one is to lean to the lighter burden, I myself very seldom find those principles of much assistance to me. But in this particular case the duty is undoubtedly imposed by the operative words of the Act of Parliament, and the question is whether it comes within the exception, and in reference to that I think different considerations might apply. As an ordinary rule it is the person who says it comes within an exception who has to show that it does. Possibly that may be a sufficient answer to that argument, which, however, is one that seldom appeals to me very much. One has to go to the words of this clause, "estate duty shall not be payable on the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will." I have dealt with the difference between the words "by" and "under," but I think that that clearly means in respect of personal property which is at the time of the death governed by a settlement and passes on that death by virtue of the operation of the settlement. It must mean property—at present I leave out the word "personal"—which is under the operation of the settlement and not property which has at some time past been in fact settled by an instrument. It cannot mean the latter, because otherwise it would give property in respect of which these sorts of duty—probate duty and so on—had been paid, immunity for all time in respect of all future deaths, whether during the time of the continuance of the settlement or not, which is impossible. It is true that the majority of cases which would arise of that kind are provided for by the last clause "unless," but not every possible case.

I think therefore it means personal property which is at the time of the death under the operation of the settlement. Then, if so, that is the time when one has to look to see whether the property is personal or not. The exemption is not given according to that reading of it in respect of real property. Again, if the other construction is correct—namely, that the word "personal" is introduced only because the only property in respect of which the duties afterwards mentioned—namely, the probate duty and analogous duty, were payable was personal property, it was unnecessary to introduce it all.

I quite agree that it not a very strong argument, because it does sometimes happen that words are introduced, as was said by Rigby, L.J., in reference to something in the other sections of this Act, for the sake of clearness. But unfortunately the introduction of this word, if put in for the sake of clearness, has a very different operation.

In my opinion these words are too strong to enable me to accept Mr. Danckwerts' argument, although I quite accept it in principle as indicating what was probably the intention of the Legislature in passing this clause.

They have, however, used words which go beyond that intention, if that was their intention, and I give judgment for the Crown.

The defendant appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., Sir Edward Carson, S.G., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Channell, J., upon a question arising under the Finance Act, 1894. No doubt, as the Attorney-General says, the point turns upon a very few words in one section, but I think that the words are such that it is competent for us to give an interpretation of them consistent with what appears to be admitted on all hands as the intention of the Act of Parliament itself. The question arises in respect of a claim for estate duty upon the death of a tenant for life. The original settlor placed a very large estate in settlement for two lives in succession with remainders over. His estate consisted partly of realty and partly of personalty, and he gave a direction that the personalty should be invested in the purchase of land, which was to follow the trusts of his real property. The settlement was made, and the settlor died before the Finance Act, 1894, came into operation, and in the ordinary course probate duty was paid on all the personal estate. Since the coming into operation of the Finance Act the second tenant for life has died, and now on his death the Crown claims estate duty in respect of all the settled property under section 1. That section provides as follows: "In the case of every person dying after the commencement of this part of this Act, there shall, save as hereinafter expressly provided, be levied and paid, upon the principal value ascertained as hereinafter provided of all property, real or personal, settled or not settled, which passes on the death of such person, a duty called 'estate duty.'" Primâ facie, that duty would be payable in this case, unless an exemption is created by the words of the saving clause, "save as hereinafter expressly provided." So far as the Act contains any express exemption, the substantive enactment of section 1 will, of course, not apply. The particular clause which the appellant relies on as an exemption, and by virtue of which, according to him, section 1 never had any operation upon the subject-matter in respect of which duty is now claimed, is section 21, sub-section 1. That sub-section is as follows: "Estate duty shall not be payable on the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of this part of this Act, in respect of which property any duty mentioned in paragraphs one and two of the first schedule to this Act, or the duty payable on any representation or inventory under any Act in force before the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, has been paid or is payable, unless in either case the deceased was at the time of his death, or at any time since the will or disposition took effect had been, competent to dispose of the property." The duties mentioned in that sub-section include probate duty, and probate duty has been paid on the subject-matter of this information. The sub-section indicates an intention on the part of the Legislature not to allow the same duty to be demanded twice over. There is another section which points to a similar intention where the circumstances are such as to require an analogous provision of exemption. Section 5, sub-section 2, runs thus: "If estate duty has already been paid in respect of any settled property since the date of the settlement, the estate duty shall not, nor shall any of the duties mentioned in the fifth paragraph of the first schedule to this Act, be payable in respect thereof, until the death of a person who was at the time of his death, or had been at any time during the continuance of the settlement, competent to dispose of such property." That requires a second devolution on the death of some person who has actually disposed or was competent to dispose of the property, in order to let in the obligation to pay estate duty again. Both clauses were obviously introduced for the purpose of avoiding what might otherwise have operated unjustly. The Legislature, seeing the possible injustice which would arise if, in the case of a settled estate in respect of which probate duty had been paid, another duty under another name to the same amount should be exacted upon the death of a tenant for life under the settlement, introduced the clause now in question with the object of mitigating or preventing that injustice. We have high authority for saying that that was the intention of the Legislature. In Attorney-General v. Dodington, 45 W. R. 657, [1897] 2 Q. B. 373, Rigby, L.J., whose judgment was approved by the House of Lords in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Priestley, 49 W. R. 657, [1901] A. C. 208, said as follows: "I think that their intention"—i.e., the intention of the Legislature—"looked at broadly was that in the case of settled property, where probate duty has once been paid or become payable in respect of the interest of the settlor in it, that should be as effectual for the purpose of exempting the property from payment of the estate duty, as under section 5, sub-section 2, the fact that estate duty has once been paid on settled property is for the purpose of preventing a second duty from being payable." Although that was not necessary to the decision of the case then before the court, it can hardly be disputed that the principle is that, where duty has once been paid in respect of a particular subject-matter, it ought not to be again payable in respect of the same subject-matter, and the fact that the subject-matter may have changed its character after payment cannot affect that principle. If the Legislature were proposing to remedy an apparent injustice, we are bound to attribute to them the intention of carrying that purpose to its logical result of remedying the injustice whether the subject-matter on which the duty is claimed has changed its character or not. That being the principle underlying the matter, I agree with the Attorney-General that we cannot give effect to it unless the words of the statute permit it. But is seems to me that the words, when fairly read, are capable of an interpretation which will avoid all injustice. The section says that estate duty is not to be payable on the death of a deceased person in respect of personal property settled by a will or disposition made by a person dying before the commencement of the Act "in respect of which" probate duty has been paid, I think there is force in the argument put forward by Mr. Danckwerts that the expression "in respect of" must have been deliberately chosen in preference to the word "on." It seems to me that these words do more aptly express what appears to be the intention of the Legislature, and show that the Legislature were dealing with a case where a person is asked to pay a duty over again in respect of property which has already been made the subject-matter of probate duty. From the point of view of injustice it does not matter what particular shape the property has since taken. For the purpose of this sub-section the point of time which is material is not, as it seems to me, the time of the death of the person on whose death duty is claimed, but the time when the particular property, which is the subject-matter under discussion, became liable to probate duty—i.e., the time of the death of the original settlor. If there is found in the estate of the person upon whose death duty is now claimed, property in whatever shape or form in respect of which, being personal property at the time of the death of the settlor, probate duty was then paid, that comes within this exemption from estate duty. I do not find any grammatical difficulty in giving the sub-section this construction. The subject-matter in respect of which duty is here claimed was personal property settled by the will of a person dying before the Finance Act, in respect of which probate duty has been paid. It fulfils all the conditions of the sub-section, and it is not essential to its coming within the exemption that it should continue to be personal property till the death of the person on whose death duty is claimed. I agree with the Attorney-General that the clause would be easier to interpret if the word "personal" were not in it. But its presence is not an insuperable difficulty. Probate duty was only payable on personal property, and it may have been simply out of greater caution that the expression "personal property" was used. I do not think we should be right in making use of that expression to defeat what must have been the purpose of the Legislature, if they had any purpose at all in this matter. I agree with my brother Stirling that a confirmatory argument is to be derived from the definition clause, which he referred to in the course of the argument. I think, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I agree with the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls, and I will only add a word or two as to the effect of clause (f) in section 22, sub-section 1, which provides that in that part of the Act, unless the context otherwise requires, "the expression 'property' includes real property and personal property and the proceeds of sale thereof respectively, and any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale." The question is whether in this case the exemption from estate duty created by section 21, sub-section 1, applies. Now, having regard to the definition of "property" which I have just read, it seems to me that we may read "personal property" in section 21, sub-section 1, as including not merely what is usually understood by personal property, but as including also the proceeds of the sale of personal property or any money or investment for the time being representing the proceeds of sale of such property. Here, at the time when probate duty was paid, there was personal estate which had been bequeathed by the will of the testator upon trust for investment in land. That personal estate was sold, and the proceeds were applied in the purchase of land, which was conveyed to the trustees of the will and is at the present moment held by the trustees upon the trusts of the will. It appears to me that the real estate is an investment which at the death of the tenant for life represented for the time being the proceeds of sale of that personalty. The Attorney-General contends that in order that the exemption may operate, a claim must be made in respect of personal property existing as such at the death upon which the claim for estate duty is made. In my opinion that unduly limits the operation of the section. For example, suppose that the trust directed by the will had not been to convert the property, as in the present case, from personalty into realty, but had been of this nature—a direction for sale and for investment either in land or in Consols to be held for successive tenants for life, and then, at the death of the last tenant for life, upon trust for sale and distribution among persons indicated. There would then have been a binding trust ultimately for the reconversion of the property which might have been invested in land, and that property would, in the eye of a court of equity, remain personalty and nothing else. But upon the strict construction which, it is argued, should be applied to section 21, sub-section 1, if one half of the property had been invested in Consols and the other half in land, the exemption would operate in respect of so much as was invested in Consols, but would fail as regards that which was invested in land. If it had been entirely invested in Consols, it would all come within the exemption, whereas if it happened to be invested entirely in land, the exemption would not operate. It does not seem to me that that is a probable interpretation of the intention of the Legislature, and it would be inconsistent with the general scheme of the Act as pointed out by Rigby, L.J., in Attorney-General v. Dodington. I therefore agree that the appeal should be allowed.

In re LADY ANNALY'S TRUSTS.
LADY ANNALY v. HON. H. L. BOURKE. (a.)

Settlement—After-acquired property—Tenant for life—Irish Land Acts—Covenant for settling after-acquired property—Interpretation.

The bonus given to the vendor of real estate in Ireland under section 48 of the Irish Land Act, 1903 (3 Ed. 7, c. 37), is so closely connected with the land that it must be regarded as an interest in the land.

A. was tenant for life of real estate under a deed of settlement of real estate, and also tenant for life under a deed of settlement of personalty containing a covenant to settle after-acquired property, with certain specified exceptions, including (inter alia) the real estates settled by the realty settlement, or "A.'s estate or interest" therein. Part of the real estate was situate in Ireland, and under the Irish Land Act, 1903, was purchased by the occupying tenants for a gross sum of £340,380, with the result that A. was entitled, as vendor, to a bonus of £40,845 by section 48 of the said Act.

Held, that this bonus was not subject to the covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in the personalty settlement, as it was an interest in real estate specifically excepted from the operation of the said covenant.

Held, further, that as it was not within the covenant, it belonged to A. for her sole use under section 3 of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1904 (4 Ed. 7, c. 34).

In re Ely's Estates, [1904] I. R. 66, considered.

Under the will and codicil of her father Henry Viscount Clifden, in the events that had happened, Lady Annaly eventually became entitled as tenant in tail to his real estate.

By an indenture of settlement dated the 23rd of July, 1884 (herein referred to as the real estate settlement), Lady Annaly on her marriage conveyed the real estates devised by the said will and codicil, to which she was then contingently entitled, to trustees upon the usual trusts.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By another indenture of settlement of the same date (herein referred to as the personal estate settlement) Lady Annaly settled upon similar trusts certain funds to which she was entitled.

The last-mentioned settlement contained a covenant for settling Lady Annaly's after-acquired property, excepting (inter alia) the property specifically settled by the real estate settlement, "besides" Lady Annaly's "estate or interest in the real estate" settled by the said real estate settlement.

Lady Annaly had entered into over six hundred contracts under the Irish Land Act, 1903, for the sale of real estates, situate in Ireland, of which she was tenant for life under the real estate settlement. The gross purchase-money on the said sales amounted to £340,380. The bonus due to Lady Annaly as vendor by section 48 of the said Act was consequently £40,845.

The question before the court was whether this bonus ought to be brought into settlement as being after-acquired property in accordance with the covenant above recited.

KEKEWICH, J.—In order to encourage tenants to buy their land, the State, by the Irish Land Act, 1903, provides a fund out of which the purchase-money, when properly ascertained, can be paid, the purchasers to repay the State by instalments. And in order to encourage the landowner to meet the tenants, the State also provides a fund—a different fund—out of which the landowner is paid a bonus of 12 per cent. of the money advanced. I perhaps ought not to call it a bribe, but it is no doubt a valuable consideration paid to the landowner in order to induce him to sell his land to the tenants. This is the general idea of the Act. The provision in favour of the landowner is contained in the first sub-section of section 48, and although the other sub-sections ought to be read for the proper understanding of the Act, they do not bear upon the matter now under consideration.

Before going to the settlements we may consider who the landowner is. The vendor or landowner may be a limited owner, and the question arose in the case, which has been cited to me, of In re Ely's Estates, [1904] I. R. 66, whether the tenant for life is entitled to receive the bonus for his own benefit, or only as trustee for the settlement under which he took his estate for life. Ross, J., held that the tenant for life selling to his tenants was a trustee, and ought to account for the 12 per cent. to the trustees of the settlement. The Legislature, in consequence of this decision, provided in the following year that whenever the vendor is tenant for life he may retain the bonus for his own use: Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1904.

The question under consideration now is whether the bonus received by the tenant for life belongs to her for her own use, notwithstanding the personal estate settlement, or whether she must bring it into settlement under the covenant for after-acquired property.

The lady was at the time of her marriage tenant in tail of considerable real estate, part of which has been sold and has produced this bonus. She is also interested in a considerable personal estate. Two settlements were executed, a real estate settlement and a personal estate settlement. The real estate has become vested in possession and she is able to sell as tenant for life. The personal estate was settled—I speak in general terms, in the usual way. Then comes the covenant settling after-acquired property. It is in terms: If the said lady "is now, or at any time or times, or her husband in her right, shall become entitled in any manner to any estate or interest whatever, whether in real estate or otherwise. . . ." We have here a provision as to property in which she now is or may be entitled. Now, we have nothing to do in this case with property to which she was entitled at the time of the settlement. Whatever this bonus is which is created by the statute of 1903, it cannot be property to which she was entitled at the time of the settlement. It would be ridiculous even to suggest that it was in embryo. But she is entitled to it now. The Act of 1903 has given it to her, and the Act of 1904 has given it to her for her own use. She has become entitled to it during the coverture. If the question stopped there it would be within the covenant. The only thing is whether it comes within the exceptions. [His lordship then read the exception "besides the property specifically settled and besides her estate or interest in the real estate subject to the will and codicil of the late Henry Viscount Clifden, her interest in which is settled by the real estate settlement before mentioned."]

If this sum of £40,845 falls within the exception then the lady keeps it for herself, and it is not within the covenant. Does the exception exclude this bonus? That depends upon the meaning which I have to give to the words "estate or interest" in the real estates subject to the will and codicil which is settled by the real estate settlement. Is the bonus an estate or interest in that land? It is not an estate, of course, in the strict sense of the word. It is paid by the State out of a fund provided for the purpose. It is never repaid, and there is no liability upon anybody to repay it. It is a gift to the vendor, so that it cannot be said to come out of the land; and, of course, strictly, it is not an interest in the land. But I must give it some meaning. I have much assistance here from the judgment, to which I have referred, of Ross, J., in In re Ely's Estate. He was dealing with the question whether the vendor, the tenant for life, could take this bonus for himself. He says on p. 85 of the report: "It is contended for the marquis that the bonus is a gift from the gods and comes to the tenant for life as a persona designata I cannot agree. It is impossible to deny that the bonus affects the price. The tenant buys at a lower price because the vendor gets the bonus. The estate loses or is exposed to the risk of loss in order that the man whose duty it is to represent it and defend it may take a benefit."

On p. 86 he says: "With respect to the bonus I am now of opinion, having regard to the nature and the circumstances under which it is acquired, that a court of equity ought not to allow the tenant for life to appropriate this by-product of the sale to his own use. It must fasten a trust upon it in his hand and compel him to hold it for all other parties who take under the settlement as well as for himself."

This is not binding upon me, but it is an authority as to whether the tenant for life holds as trustee for the settlement before the Act of 1904. Therefore the judgment is of great value apart from all other considerations. If Lady Annaly had sold before 1904 and secured this £40,845, she would have been bound to account for it to the estate, because it is part of or connected with the sale of the estate, because she gets something which to some extent can give a value to the estate, or to put it in one word "a by-product" of the sale; she really gets it as a by-product of the estate. If this is so, it is something which she gets by reason of her limited ownership. It is something so closely connected with the land that I must regard it as an interest in these hereditaments; consequently, it is not affected by the covenant to settle after-acquired property. Of course, under the Act of 1904 she keeps it for herself. Costs of all parties out of the bonus.

A testatrix bequeathed the income of a sum of money in trust for certain schools so long as they should be carried on under the conditions of the deed of trust of the schools, and declared that if the funds for carrying on the schools should be raised under an Act of Parliament then the payment of the income to the schools should cease, and the fund should fall into her residuary estate.

Held, that as by the operation of Education Act, 1902, the schools were no longer carried on under the conditions of the deed of trust, and as the funds for carrying them on were to some extent supplied under that Act the trust for the schools had ceased, and the fund fell into the residue.

Originating summons.

This was a summons for the purpose of determining whether a legacy left by Mrs. Blunt in trust for the National Schools at Bicknor, in Kent, had become forfeited by the operation of the Education Act, 1900, upon the schools.

Isabella Dorothea Blunt, by her will in 1891, bequeathed to her trustees such a sum as when invested in the purchase in their names of certain stocks or securities therein mentioned would produce a yearly sum of £20. The will continued: "And I direct my trustees or trustee to pay such income or yearly sum to the treasurer for the time being of the Bicknor and Hucking National Schools for the support of the said schools so long as they shall be carried on under the conditions contained in the deed of trust of the said schools dated the 18th of June, 1873, and the funds necessary for so carrying them on shall be supplied by voluntary contributions. But I declare that this bequest shall not take effect, but shall be null and void if any of the three following events shall happen in my lifetime, videlicit: (1) If a school board for the parishes of Bicknor and Hucking shall be formed, or (2) if the funds necessary for carrying on the said schools shall be raised under powers for that purpose contained in any present or future Act or Acts of Parliament, or (3) if a trust shall be created and a sufficient fund shall be set apart for the purpose of carrying on the said schools under the conditions of the aforesaid deed of trust; and I further declare that if either of the two first mentioned events shall happen after my death, then immediately on the happening of such one of these events as shall first happen, the payment of the said income or yearly sum to the treasurer aforesaid under the aforesaid direction in that behalf shall cease and determine and the fund purchased to produce the same shall fall into and form part of my residuary estate." And, after other bequests, the testatrix devised and bequeathed all the residue of her estate to her nephew, E. E. Green.

By the deed of the 18th of June, 1873, the schools were conveyed to the Archdeacon of Maidstone, and his successors, upon trust to be used for the education of children of certain classes mentioned, and it was to be conducted according to the principles of the National Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor in the Principles of the Established Church. The deed contained provisions that the school and endowments should be controlled and managed by the principal officiating minister for the time being of the parish of Bicknor, who was to have the superintendence of the religious and moral instruction of the scholars attending the school, that in other respects the control and management of the school should be exercised by a committee consisting of the principal officiating minister for time being of the said parish, his licensed curate or curates if appointed by the ministers, such of the churchwardens for the time being of the said parish of Bicknor and of the ancient chapelry of Hucking as should be communicants of the Church of England, and of six other persons who were contributors of 20s. each a year at least to the funds of the school, and were communicants of the Church of England, and had a beneficial interest in real property in the parish of Bicknor, or be a resident therein or in a parish adjoining thereto. The deed contained a number of other provisions constituting the qualifications of persons who should have the right to elect the committee. There was also a provision that the provisions of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, which constitute a public elementary school should apply to the school to be constituted under that deed.

The testatrix died in April, 1900. In pursuance of the direction in the will a sum of £800 Midland 2½ per cent. Debenture Stock was purchased by the trustee of the will, and the dividends were paid to the rector for the time being of Bicknor as treasurer of the schools. The schools were now carried on in conformity with the provisions of the trust deed, being supported by voluntary contributions together with the usual Government grants. Upon the passing of the Education Act, 1902, the question arose whether upon Part III. coming into operation the income of the invested sum did not cease and fall into the residue, and the present summons was taken out for the determination of that question by the trustee of the will of Mrs. Blunt against the present managers of the schools and residuary legatee.

Rashleigh, for the trustee of the will.

O. L. Clare, for the present managers of the school.—The period during which the income is payable to the schools has not ended, as voluntary contributions are still necessary for the support of the buildings. The testatrix cannot have meant that the period should end if any funds at all are given under Act of Parliament, as from the first the schools were under the deed of trust, public elementary schools receiving Government grants. Nor has the school ceased to be managed under the conditions of the deed of trust, as the foundation managers are still appointed with reference to the provisions of the deed of trust: Education Act, 1902, ss. 6 (2), 11. In In re Beard's Trusts, 52 W. R. 312, [1904] 1 Ch. 271, however, the gift over upon the three events mentioned offends the rule against perpetuities, and is void, and consequently it does not matter whether these events have happened or not: In re Bowen, 41 W. R. 535, [1893] 2 Ch. 491. The case of In re Randell, 36 W. R. 543, 38 Ch. D. 213, does not apply, as there the gift had ceased of itself at the event upon which the gift over was to take effect, but here, upon the true construction of the will, the gift would still be subsisting apart from the gift over, and it is sought to cut it down by the gift over.

F. G. Champernowne, for the residuary estate, was not called upon.

BUCKLEY, J.—I think that the very event has happened on which the testatrix has said that the gift of the annuity is to cease and determine. She gave a certain sum of money to trustees upon trust "to pay such income or yearly sum to the treasurer for the time being of the Bicknor and Hucking National Schools for the support the said schools so long as they shall be carried on under the conditions contained in the deed of trust of the said schools dated the 18th of June, 1873, and the funds necessary for so carrying them on shall be supplied by voluntrry contributions." [His lordship then referred to the provisions of the deed of trust as to the control and management of the school, and the qualifications of the committee, and continued:] The result of the Education Act, 1902, is that this body is displaced. Are the schools carried on under the condition contained in the deed of trust? It is plain that they are not. Then what is to become of the fund? The testatrix declares that the bequest shall be null and void if any of three events should happen in her lifetime. [His lordship stated them.] She also declared that if either of the two first-mentioned events should happen after her death then the payment of the annuity was to cease and determine and the fund purchased to produce it was to fall into and form part of her residuary estate. It was said, on the authority of In re Bowen, 41 W. R. 535, such a gift over was void because it came within the rule against perpetuities—that you cannot have a gift over which does not take effect within the prescribed period of a life or lives in being twenty-one years afterwards. That principle is firmly established, but it does not apply to this case. There is here no necessity to resort to the gift over. The gift over is a direction that the funds shall fall into the residuary estate, and that is where it would go by law if the gift failed. Therefore I have only to look at the will to ascertain whether the event has happened on which the annuity is to cease and determine. Has the event happened on which it was to cease? If so the fund by law goes into the residue, and there is no necessity to resort to the gift over; the gift having failed, the law takes the fund into the residue. As North, J., said in In re Randell: "If she had said that it would fall into and form part of her residuary personal estate, she would simply have been saying what the law is; and saying that it shall do so is simply saying what the law would do without such a statement. In my opinion a direction that in a particular event a fund shall go in the way in which the law would make it go in the absence of such a direction cannot be said to be an invalid gift, or contrary to the policy of the law." It results from this that I am entitled to read the defeasance clauses of the will and see whether they have taken effect. One of them is that the bequest of the annuity shall be null and void if the funds necessary to carry on the school shall be raised under any Act of Parliament. That is satisfied to a certain extent, for the funds are now provided under the Education Act, 1902. I am of opinion that the gift of the annuity has ceased to take effect and that the fund has fallen into the residue.

FITCH v. BERMONDSEY GUARDIANS. (a)

Lunacy—Asylum—Charges for maintenance of pauper lunatics not settled within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs—Limit of such charges—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), s. 283, sub-section 3.

Section 283, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, provides that "the visiting committee shall fix a weekly sum, not exceeding fourteen shillings, for the maintenance and other expenses of each pauper lunatic in the asylum. . . ." Sub-section 3 provides that "a committee may fix a greater weekly sum, not exceeding fourteen shillings, to be charged in respect of pauper lunatics other than those sent from or settled in a parish or place within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs."

Held, that the visiting committee in fixing the "greater weekly sum" under sub-section 3 are not entitled to fix a greater weekly sum than fourteen shillings.

Appeal from the City of London Court.

This action was brought by the City of London Lunatic Asylum against the Guardians of the Poor of the Parish of Bermondsey to recover from them the sum of £11 15s. in respect of the lodging and maintenance in the asylum from the 30th of December, 1903, to the 30th of March, 1904, of a pauper lunatic whose legal settlement was in the parish of Bermondsey.

The visiting committee of the asylum, acting under the power conferred by section 283, sub-section 1, of the Lunacy Act, 1890, which provides that "Every visiting committee shall fix a weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings, for the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of each pauper lunatic in the asylum . . . and such weekly sum may from time to time be altered," had previously to February, 1904, fixed such weekly sum at 12s. 3d. in respect of pauper lunatics chargeable to the union of the City of London.

On the 4th of February, 1904, the visiting committee, acting under the power conferred by sub-section 3 of the above section, raised the weekly charge for the maintenance and expenses in the asylum of pauper lunatics chargeable to unions outside the City of London to twenty-one shillings, and they gave the defendants notice of such increase.

Sub-section 3 provides: "A committee may fix a greater weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings, to be charged in respect of pauper lunatics other than those sent from or settled in a parish or place within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs."

The committee, suing in the name of their clerk, claimed for £11 15s. for lodging and maintenance, such sum being made up as follows: Forty-five days' lodging and maintenance from the 1st of January, 1904, to the 15th of February at the rate of fourteen shillings per week, and forty-five days' lodging and maintenance from the 15th of February to the 30th of March at the rate of twenty-one shillings per week.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants contended that they were only liable at the rate of fourteen shillings for the whole period, and they accordingly paid £9 into court.

The asylum proceeded with their action for the balance.

The learned county court judge gave judgment for the defendants.

From this judgment the committee now appealed.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Neilson with him), for the appellants.—"A greater weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings" means that the additional sum allowable in respect of out-union patients over and above that allowable for in-union patients is not to exceed fourteen shillings a week. The total sum which may not be exceeded is twenty-eight shillings.

R. C. Glen, for the respondents, was not called on.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The point raised by Mr. Danckwerts is one of great ingenuity, but section 283 seems to me not to admit of the construction which he has put on it. I was much impressed with the suggestion that this is a Consolidation Act, and I think that it is so, and that the Lunatic Asylums Act of 1853 allowed extra payment. Looking at section 54 of that Act, where the words are "a weekly sum to be charged for the lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care of each pauper lunatic confined in such asylum," and looking at the words "a greater weekly sum" in sub-section 3 of section 283 of the Act of 1890, I am quite satisfied that in the earlier Act the greater sum was not an additional sum, but was the total sum to be charged. Sub-section 1 of section 283 says: "Every visiting committee shall fix a weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings, for the expenses of maintanance and other expenses for each pauper lunatic in the asylum." Mr. Danckwerts has said that the Act dropped out the word "lodging" because there are expressions and sections in the Act showing that the provision of houses or asylums is to be dealt with and defrayed and met in a different way. I do not myself think that was the intention. I think it was intended to introduce the words "maintenance and other expenses" as a compendious form for the words "lodging, maintenance, medicine, clothing, and care." Sub-section 2 says: "If fourteen shillings a week is found insufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the local authority to whom the asylum belongs may by order" increase it. Now, my view of sub-section 3 is that it gives a power to the committee not to increase the fourteen shillings, but in some cases to fix a greater weekly sum not exceeding fourteen shillings. Does that refer to the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of the pauper lunatics, or does it refer to an additional charge to be made in respect of out-union pauper lunatics. It would have been perfectly competent for the Legislature to have said that the committee may charge in respect of lunatics from other places any sum not exceeding what they thought fit to provide, but it seems to me that the words "a committee may fix a greater weekly sum" refer to the same weekly sum as is mentioned in sub-section 1, and that it would not be in accordance with the proper construction of the language to treat it as being an additional sum. I think it is intended to meet the case which is dealt with in section 54 of the earlier Act—namely, although you do not charge up to the maximum in the case of your own lunatics, you may charge more for the out-lunatics than your own lunatics in respect of maintenance and other expenses provided you do not exceed fourteen shillings. Then with regard to the argument upon the words in sub-section 4, "Any excess created by the payment of such greater weekly sum may, if the visiting committee think fit, be paid over to a building and repair fund." I do not think those words advance Mr. Danckwerts' argument one way or the other; if the committee do not wish to charge more for the out-lunatic than for the home-lunatic within the limit of fourteen shillings there will be no such excess; if they do think right to make a differential rate and there is such an excess, the sub-section gives them the power to apply it for a special purpose. It does not seem to me that that enables us to put a different construction on the words contained in sub-section 3 than I have indicated. I have come to the conclusion that sub-section 3 was only meant to enable the committee to differentiate in respect of the out-lunatic as compared with the home-lunatic within the maximum of fourteen shillings, and that it is not an entirely new clause enabling the committee to make a quite new and separate and different charge in respect of the out-lunatic. I therefore come to the conclusion that, apart from the order made under sub-section 2, no higher charge than fourteen shillings can be made. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. Sub-section 1 provides that the weekly sum when fixed is not fixed unalterably, but is a weekly sum which may from time to time be altered. The maximum in that sub-section being fourteen shillings, it was considered that there might be a case in which that sum would be shown to be insufficient, and therefore it was provided by sub-section 2 that the local authority to whom the asylum belongs might increase such sum if it were found insufficient for "the expenses of maintenance and other expenses of each pauper lunatic in the asylum." Then comes sub-section 3, which, to my mind, obviously must refer to the greater weekly sum which is still to be fixed by the committee. The committee cannot exceed the sum of fourteen shillings, but supposing that they have to deal with pauper lunatics who do not come from or are "settled in a parish or place within the county or borough to which the asylum belongs," even if they have, say, fixed twelve shillings, they may, if they please, charge a sum not exceeding the total of fourteen shillings; in other words, they may differentiate between the pauper lunatic whose charge they naturally have owing to locality, and the case of pauper lunatics who come to them from outside. Then I presume it might be said, assuming you have this differential treatment, what are you going to do if you do not require the difference? Must the difference be applied to what may be called purposes of everyday life, or may you apply the money to purposes such as building and repair?

Sub-section 4 says: "Any excess created by the payment of such greater weekly sum may"—not "must"—"if the visiting committee think fit, be paid over to a building and repair fund, to be applied by the committee to the altering, repairing, or improving the asylum." It may be that, under the scheme of this Consolidation Act, it might be said that this differential charge being found necessary for the mere purpose of maintenance was a charge which ought not to be made, and that sub-section 4 justified the application for that difference to something which made it reasonable and necessary to have that difference—namely, for the purpose of altering and improving the structure of the asylum which it is not unreasonable to suppose should be to some extent provided for by the extra payment made in respect of paupers coming within the union.

I think the whole four sub-sections should be read as one.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a Consolidation Act, and sections have been collected from various other Acts. Sub-section 4 substantially reproduces section 6 of the Lunacy Acts Amendment Act, 1862. The scheme of this sub-section seems to me to be that the Legislature has assumed that pauper lunatics can as a rule be maintained for something not exceeding fourteen shillings a week, and it says to the managers of an asylum, if by economy and good management, or from the fact that provisions or servants are cheaper in their part of the country, they can maintain the pauper lunatics for twelve shillings a week, they may charge the out-union for out-lunatics up to fourteen shillings a week, and may pay the difference between the twelve and the fourteen shillings into a fund, if they like, for repairing and improving their building, but that if, for any reason whatever, they cannot keep their expenditure down to fourteen shillings, they shall not make a greater charge upon the out-patients than they do upon the in-patients. Then sub-section 2 says that in an extreme case where the fourteen shillings will not suffice, the authority may raise the standard both for out-patients and in-patients to any sum they find necessary, and when such is the case, it is not considered right, fourteen shillings being the maximum, that the outside unions should pay more than the actual charges made for the in-patients.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BOSTOCK & CO. (LIMITED) v. NICHOLSON & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Sale of goods—Breach of contract—Sale by description—Implied condition—Measure of damages—Arseneous sulphuric acid—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 11, 13, 14, sub-sections 1, 2; s. 53, sub-sections 1, 2, 3; s. 54.

The defendants contracted to sell to the plaintiffs B. O. V. (sulphuric acid) commercially free from arsenic. The plaintiffs required the acid for the manufacture of brewing sugar. The plaintiffs did not expressly or by implication make known to the defendants the purpose for which the acid was required. The defendants supplied acid which contained arsenic, and which was not "commercially free from arsenic." With this acid the plaintiffs manufactured invert and glucose, which they sold to brewers who used them in brewing beer. The beer being poisonous the brewers suffered loss. The plaintiffs were liable to the brewers for such loss. The plaintiffs by using ordinary care could have discovered that there was arsenic in the acid supplied. The plaintiffs claimed as damages, for the breach of the implied condition that the acid should answer the description—(1) the amount of the brewers' claims; (2) the price paid for the acid which contained arsenic; (3) the value of the material spoilt by being mixed with the arseneous acid; and (4) compensation for the loss of the goodwill of the plaintiffs' business.

Held, that the contract was for a sale by description, that there had been a breach, and that the only damages that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover were—(1) the price of the acid; and (2) the value of the material spoilt by mixture with the acid.

(a.) Reported by W. T. TURTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Action tried in the Commercial Court.

This was an action to recover damages for fraudulent misrepresentation and breach of contract. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants negligently and wrongfully supplied to the plaintiffs sulphuric acid containing arsenic and not made from brimstone, and not a pure commercial acid, in breach of a contract to supply the plaintiffs with pure acid made from brimstone and commercially free from arsenic.

The facts as found Bruce, J., were as follows: The plaintiffs' business was in 1888 carried on by Mr. Bostock under the style of Bostock & Co. The defendants seemed to have commenced to supply Bostock & Co. with acid in the year 1888. Bostocks were introduced to defendants by Mr. Fred Carr, who was a traveller for the defendants, and he described Bostocks to the defendants as sugar people whose works were at Garston. Bostock & Co. carried on business at Garston as sugar refiners, and they added to the business of the sugar refinery the manufacture of brewing sugars. From 1888 until 1892 the defendants supplied Messrs. Bostock & Co. with sulphuric acid of the strength of 95 per cent., or what was known in the trade as D.O.V., or double oil of vitrol, to distinguish it from 80 per cent. acid, which is known in the trade as B.O.V., or brown oil of vitrol. Acid made from free or uncombined sulphur did not contain any appreciable quantity of arsenic, but acid made from pyrites did contain arsenic unless it underwent a process to extract from it arsenic and other impurities. The acid supplied by the defendants to Bostock & Co. between 1888 and 1892 was acid made from pyrites, and not from free sulphur, but which had undergone a purifying process to free it from arsenic, and was therefore acid commercially free from arsenic. It was used by Bostock & Co. for the purpose of making brewing sugars in the form of invert and glucose. The defendants never were informed by Bostock & Co. or by their successors of the purpose for which the acid was wanted, or to which it was applied, and the defendants were not aware that Bostock & Co. or the plaintiff company carried on business as manufacturers of brewing sugars. Whether the defendants ought in the circumstances of the case to be fixed with implied notice of the purpose for which the acid was purchased by the plaintiffs or their predecessors is a question to be presently considered. In 1892 Bostocks directed the defendants to cease sending them the strong acid D.O.V., and to send them the weaker acid B.O.V. In February, 1895, Mr. Bostock died, and after his death a suit for the administration of his estate was instituted and a receiver and manager was appointed, who carried on the business until March, 1895, when the business was sold to a Mr. Clarkson. On the 15th of July the business was sold to the promoters of the plaintiff company, which was registered as a limited company on the 17th of July, 1896. In 1892 letters passed between the old firm of Bostock & Co. and the defendants. The defendants wrote on the 9th of July, 1892, to Messrs. Bostock: "We have pleasure in offering you 80 per cent. sulphuric acid at 52s. 6d. per ton made from brimstone, and 47s. 6d. per ton for ordinary acid, less 5 per cent. discount." And on the 15th of July Bostock & Co. wrote: "Please send at once to our works a consignment, usual size, of your 80 per cent. sulphuric acid in carboys. Brimstone at 52s. 6d. is what we want." On the 19th of September, 1892, Bostock & Co. wrote to the defendants: "Please dispatch at once to our works a consignment of 80 per cent. acid as usual." Between September, 1892, and May, 1896, a series of dealings between the defendants' firm and the predecessors of the plaintiffs took place in sulphuric acid. A common form of order was for a consignment of acid as usual, and all this time the acid supplied was made from pyrites, but was commercially free from arsenic. On the 14th of May, 1896, the persons carrying on business under the name of Bostock & Co. wrote to the defendants as follows: "We are continually receiving lower quotations for acid than you charge. After doing with you for so many years, we don't want to change if you would keep us on as good terms as we can get elsewhere. To-day we can get equally good B.O.V. 5 to 10 per cent. under your net figures." This letter was signed "Bostock & Co., A. M." (the initials of Mr. Messer, who, when the company was first formed, became the secretary). In reply, the defendants wrote: "Re price of acids.—We beg to assure you that the price we charge you is a very low one for the quality supplied you; this acid is made from brimstone, and really a pure commercial acid, but under the circumstances we will be agreeable to charge future lots at £2 10s. per ton with similar terms and conditions, and trust to secure your continued orders. There are some cheap acids now offering that are made from gas refuse and pyrites; this for your guidance." Bostock & Co., on the 18th of May, 1896, wrote to the defendants as follows: "We are in receipt of your favour and thank you for same. The offers we have had are for genuine acid ex brimstone and pure by A1 manufacturers. Your abatement does not quite meet their quote; but perhaps you will not object to an extra 2½ per cent., especially since we purpose paying monthly." This letter is signed by Bostock & Co., and initialled "A. M." (the initials of Mr. Messer). On the 20th of May the defendants wrote to Bostocks as follows: "Yours of the 18th instant which we hope to reply to to-morrow when our principal is here." On the 21st of May the defendants wrote as follows: "In further reply to your favour of the 18th we have consulted our principal in reference to the extra 2½ per cent. discount which you name, and as you propose paying monthly, and under the circumstances explained in yours, we will allow you this." On the 19th of August, 1896, two days after the registration of the limited company, Bostock & Co. wrote to the defendants as follows: "Please dispatch to-morrow a full consignment of sulphuric acid as usual, and oblige." A full consignment meant as many carboys as could be loaded in a railway truck—i.e. fifty-three. On the 1st of September, 1896, the plaintiffs ordered of the defendants "a full consignment fifty-three carboys sulphuric acid as usual," and similar orders were sent on the 22nd of September and on the 6th, 16th, and 27th of October. On the 11th of November, 1896, the directors resolved to make contracts for acid and other things for the whole of 1897. On the 24th of November, 1896, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants as follows: "We are inviting tenders for the undermentioned articles to be supplied as we may require during 1897. The goods to be delivered free carriage at our works at Garston. Terms of payment cash monthly less 2½ per cent. discount. We shall be glad to learn your bottom figures for a contract on these terms for B.O.V. in seller's carboys." On the same date the plaintiffs wrote to the Union Acid Co. inviting tenders for B.O.V. on the same terms. On the 24th of November the defendants wrote in answer: "We thank you for yours of 24th, and have pleasure in quoting you our best B.O.V. quality and strength as hitherto supplied in seller's carboys delivered as now at £2 7s. 6d. per ton less 2½ per cent. for cash in month following delivery for contract over 1897." On the 26th of November, 1896, the Union Acid Co. offered B.O.V. at 42s. 6d. per ton less 2½ per cent. On the 9th of December, 1896, the tenders for 1897 were submitted to the directors, and the selection of the tenders was left to Mr. Pooley, who was appointed managing director of the company. On the 22nd of December, 1896, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants: "We accept your offer, please send us contract note per return and oblige." On the same 22nd of December, 1896, the plaintiff company wrote to the Union Acid Co.: "We duly received your tender, and beg to thank you. Unfortunately we have had to pass you this time, being able to do better elsewhere." At a meeting of the directors of Bostock & Co. (Limited) on the 23rd of December Mr. Pooley reported that he had placed the contract for the supply of B.O.V. with the defendants. Mr. Guthrie, who was then a director of the company, and afterwards became chairman, had his attention directed to the case of the defendants' contract, because he observed that it was higher than the tender of the Union Acid Co. He thought perhaps there might be some commission in the business, and he wanted an explanation. An explanation was given by Mr. Messer, the secretary of the plaintiff company, who was present. In consequence of the explanation given by Mr. Messer, Mr. Guthrie confirmed Mr. Pooley's action. The B.O.V. which the Union Acid Co. tendered to supply was acid unpurified from arsenic.

A contract note dated the 23rd of December, 1896, was sent to the plaintiffs signed by the defendants. In that note the quantity and description of goods was thus described: "All the B.O.V. buyers may require to use during the year 1897." During the year 1897 the defendants supplied the plaintiffs with all the sulphuric acid they required, and such acid was acid made from pyrites but purified acid, that is commercially free from arsenic. On the 3rd of November, 1897, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants, "Please quote for best B.O.V. quality as before." On the 5th of November, 1897, the defendants replied as follows: "Best B.O.V. same quality as we are now supplying you with at £2 7s. 6d. per ton in lots of not less than four tons per consignment, put f.o.r. Garston, for contract over next year, 2½ per cent. discount cash monthly." On the 19th of November the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants, "We accept your tender of £2 7s. 6d. for all the acid we require during 1898." On the 20th of November the defendants sent a formal contract note in which the quantity and description of goods was described as "All the B.O.V. buyers may require to use during 1898." During the year 1898 the defendants supplied the plaintiffs with all the sulphuric acid they required, and the acid so supplied was made from pyrites, but was purified acid, that is commercially free from arsenic. In the year 1899 the plaintiffs did not, as in the previous years, enter into a contract with the defendants to supply them with all the acid they might want during the year; but the dealings between them continued. Consignments of acid being sent on Monday and Tuesday in each week, instead of Monday and Wednesday as before. Occasionally the deliveries were suspended for a week or more, but after suspension they were resumed, and business went on much in the same way as before, but without any continuing contract. On the 20th of July, 1899, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants as follows: "The arrangement is for two loads each week, one on Monday and one on Tuesday, and unless you hear to the contrary please keep to this." On the 22nd of July, the defendants wrote in reply, "You may rely on this being done." On the 17th of January, 1900, the defendants issued a circular, a copy of which was sent to the plaintiffs, which was in substance as follows: "Owing to the advance in the price of raw materials, &c., we have to inform you that on and after the 17th inst. our prices for acids will be as below—viz., B.O.V. 47s. 6d. per ton net, delivered as now. We would strongly advise you to contract at this figure as fuel and materials are rapidly advancing." The plaintiff company, on the 18th of January, wrote in reply: "We are sorry to receive your notice of advance in price of acid, but beg to say that we do not see our way to place the contract with you for this year's requirements unless you can supply us at the present price—that is, 47s. 6d. less 2½ per cent. for cash in a month, at which figure we have it offered." On the 19th of January the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs: "Yours of the 18th inst. to hand, and the same shall have immediate attention on our principal's return to-morrow." On the 20th of January the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs: "We thank you for your offer, and although the same is exceptionally low considering advances in raw materials, we are agreeable to contract at last year's price, before allowing your orders to pass us; we have, therefore, pleasure in enclosing contract notes, one of which we have signed." The enclosed contract note, which bears the date 20th of January, 1900, described the quantity and description of the goods as follows: "All the B.O.V. buyers may require to use during the year 1900." The defendants under this contract supplied to the plaintiffs sulphuric acid made from pyrites, but purified, and so commercially free from arsenic, until March, 1900, when, without any notice to the plaintiffs, they commenced to supply sulphuric acid unpurified and containing arsenic. The plaintiffs from March to November, 1900, not knowing that the acid supplied to them contained arsenic, used the acid so supplied to them by the defendants in making invert and glucose, which was supplied by them to brewers for making beer. The result was that a large number of persons, who drank the beer for the brewing of which the invert and glucose had been used, were made seriously ill, and some died. The plaintiffs, who had supplied invert and glucose to the brewers, were unable to carry on their business, and in this action they sought to be indemnified by the defendants for the loss which they had sustained.

C. A. Russell, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., G. Rhodes, and T. C. Rogerson, for the plaintiffs.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., Tindal Atkinson, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and E. O. Simpson, for the defendants.

It was agreed that the question of damages, if any, should be argued after judgment on the question of the defendant's liability.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 2.—BRUCE, J., in delivering judgment, found that it was possible to construe the words "made from brimstone and really a pure commercial acid" as meaning that the acid was free from arsenic in a commercial sense and was to be distinguished from cheap acids not purified.

In the matter of fraud, on the mere construction of a letter, deceit ought not to be imputed if it was possible to give the words an honest meaning. The representation contained in the letters of 1896 did not amount to a fraudulent representation, and à fortiori the representation contained in the letters of July, 1892, was not fraudulent.

The defendants did not know of the purpose for which the acid was used by the plaintiffs.

The defendants never intended to deceive the plaintiffs, and they thought that they were acting within their right in supplying unpurified acid in fulfilment of the contract of the 20th of January, 1900.

As to the question whether the defendants were guilty of a breach of contract when in March, 1900, they began to supply impure B.O.V. in the place of purified B.O.V., having regard to the dealings between the plaintiffs and defendants, "B.O.V." had come to mean 80 per cent. acid purified free from arsenic. B.O.V. must be taken as intended by parties as being the B.O.V. in which they had all along dealt, that was B.O.V. commercially free from arsenic. There was a contract for the sale of goods by description within section 13 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893—namely, a sale of B.O.V. commercially free from arsenic, and there was an implied condition that the goods supplied should correspond with that description; and when the defendants in March, 1900, delivered B.O.V. which was not commercially free from arsenic there was a breach of the implied condition.

The buyer did not expressly, or by implication, make known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods were required, so as to bring into operation sub-section 1 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act.

The plaintiffs could, by the exercise of ordinary care and due diligence, have discovered the presence of arsenic in the acid before its use by them.

C. A. Russell, K.C., Danckwerts, K.C., G. Rhodes, and T. C. Rogerson, for the plaintiffs, contended that damages were recoverable for the price of the acid spoilt, the value of the material spoilt by mixture with the acid supplied, the loss of the goodwill of the business, and for the brewers' claims against the plaintiffs as being the natural and direct result of the breach.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C., Tindal Atkinson, K.C., Montague Lush, K.C., and E. O. Simpson, for the defendants, contended that the defendants' whole possible liability was the difference between the value of the acid supplied and the value of the acid which should have been supplied under the contract.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 8.—BRUCE, J.—The judgment already delivered found that there was a contract for the sale of goods by description, within the 13th section of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893; that is, a sale of B.O.V.

commercially free from arsenic, and that there was an implied condition that the goods supplied should correspond with that description, and when the defendants, in March, 1900, delivered B.O.V. which was not commercially free from arsenic there was a breach of the implied condition. It was further found by the judgment that the buyer did not expressly, or by implication, make known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods were required, so as to bring into operation the first sub-section of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act.

The question now arises, What are the damages which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the defendants? The plaintiffs claim, first, the price paid for the acid supplied, which was not commercially free from arsenic. They say that the acid was worse than useless to them, and that the price paid for it was wholly thrown away. Secondly, the plaintiffs claim the value of the material used for the purpose of making glucose and invert, which was spoilt by its being mixed with acid, which proved to be poisonous, at a time when the plaintiffs supposed the acid to be commercially free from arsenic. Thirdly, the plaintiffs claim a large sum of money as compensation for the goodwill of the business which the plaintiffs carried on as manufacturers of invert and glucose, and which the plaintiffs say has been entirely destroyed by the act of the defendants in supplying them with poisonous acid. Fourthly, the plaintiffs, before they discovered the poisonous properties of the acid, sold to brewers for the purpose of being used in the brewing of beer invert and glucose made from the poisonous acid, and they claim from the defendants the amount of damages which the brewers are entitled to recover against them. In order to arrive at the damages which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, we must consider the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Section 11, sub-section 1 (a), enacts that where a contract of sale is subject to any condition to be fulfilled by the seller, the buyer may waive the condition, or may elect to treat the breach of such condition as a breach of warranty. In the present case the plaintiffs, the buyers, accepted the acid in ignorance that it did not fulfil the condition that it was commercially free from arsenic. Had they known of the breach of condition they might have refused to accept the goods, but having accepted the goods in ignorance of the breach of condition I think the case is one to which section 11, sub-section 1 (c), applies. That sub-section enacts that where the property has passed to the buyer the breach of any condition to be fulfilled by the seller can only be treated as a breach of warranty in the absence of a special term to the contrary. Section 53, sub-section 1, enacts that where the buyer is compelled to treat any breach of a condition on the part of the seller as a breach of warranty the buyer may (b) maintain an action for damages for breach of warranty. Sub-section 2 enacts that the measure of damages for breach of warranty is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the breach of warranty. The third sub-section of section 53, which relates only to a breach of warranty of quality, has, I think, no bearing on the present case. Nichol v. Godts, 10 Exch. 191, and Josling v. Kingsford, 13 C. B. N. S. 447, illustrate the distinction between a mere warranty of quality and a condition that the goods shall correspond with the description. Although in circumstances such as have happened in this case the buyer is compelled to treat the breach of the condition as a breach of warranty, yet, in point of fact, the damages for such breach of warranty are different from the damages which follow from a mere breach of warranty of quality. The damages in the present case must, I think, be determined by the rule laid down in sub-section 2, section 53. Before I proceed to consider the meaning and application of this sub-section, I may refer to section 54, which enacts that nothing in this Act shall affect the right of the buyer or the seller to recover interest or special damages in any case where by law interest or special damages may be recoverable. These two sections seemed to be framed upon the rules laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch., p. 354; the passage is as follows: "Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally—i.e., according to the usual course of things—from such breach of contract itself"—that seems to express the first rule; the following words seem to express the second rule: "or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it." Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated by the plaintiffs to the defendants, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated. The words expressing the first rule have received general acceptance in a number of cases that were decided prior to the passing of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. The words expressing the second rule have been subject to some criticism in the case of the British Columbia Sawmills Co. v. Nettleship, and in other cases; and the Legislature, in framing the Sale of Goods Act, which was intended to be a consolidation Act, seem to have adopted the first rule in the second sub-section, section 53. The second rule the Legislature did not adopt; but by the provisions of section 54 left at large the right of the buyer or seller to recover special damages in any case where by law special damages may be recoverable. In the present case no special circumstances were communicated to the defendants so as to make them responsible for damages which would not ordinarily flow from their breach of contract. Therefore it seems to me the question I have to determine in this case must be determined by the rule laid down in the second sub-section of section 53; in other words, what is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the breach of warranty. The rule so laid down excludes the element of the defendant's knowledge; his liability is to depend, not upon the state of his mind, but upon the facts of the case. Sulphuric acid is used for a great variety of purposes; among other purposes, it has been used largely, at all events since 1880, for the purpose of making glucose and invert to be used in brewing. Although the proportion of acid thus used for food products is small as compared with the quantity used for other purposes, yet the use of the acid for food products cannot be said to be other than a well-recognized and ordinary use. Although for many of the purposes to which sulphuric acid is applied the presence of arsenic in the acid is not prejudicial, yet, of course, the presence of arsenic in acid renders it wholly unfit to be used in the preparation of food products; and where acid is purchased on the condition that it should be commercially free from arsenic, and in reliance upon this condition the purchaser applies acid supplied to him by the seller to one of the ordinary purposes for which such acid is used—i.e., for the manufacture of food products—and the acid supplied contains arsenic, I think that the loss occasioned by rendering useless the material with which the acid was mixed for the purpose of making foodstuffs is a loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the breach of the condition or warranty that the acid should be commercially free from arsenic. It is very difficult to find authorities to throw light upon the meaning of the words "loss," "directly," and "naturally," "resulting, in the ordinary course of events, from the breach of warranty," because, although there are a vast number of reported cases bearing upon the question of damages for breach of contract, yet most of them have been determined with regard to the damages supposed to have been in contemplation of the parties; and although that matter may still form an important factor in determining whether special damages are due under the second rule in Hadley v. Baxendale or under section 54 of the Sale of Goods Act, yet it seems to me that it is an element that has no place in considering the measure of damages laid down in sub-section 2 of section 53. The judgment, however, of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, delivered by Palles, C.B., in the case of Wilson v. Dunville, L. R. Ir. 6, p. 210, has, I think, a direct bearing upon the question. In that case the plaintiff purchased from the defendants, who were distillers, a quantity of grains warranted by the defendants as being good, sound, and merchantable, and as reasonably answering the description of distillers' grains. These grains were ordinarily used in feeding cattle, as the defendants knew, though the sale to the plaintiff was not expressly made for that purpose. The grains delivered to the plaintiff did not answer to the description, and they contained small particles of lead which had become accidentally intermixed with the grains during a fire which occurred at the defendants' premises, and the cattle that were fed with the grains were poisoned. It was held that the defendants were liable in damages for the value of the cattle. Although in that case it is stated as a fact that the defendants knew that grains were ordinarily used in feeding cattle, the decision of the court seems to have been independent of that fact. The head-note states, I think correctly, the substance of the decision in the following words: "For the purpose of rendering a defendant responsible for damages which in the ordinary course of things flow from a particular breach, it is unnecessary that the actual breach which ensued should have been within the contemplation of the parties." The Chief Baron, in delivering the judgment of the court, after referring to the argument urged on behalf of the defendants that the death of the cattle could not have been in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the contract as the probable result, and suggesting an answer to that argument, proceeds as follows: "But for myself, I desire to base my judgment upon broader grounds. For the purpose of rendering a defendant responsible for damages which in the ordinary course of things flow from a particular breach it is unnecessary that the actual breach of contract which ensued should have been within the contemplation of the parties. . . . If the consequences result solely from the act in question and an usual state of things, they are the ordinary and usual consequences of that act, and the defendants are liable. If the consequences flow not from the defendants' act alone, or from the defendants' act operating upon an usual state of things, but from that act, and in exceptional state of circumstances, then a question of much difficulty (and one as to which the cases are not wholly consistent) would arise as to the effect on the defendants' liability of their knowledge at the time of the contract of such exceptional circumstances. Upon the discussion of this latter question I do not propose to enter. It has no application here. The loss of the cattle did not arise from exceptional circumstances, but was a natural result of the ordinary use of the substance sold to the plaintiffs as grains." In Cory v. The Thames Ironworks Co., 16 W. R. 456, L. R. 3 Q. B., p. 190, Blackburn, J., says as follows: "I think it all comes round to this: the measure of damages when a party has not fulfilled his contract is what might be reasonably expected in the ordinary course of things to flow from the non-fulfilment of the contract; not more than that, but what might be reasonably expected to flow from the non-fulfilment of the contract in the ordinary state of things and to be the natural consequences of it." In the present case in the ordinary course of events the acid would be used for some purpose it was used for —one of the purposes for which sulphuric acid is ordinarily used—i.e., the making of glucose and invert, and the consequences directly and naturally resulting from the use of acid containing a virulent poison such as arsenic was to destroy and render valueless all the materials with which the acid was mixed for the purpose of making glucose and invert. Randall v. Roper, E. B. & E., p. 84, was a case in which the defendant suffered judgment by default. The material facts are stated in the declaration which charged that the defendant had sold to the plaintiff seed barley warranting it to be chevalier seed barley, yet the seed barley was not chevalier seed barley, and the plaintiffs being corn factors, having purchased the seed barley of defendant in the way of their trade for the purpose of reselling, did without having any knowledge of the said breach of warranty resell a portion of the same to the persons named in the declaration, and the plaintiffs so resold those portions to those persons respectively by warranting the same to be chevalier seed barley when in fact it was not chevalier seed barley, and those persons respectively, not knowing that fact, sowed the same on their lands as and for chevalier seed barley, and the same, not being chevalier seed barley, produced inferior crops of an inferior quality of barley, and thereby the purchasers respectively sustained and incurred damages by means and in consequence of the plaintiffs' said breaches of the said warranties to them so made by the plaintiffs and by their sowing the said seed on the faith of the same being true, and the plaintiffs have become and are liable to compensate and make good to them respectively the damages by them so sustained as aforesaid. There is no allegation in the declaration that the defendants at the time when they sold the barley to the plaintiffs had any notice or knowledge that the plaintiffs bought the barley to be resold, or indeed that they had any notice or knowledge that the plaintiffs were corn factors, although the fact that they were corn factors is alleged in the declaration. It was held that in assessing the damage on the execution of a writ of inquiry the jury ought to include the amount to which they considered the plaintiff had become liable to his purchasers in respect of the difference of the crops. Erle, J., in delivering judgment, said: "The warranty is that the barley sold should be chevalier barley; the natural consequence of the breach of such a warranty is that the barley which has been delivered having been sown and not being chevalier barley an inferior crop has been produced. This damage naturally results from the breach of warranty; and the ordinary measure of it would be the difference in value between the inferior crop produced and that which would have been produced from chevalier barley—i.e., not inconsistent with Hadley v. Baxendale." In that case the court, no doubt, concluded that in the ordinary course of things barley sold as seed barley would be sown, and when sown if it were inferior barley the direct and natural result would be an inferior crop, and the loss resulting from the inferior crop so became the proper measure of damages for the breach of warranty, quite irrespective of any question as to what was in the contemplation of the parties. An observation made by Lord Herschell in the case of Drummond v. Van Ingham, 12 App. Cas., p. 293, was relied upon by the defendants' counsel. That was a case in which it was held that there was an implied warranty that the goods should be fit for use in the manner in which goods of the same quality and general character would be used; in other words, that goods described as "coatings" should be fit to be made into coats and other garments. The observation made by Lord Herschell was as follows: "It was urged for the appellants by the Attorney-General, in his able argument at the bar, that it would be unreasonable to require that a manufacturer should be cognizant of all the purposes to which the article he manufactures might be applied, and that he should be acquainted with all the trades in which it may be used. I agree. Where the article may be used as one of the elements in a variety of other manufactures, I think it may be too much to impute to the maker of this common article a knowledge of the details of every manufacture into which it may enter in combination with other materials. But no such question arises here. There seems nothing unreasonable in expecting that the maker of coatings should know that they are to be turned into coats and other garments, and that he should further know what coatings will and what will not be capable of use for this purpose in the ordinary methods." I have quoted this observation of Lord Herschell because it was relied upon by the defendants, but it seems to me to have no bearing upon the points presented in the present case. The question in Drummond v. Van Ingham was whether the defendant who supplied the goods knew the purpose for which they were required. No such question arises in the present case. In that case the question arose whether there was an implied warranty or condition as to the fitness for a particular purpose of the goods supplied. No such question arises under section 13 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

In my opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, first, the whole price paid by them for the impure acid, because the acid being worthless to the plaintiffs there was an entire failure of consideratfon, and by virtue of section 53, sub-section (1) (a), Sale of Goods Act, where there is a breach of warranty by the seller, the buyer may set up against the seller the breach of warranty in extinction of the prices: see Poulton v. Lattimore, 9 B. & C., p. 259. Second, the value of the goods that were rendered useless by being mixed with the poisonous acid at a time when the plaintiffs were ignorant of the poisonous character of the acid. That, I think, is a loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the breach of warranty. The claim of the plaintiffs for the loss of the goodwill of their business is not, I think, recoverable. It does not seem to me to be a loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the breach of warranty. It did not arise directly from the act of the defendants, but arose from the act of the plaintiffs in selling the poisonous glucose and invert to brewers for use in the brewing of beer. The poisonous glucose and invert were not supplied by the defendants to the plaintiffs, but were manufactured by the plaintiffs; the damage to their credit arose not directly from any act of the defendants, but arose from the act of the plaintiffs in manufacturing glucose and invert by means of poisonous acid and selling the glucose and invert so made as fit to be used in the brewing of beer. In Randall v. Roper there was an allegation in the declaration that the plaintiffs had been and were by means of the premises injured in their credit, in their said trade, and otherwise, and had been and were otherwise injured. And no doubt in point of fact the selling of inferior barley would tend to injure the credit of the plaintiffs in their trade as corn factors, yet no one seems to have contended that the damages under that head were recoverable. So in Fitzgerald v. Leonard, Irish Law Reports, vol. 32, Q. B. D., 1893, p. 675, it was held that damages for loss of trade could not be recovered. Further; I think the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the defendants the sums which the brewers to whom the plaintiffs sold the glucose and invert made from the poisonous acid are entitled to recover against them. I think the rule is correctly laid down in Smith's Leading Cases, in the note to Vicars v. Wilcocks, that no liability is incurred in the ordinary case of a separate and distinct collateral contract with a third person uncommunicated to the original contractor or wrongdoer, although the non-performance of this contract may in one sense have resulted from the original wrongful act or breach of contract. In my opinion there are no special circumstances to entitle the plaintiffs to claim special damages under section 54 of the Sale of Goods Act. The damages therefore will be confined to the two items I have mentioned—(1) the price paid for the impure acid, (2) value of the goods spoilt by being mixed with the impure acid. I have not gone into the figures, but I understand they can easily be agreed upon.

ROBINSON GOLD MINING CO. AND OTHERS v. ALLIANCE INSURANCE CO. (a.)

Insurance, Marine — Policy — Warranty "free from capture, seizure, and detention"—Detained by foreign government before war.

Gold bullion, the property of a Transvaal company, was insured during transit from the mines to the United Kingdom by a policy which covered the risks of "arrests, restraints, and detainments" of rulers. The policy contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention and the consequences thereof . . . whether before or after declaration of war." While in transit the gold was seized under orders from the Government of the South African Republic, within its own borders and in accordance with its laws, whilst war was impending but before the outbreak of hostilities.

Held, that the gold had been seized within the meaning of the warranty, and that the insurers were not liable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 105, [1902] 2 K. B. 489) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Mathew and Cozens-Hardy,

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

L.JJ.), dismissing the judgment of Phillimore, J.: 50 W. R. 109, [1901] 2 K. B. 919.

The appellants were ten mining companies incorporated under the laws of and carrying on business in the late South African Republic, and claimed to recover under a policy for a loss of gold commandeered by the Government of the Republic on the eve of the war of that state with this country.

Under the policy the gold was insured against arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes, and people while in transit from the companies' mines at Johannesburg to the United Kingdom. The policy contained the following exception clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of riot, civil commotions, hostilities, or warlike operations, whether before or after the delaration of war."

Consignments of gold to which the policy attached were on the 2nd and the 9th of October, 1899, seized in the Transvaal by officers of the Transvaal Government acting under orders of the executive. No resistance was offered, and the war broke out on the 11th of October of the same year. The seizure was found by Phillimore, J., to be legal according to the aw of the republic.

Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, 51 W. R. 142, [1902] A. C. 484; Cory v. Burr, 31 W. R. 894, 8 A. C. 393; Miller v. Law Acccident Insurance Society, 51 W. R. 420, [1903] 1 K B. 712, were cited.

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C., Scrutton, K.C., and T. Mathew, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot help thinking that if this had been a question of some trifling contract that we were construing, not involving a very enormous sum of gold, it would not have occupied a day and a half to argue it; nor do I think that the distinction which has been urged from time to time on the words of the warranty would have been so insisted upon. I confess I cannot entertain the least doubt in the world that the language here is used in its plain and natural senee; and if it is construed in its plain and natural sense I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal is absolutely right.

What can be the value of an argument upon some technicality or some narrow construction of the whole contract between the parties where the truth is that the word "seizure" is intended to be used in a general sense? This gold was seized, taken away, and ultimately used by the Boer Government. It was taken. I do not care whether they had authority according to their law or not—as a matter of fact it was taken; and that was one of the things excluded from the losses insured against. The bargain between the parties, put in plain terms, is: "I, the underwriter will not be responsible if this gold is taken away and seized by any authority whatsoever." That is the plain meaning of the bargain. Why am I to put any technical or narrow construction upon those words? That is the bargain which the parties have agreed to. I decline to go into the ingenious argument which has raised every kind of supposed distinction that could apply to such a case, when to my mind these words are absolutely plain. The words seem to me to take out of the perils insured against the particular thing that has happened. I decline to go into it further than this—that this gold was seized.

Subtle distinctions have been raised by counsel for the appellant (I congratulate him upon his ingenuity), but it seems to me that he wants to divide a plain transaction into two different sets of proceedings so that the first stoppage, detention. or seizure (whatever word is used) was not intended to be an absolute seizure, but only to keep the gold in safe custody. Now I can only say, in the first place, I do not agree that that is the natural meaning of the transaction which is described. I think the Boer Government meant and intended to appropriate the gold from the first; but whether that was their intention or not, they seized it, and took care that it should be within their power and control if they thought proper to use it.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the terms of the warranty clearly apply; and, that being so, I decline to go into this very long series of authorities or into those ingenious subtleties which have been put before us.

It appears to me to be a very plain case, and I move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think the question which has been argued is really arguable. If this is not "seizure" within the meaning of the warranty in the policy, and indeed in every possible sense of which the word is capable, I really do not know what "seizure" is. The view of the appellants, if I rightly apprehend their argument, seems to be that what happened just fell short of a voluntary offering, because there was, or ought to have been, a recognition of legal obligations; that it just lacked the grace of a freewill contribution by patriotic citizens to the pressing needs of the country, and that there was no sense or consciousness of force present to the minds of the owners of the gold which is alleged to have been seized or those in whose hands it was at the time, though, as the learned counsel observed, force lies behind and is the ultimate sanction of every law. Nothing, to my mind, could be a greater travesty of the real facts of the case. The gold was not given up by the owners or by the persons authorized by the owners to give it up. It was taken with a high hand from the carriers to whom it was entrusted for safe carriage, and diverted from the course which it was intended to pursue. That, in my opinion, was "seizure" in its plainest form.

Lord JAMES OF HEREFORD.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be clear upon the question of fact that the orders given by the Boer Government on the 2nd of October, when carried out, amounted to "seizure," and therefore came within the warranty.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion, and I cannot usefully add anything. I agree. It appears to me to be quite a plain case.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

SAUNDERS v. NEWBOLD. (a.)

Money-lenders Act—Re-opening transactions—Harsh and unconscionable—Excessive interest—Absence of risk—Default clause—Re-opening former account—Relevancy to transaction sued on—Power to order repayment—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 51), s. 1 (1) (2).

A transaction may be harsh and unconscionable within the meaning of section 1 (1) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, merely by reason of an excessive rate of interest, but a rate not in itself excessive may become so through a total absence of risk, especially when coupled with a condition making a loan immediately repayable on an instalment falling into arrear.

The power of the court under section 1 (1) "to re-open any account already taken" refers only to an account relevant to the transaction sued on; but a court having jurisdiction under section 1 (1) can, under section 1 (2), at the instance of the borrower, surety, or other person liable, re-open a transaction at any stage, and, if the loan has been repaid, can, if necessary, order the money-lender to refund.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Kekewich, J. (reported 20 Times L. R. 620), reopening transactions, under the powers given by section 1 (1) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, and directing accounts to be taken not only in respect of the loan sued upon, but also of a previous transaction which had been entirely closed.

The action was commenced in the King's Bench Division, under order 14, but was transferred to the Chancery Division in consequence of administration proceedings there pending.

The plaintiffs, a firm of money-lenders, sought to recover from the defendant, the executor of H. T. Alton (who died the 18th of November, 1903), the balance due on a promissory note for £3,300 given to the plaintiffs by Alton on the 3rd of October, 1903, in respect of a loan of £2,000, with £1,300 interest. The whole debt was payable by monthly instalments of £275, only one of which had fallen due, and been paid, before Alton's death. There was a condition that if any instalment should be in arrear the whole balance should immediately become payable. The defendant had refused any further payment except on the footing of a loan of £2,000, with 10 per cent. interest, but the plaintiffs refused those terms.

There had been a previous loan by the plaintiffs to Alton, secured by a promissory note for £1,400 (of which £400 was for interest), dated the 6th of July, 1903, Alton having, on that occasion, been introduced to Philip Samuel, a member of the plaintiff firm, by another money-lender named Sagar, with whom Alton had already had dealings.

In September, 1903, Alton applied to Sagar to lend him £2,000, and Sagar thereupon communicated with the plaintiffs, with the result that the loan now sued on was made by a cheque which was not cleared till the loan of July had been paid off and the note for £1,400 returned. Before advancing the £2,000 the plaintiffs obtained, from an agency, a report on Alton's financial position, which is quoted in the judgment of this court. It was to the effect that he was a man of substantial means, though somewhat slow in his payments, and that he was understood to be a large shareholder and director of a brewery company at Derby. In consequence of the action being tried without pleadings there was no mention, by counterclaim or otherwise, of the July loan until the trial, nor was any application then made for leave to amend, nor any point made as to that loan being harsh and unconscionable.

As to the October loan the defendant's case was that Alton, who was addicted to excessive drinking, was not, at the time of the transaction, in a fit state to do business, as must have been evident to the money-lenders, and, further, that the rate of interest was excessive, and the transaction consequently harsh and unconscionable within the meaning of section 1 (1) of the Act, and one that ought to be re-opened.

Kekewich, J., came to the conclusion that there was nothing apparent in Alton's condition to prevent the plaintiffs from dealing with him as a man capable of transacting the business of a loan. He thought it impossible to deny that the rate of interest was a very severe one, and, according to his construction of the section, which gave a very large discretion to the court, and in view of the case of In re A Debtor, 51 W. R. 370, [1903] 1 K. B. 705, there was no reason why the court should not consider that an excessive rate of interest by itself made a transaction harsh and unconscionable. Still, he could not go so far in the present case. There were, however, other circumstances to be looked at, and the principal one was the total absence of risk. He thought that the knowledge possessed by Samuel of Alton's financial position, coupled with the default clause, had the effect of rendering excessive a rate of interest which by itself might not be so, and made the bargain harsh and unconscionable. He considered that 10 per cent. would be sufficient interest under the circumstances, and directed accounts to be taken on that footing, not only in the transaction sued on, but in respect of the previous transaction in July.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lawson Walton, K.C., and Hohler, for the plaintiffs, maintained that the relief given by section 1 (1) was confined to the transaction sued on, and did not extend to a former transaction entirely closed so that the relation of lender and borrower no longer existed. As to section 1 (2), the use of the phrase "person liable" showed that that sub-section did not apply to a case where repayment had been made in full, for in such a case no one was liable. Moreover, the defendant had not counterclaimed.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C., and M. M. Macnaghton, for the defendant, argued that the wording of section 1 (1) showed that the court had power to re-open a former account as well as the transaction sued on. This was evident from several of the expressions used.

Lawson Walton, K.C., replied.

THE COURT reserved judgment, which was delivered on the 5th of December by

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., as follows: This is an action brought by "P. Saunders" (a firm) against James William Newbold (the executor of H. T. Alton, deceased), defendant. The action, as appears from the affidavit of Philip Samuel, a partner in the plaintiff firm, sworn in support of a summons under order 14, is for the sum of £3,025, the balance of £3,300 the amount of a promissory note made by Alton, dated the 3rd of October, 1903, in favour of the plaintiffs or order, repayable by twelve consecutive monthly instalments of £275 each, the first to be paid on the 3rd of November, 1903, with a default clause whereon default was made. An order was made on the summons directing that the action be set down for trial without pleadings, the defendant to be entitled to raise any defence at the trial. The defendant by his affidavit alleged (as is the fact) that the sole consideration for the promissory note was a sum of £2,000, and not £3,300, the balance of £1,300 being charged in respect of interest, which amounts to more than 100 per cent. per annum. The defendant's affidavit further stated that at the date when the promissory note was signed Alton was suffering from loss of will power, and not in a fit condition, owing to intemperate habits of long standing, to transact business, and further stated that the deponent verily believed that Alton did not thoroughly understand and appreciate the effect of the transaction in question, and that his condition was known to the plaintiffs, and that they took undue advantage of him having regard thereto. In addition to the promissory note for £3,300 of the 3rd of October, 1903, made and given by Alton in respect of the loan transaction mentioned in the affidavit, there was another loan transaction of the 6th of July, 1903, in respect of a loan of that date to be repaid by instalments amounting to £1,400, secured by promissory note for that amount. Of the £1,400, £400 was interest. The instalments were to be five monthly payments of £250, the first to be paid on the 6th of August, 1903, and the balance of £150 on the 6th of January, 1904, the entire sum to become payable forthwith in case of default. Kekewich, J., gave judgment for the defendant, declaring that all the transactions and acts of the plaintiffs Braham Samuel and Philip Samuel (carrying on business as money-lenders and suing under the registered name of P. Saunders) and Alton ought to be re-opened and set aside, and that the executor of Alton ought to be relieved from payment of any sum in excess of the sums actually advanced to Alton, and interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and that, if any such excess had been paid by Alton or by the defendant, the plaintiffs ought to repay the same to the defendant. The judgment also ordered the following account—viz., of all sums actually advanced by the plaintiffs to Alton, and of all sums received by the plaintiffs from Alton in respect of any such advance, and that in taking the account the defendant be charged with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on the sums from time to time owing to the plaintiffs, and that the balance due from either party to the other be satisfied. The judgment ordered the plaintiffs to pay defendant's costs. Kekewich, J., by his judgment, says in effect that, although "Alton, from an active, shrewd man of business, had fallen into a state of considerable neglect of business and inability to grapple with matters of business," and that this condition was induced by excessive drinking, resulting in liver disease, yet this was not noticeable to the ordinary observer, and therefore that knowledge of this state of things could not be attributed to Philip Samuel, and that Samuel was justified in dealing with Alton as a man of ordinary capacity quite competent to negotiate a loan, and to deal with him as a money-lender. Kekewich, J., then goes on to point out that the rate of interest was very high and the terms severe, since they included a default clause which made the whole sum charged for principal and interest payable on default in payment of any instalment. But he does not hold that this rate and these terms alone made the transaction "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of the Act, although he suggests that he might have been justified in so doing. That upon which the learned judge really does base his judgment is the absence of risk which ought to have been present to the mind of the money-lender. He comes to the conclusion that the absence of risk made the rate of interest excessive, especially when coupled with the default clause, and that therefore the transaction was "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of the Act. The learned judge, in coming to the conclusion that there was no risk, although the note was secured by nothing but the note of hand, relies upon the report of Stubbs, obtained by the plaintiffs, which ran thus: "He is regarded as a man of the highest respectability, and is understood to be a large shareholder and director in the firm of Alton & Co. (Limited), brewers of this town, Derby. He is reputed to be well-to-do, but at times is inclined to be slow in his payments. He is, however, the owner of property, and is considered a desirable man to deal with in the ordinary way of business. It is not thought that any unreasonable risk would be incurred in granting credit to the extent named." The learned judge also points out that if the plaintiffs had chosen to make inquiries at Alton's bankers they would have discovered that Alton's position was such that lenders for much larger sums than £3,000 would run no risks whatever. The learned judge concludes thus: "It seems to me impossible with that before me to consider that Mr. Saunders dealt reasonably with this gentleman. He exacted these very extreme terms from a man who was perfectly competent to pay, and against whom the only thing that any one suggested as regards business was that he was inclined to be slow in his payments; but there was substance behind, and a little slowness was not any very great disadvantage. It seems to me that here I have a case of a money-lender charging a rate of interest which was extremely high; which, if it is not 'harsh and unconscionable' in itself, is 'harsh and unconscionable' when exacted from a man who could obtain money at the ordinary current rates from a banker, or a man who had money at command. On these grounds I think that upon my construction of the Act I ought to have no hesitation in holding that the transaction is 'harsh and unconscionable,' and ought to be set aside." Several points have been argued before us. Some relate to the transaction of the 3rd of October, some to the transaction of the 6th of July. We propose, in the first instance, to deal with the £2,000 loan of the 3rd of October. The learned judge has, as we have pointed out, found in favour of the plaintiffs that they were justified in dealing with Alton as a man of ordinary capacity, competent to negotiate a loan, and has preferred to base his judgment, not merely on the fact of the interest being excessive, but on the fact that the absence of risk, having regard to facts as to the financial position of Alton which Philip Samuel knew, or by proper inquiries might have known, rendered the terms of the loan harsh and unconscionable. It seems to us that we have in the Court of Appeal had our attention called to facts, to which the learned judge does not expressly refer, which confirm his view as to the absence of risk and the amount of knowledge of Alton's financial position which ought to be imputed to the plaintiffs. In the first place, the cash ledger produced before us and at the trial shows that Sagar and others who (whatever may have been the position of Philip Samuel) had had previous financial dealings with Alton, shared in the bonus or profit of £1,300 in proportion to their contributions towards the £2,000 actually advanced to Alton. We think that the proper inference from this is that all these men were co-adventurers in this loan transaction, and that the knowledge of any of the co-adventurers ought to be imputed to the rest of the party. We know it is said that the plaintiffs made their advance by giving their cheque for £2,000 before getting these contributions, since the crossed cheque was given on the 3rd of October and the contributions were not given, and the division of the bonus was not made, until the 5th of October, and that the credit balance of the plaintiffs at their bank was sufficient to meet the cheque when given. We do not think that the credit balance was sufficient, but, even assuming it was, it is impossible to suppose that the arrangement for contribution to the loan fund and the sharing of the bonus was not made before the 5th of October, and probably it was made before the 3rd. None of the contributors were called as witnesses, although some of them were in court, and must have heard Philip Samuel's evidence and appreciated the importance of the sequence of events as stated by him. Moreover, Philip Samuel knew that Sagar was the agent of Alton to come and ask for the loan and carry back to Alton the terms upon which it would be made. He knew, moreover, that Sagar was receiving commission from Alton for obtaining the loan, although he might not know the exact amount, and, knowing this, Philip Samuel agreed to allow, and with the concurrence of his co-adventurers did allow, Sagar £57 10s. commission for introducing the Alton £2,000 loan to the co-adventurers, of whom Sagar was one. Now, having regard to Sagar's position and to his many financial transactions with Alton, as evidenced by Alton's pass-book and the correspondence between Sagar and Alton between January and October, 1903, and Sagar's knowledge of Alton's means to be inferred from all these facts, we cannot doubt but that the money-lenders were fully aware of the absence of risk, and that the rate of interest was excessive, having regard to the risk or absence of risk, and that the terms, having regard to what the money-lenders knew of Alton, were "harsh and unconscionable, and we think that the 10 per cent. allowed by the order of Kekewich, J., is amply sufficient. The case of the loan of the 6th of July is more difficult. Kekewich, J., has reopened this transaction, and has ordered it to be included in the account. We cannot accept the argument of Mr. Lawrence that the provision of sub-section 1 of section 1, that the court may, in cases where proceedings are taken by the money-lender for the recovery of money lent, and there is evidence to show that the interest charged in respect of that sum is excessive, and the transaction (i.e., the transaction in respect of which the money-lender brings the action) is harsh and unconscionable, reopen not only that transaction, but also reopen any account already taken between the same parties, includes an account taken in any matter, however foreign to the transaction sued on. We think that the account reopened must be relevant to the transaction in respect of which the action is brought. The section seems to us intended to give the defendant relief by way of defence in the action which the money-lender has brought. This seems to be rather confirmed than otherwise by that part of the section which says that the defendant may reopen that transaction, notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account or any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and to create a new obligation. Sub-section 1 of section 1 of the Act seems to us to give relief only in respect of the transaction the subject of the money-lender's action, and we think that, as the power to reopen is limited to that transaction, so the account can only be taken in that transaction or in some transaction part and parcel of the same, or which, even though it may include new obligations, yet comprised what purported to be a close of the dealings in respect of which the money-lender is taking proceedings. We should point out that Kekewich, J., in his judgment, does not go into the question whether the £1,400 transaction was harsh and unconscionable. It is true that sub-section 2 provides that any court in which proceedings might be taken by a money-lender may, at the instance of the borrower, or surety, or other person liable, exercise the like powers as may be exercised in an action by a money-lender for the recovery of money lent, and that in our judgment this sub-section applies even to a case where the loan has been repaid. This limitation is not a limitation to cases in which the money-lender has an unsatisfied cause of action, or there is some one liable to be sued; the limitation is only to a court in which proceedings might be taken by a money-lender for recovery of money lent. Given such a court—i.e., given a court having jurisdiction—that court may exercise at the instance of the borrower the powers given by the first sub-section. Such powers clearly cover a power to order repayment by the money-lender, and we cannot see that this power is in any way excluded by the words at the end of the section, "notwithstanding that the time for repayment of the loan, or any instalment thereof, may not have arrived." Mr. Hohler, in arguing the contrary, relied very much on the word "liable" in sub-section 2 of section 1. The words of this section are: "The court . . . may, at the instance of the borrower, or surety, or other person liable, exercise the like powers as may be exercised under this section, where proceedings are taken for the recovery of money lent," and he relied also upon the words at the end of this section as to the court entertaining an application "notwithstanding that the time for repayment of a loan may not have arrived." As to the force of the word "liable," it seems to us that "liable" cannot be read as meaning liable in fact. So to read it would be to exclude from the power of the court given under sub-section 2 the power which the court clearly has under sub-section 1 to order repayment by a money-lender. Moreover, one must not forget that the Money-lenders Act, 1900, is an amending Act, amplifying the powers heretofore exercised by the Court of Chancery, and it is clear that the Court of Chancery did not allow the fact of repayment to prevent the reopening of a transaction entered into by a borrower whom the court deemed from the circumstances of the case unable to protect himself. As to the words at the end of the section, we think they only mean that the borrower may obtain relief, not only when he is sued, but before he is sued. But, assuming as we do that the defendant, by taking proper steps, could, notwithstanding payment, have obtained an order reopening the transaction, provided he had counterclaimed, or upon due notice made an application in the action to that effect, he did not do so. Neither did he make any application at the trial to amend. The fact is that the case of the loan of the 6th of July being "harsh and unconscionable" was not made at the trial, and the judgment of Kekewich, J., does not deal with the question, and in these circumstances it is impossible for us to allow an amendment now. The order made under order 14 is limited to the defences of the defendant. We think, therefore, that the judgment ought to be amended by striking out so much of it as refers to the loan of £1,400 which was repaid, but this should be without prejudice to the right of the defendant Newbold, as executor of Alton, to bring an action to reopen that transaction if he be so advised. With regard to costs, we think that justice will be done by not disturbing the order of the court below as to costs, and giving no costs of the appeal.

Appeal dismissed as to the loan of October but allowed as to that of July.

MILLARD v. BALBY-WITH-HEXTHORPE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Local government—Private street works—Recovery of expenses—Liability of owner of premises—Change of ownership before demand—Continuing liability of former owner—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 150, 257.

The expenses of private street works executed by the urban authority under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, are recoverable from the person who was owner of the premises abutting on the street when the notice was served and the work completed, although he had ceased to be owner of the premises before the expenses were demanded.

Decision of the Divisional Court (90 L. T. 489, 52 W. R. Dig. 143) reversed.

Reg. v. Swindon Local Board, 27 W. R. 732, (1879) 4 Q. B. D. 305, not approved.

Appeal by the Urban District Council of Balby-with-Hexthorpe from a decision of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) upon a case stated by justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, sitting at Doncaster, before whom a complaint had been preferred by the appellant council against Mr. Millard under the Public Health Act, 1875, for non-payment of £45, paving expenses in respect of a street called Carr-hill, Balby.

The facts stated in the case so far as material were these: On the 8th of June, 1899, the appellants served upon all the owners (including the respondent) of premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such parts of the street called Carr-hill within their district as required to be sewered, levelled, &c., notices in the form prescribed by the Public Health Act, 1875. The notices were not complied with and the local authority then did the work, which was completed on the 4th of December, 1901.

On the 25th of April, 1902, the respondent sold his premises in Carr-hill to the Tadcastle Brewery Co. (Limited).

On the 18th of November, 1902, formal notice of the apportionment was given to the respondent, and on the 20th of May, 1903, the appellants made a formal demand for payment.

The respondent denied that he was any longer liable, and the present proceedings were then commenced against him to enforce payment.

The justices considered that the respondent was liable and made an order against him for payment, but at his request stated a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The Divisional Court considered that they were bound by the decision in Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board, 27 W. R. 732, (1879) 4 Q. B. 305, and with reluctance reversed the order of the justices, but gave leave to appeal.

The district council appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and Joshua Scholefield, for the appellants.—The words in section 25 of the Act of 1875 expressly make the expenses a charge on the premises recoverable summarily from the person who was the owner of the premises when the work was executed and the debt accrued, although not enforceable until after the apportionment had been finally made and the money demanded: In re Bettesworth and Richer, 36 W. R. 544, 37 Ch. D. 535; Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society, 37 W. R. 556, 22 Q. B. D. 149; Stock v. Meakin, 48 W. R. 420, [1900] 1 Ch. 683; In re Allen and Driscoll's Contract, 52 W. R. 680, [1904] 2 Ch. 226. It is true that in Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board Cockburn, L.C.J., used language implying that the expenses were not recoverable summarily unless the defendant continued to be the owner when the demand was made; but this opinion was merely obiter, as that case was decided on other grounds.

Israel Davis.—Nothing has been said to shake the authority of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board, and to disregard that decision would be to work injustice in many cases, as sales of property take place upon the faith of it. Since that case was decided in 1879 it has never been questioned, and the principle there laid down has been repeatedly followed. The whole scheme of the Act is to throw the burden of such payments upon the property. The person who is the person enjoying the benefit of the improvement for the time being is the person who ought to be called on to pay. Moreover, if a man is to be liable after he has sold the property, it might very well be that the notice of apportionment might not reach him in time to question the apportionment under section 257, or he might leave the neighbourhood and never get the notice at all. The view taken by the Divisional Court was right, because in order to make an owner liable for expenses under sections 150 and 257 of the Act of 1875, he must be owner both when the works were completed and when the demand was made. Although that view of the statute gave rise to this difficulty, that no one would be expressly made liable under the statute where there was a change of ownership between the two dates, the charge remained on the premises, and, the expenses being thrown on the premises, the owner at the date of the demand would be liable.

COLLINS, M.R., after stating the facts, said: Now, in those circumstances the court below held, following—perhaps I ought not to say the decision; but following the observations of the court in the case of Reg. v. Swindon New Town Local Board, decided in the year 1879, and in deference to the opinion therein expressed, though contrary to their own opinion—that the respondent was not liable to pay the sum apportioned on him. That obliges us to look at the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, the statute under which this obligation is imposed. The first material section is section 150, the second paragraph of which enacts that "if such notice"—that is, the notice to perform the work in the street—"is not complied with, the urban authority may, if they think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein; and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as is settled by the surveyor of the urban authority." Now, that section does contemplate a default, and that default is presumably, taking the section alone, a default in not doing that which he or they have been ordered to do. If they think fit they may execute the works mentioned themselves, and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred from the owners in default. That default, from the context, clearly must mean failure to perform the works they have been called upon to perform. So much for the 150th section.

Then we come to the 257th section, which introduces a specific provision under which this gentleman is liable if he is liable at all: "Where any local authority have incurred expenses for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable under this Act or by any agreement with the local authority, such expenses may be recovered, together with interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. from the date of the service of a demand for the same until payment thereof, from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed, for which such expenses have been incurred and until recovery of such expenses and interest the same shall be a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred." Now, that section in absolutely unambiguous language defines the person who is liable to pay this sum. It may be recovered and so on from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed. Millard here was unquestionably the owner when the works were completed, although he ceased to be the owner before the demand for the apportioned sum was made. On the language of this section, if it stood alone, there can be no doubt whatever that he would be the person liable. The only suggestion of any argument to the contrary is that the 150th section, which I have read, does contemplate a default, and it does from the context look as if that default was regarded as being a liability for payment of money: "and may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them from the owner in default." But that default is the failure to perform the work, and that would apparently contemplate, on the terms of that section standing alone, that as soon as the owner had committed the default by not doing that which he had been ordered to do, a liability was laid on him to be made to pay in a summary manner those expenses. Whether that makes that person liable or not, apparently it is not necessary for us to say, because when we come to section 257 the language of that is perfectly clear and unambiguous, since that section has made the person who is the owner when the works are completed liable to pay the apportioned sum. Whether or not any other person is liable under the other section does not arise for discussion, and it is not necessary for us to decide it.

Now, coming to the authority on which the court below thought themselves bound to decide this case as they did, although they expressly said they did not agree with it, and that if the matter were res integra they would not have arrived at the same conclusion, they in fact felt themselves bound, not by the decision, but by the dicta which they had thought formed really the ratio decidendi of that decision. The cardinal distinction between that case and this is that the person who was there sought to be made liable was a person who had ceased to be the owner before the works were completed, and therefore it is absolutely clear that he did not come within the provision of section 257, which is the section which lets in the obligation on the present respondent. Therefore, the person who in the Swindon case was sought to be made liable was clearly outside that section, and free from any liability to pay imposed by it, but Cockburn, L.C.J., said this: "I cannot think that it was ever intended by the Legislature that when the owner has parted with his property or someone else is in the possession of it, and therefore getting the benefit of the work done, and ought therefore to pay the expenses incurred, it should be competent for the local authority to follow him up wherever he may have gone and hold him personally liable. I think that defect is remedied by the 257th section, which treats owners upon whom notice was originally served and who are the owners at the time the work is completed and the expenses demanded, as the persons upon whom the local board shall be able to come upon for expenses. I cannot suppose that it was intended that both should be liable—the owner who made default originally in not doing the work, and the owner who is the person who has become the owner at the time the work is completed. What was meant was this—if the owner who is called upon to do the work and who makes default in doing it, continues the owner at the time the work is executed and when the money laid out upon it is demanded, then he is liable under section 150, but if in the meantime he has ceased to be owner, he cannot be said to be the owner in default at the time the money is demanded and when another has stepped into his shoes and become the owner." That, as has been pointed out in the court below, is a dictum properly so-called, inasmuch as it was not essential to the decision of that case, because it was giving an opinion which would cover immunity unless the person continued to be owner up to the time of the execution of the works as is expressly enacted in the statute, but up to the demand of the expenses, as to which time there is no provision at all in the Act, and therefore it certainly was a dictum in my view, and not a decision. Therefore we are not bound to give effect to that opinion in a case where the facts do not raise that point.

In this case Millard had not ceased to be owner until after the crucial date—the execution of the work—and therefore on the express terms of the statute he is liable. We cannot exclude him from liability by virtue of a dictum that was not necessary to the actual decision of the case in which the person sought to be charged had ceased to be owner before the crucial date.

In my judgment, therefore, we must give effect to what was really the view and intention of the court below, and for the reasons I have stated reverse their decision.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question we have to decide is, What is the default which is spoken of in section 150? It appears to me that it is a default in executing the works which the urban authority have required to be done. The section provides for giving notice to the owners of land adjoining highways, and it proceeds, "If such notice is not complied with" then the "urban authority may recover in a summary manner the expenses incurred by them in so doing from the owners in default"—that is, those owners who had not complied with the notices served upon them. The learned judges of the Divisional Court thought that they were constrained to give effect to what is laid down by Cockburn, L.C.J., in the Swindon case, where the question to be decided was different to that which we are now considering. The person there sought to be made liable did not come within section 257 at all, and the decision does not form a precedent for our decision in the present case. If we were satisfied that the ratio decidendi there was right, it might be right to follow it, but not being satisfied, I do not think that we are bound to give effect to that observation of Cockburn, L.C.J.

I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I concur in what has been said by my lord and my brother Stirling.

WERNER MOTORS (LIMITED) v. A. W. GAMAGE (LIMITED). (a.)

Design—Registration—Patent for same article—Application for patent before registration of design—Patents, &c., Act (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 13, 47.

The grant of a patent and the statutory right of the proprietor of a design are different in their legal nature and effect, and though in most cases it is difficult for the two rights to co-exist, yet if the circumstances allow they may co-exist, the second right in point of time being subject to the other. And if this be so, the fact that they are both vested in the same person will not prevent his enforcing either right.

Decision of Byrne, J., affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. (reported [1904] 1 Ch. 264, 52 W. R. Dig. 48). On the 8th of November, 1901, the plaintiffs applied for a patent for a frame for motor cycles. The provisional specification contained no drawings. On the 18th of November, 1901, the plaintiffs applied for and obtained registration of a design for motor cycles. On the 8th of August, 1902, the plaintiffs filed the complete specification of the patent, which contained a plan identical with the registered design. The patent was granted on the 23rd of October, 1902, as of the date of the application, i.e., the 8th of November, 1901. In August, 1902, the plaintiffs brought the present action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from applying for the purpose of sale to motor cycles the plaintiff's registered design or any fraudulent or obvious imitation thereof.

The defendants by their defence contended that by registering the design, as well as taking out the patent, the plaintiffs had committed a fraud on the Crown and that the registration was invalid.

Byrne, J., overruled this objection and granted an injunction to restrain the infringement.

The defendant appealed.

Cripps, K.C., T. Terrell, K.C., and Graham for the defendants. Walter and Kerley, for the plaintiffs.

The arguments used appear sufficiently from the judgments.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal in an action brought for infringement of a registered design for motor cycles against a decision of the late Byrne, J., whereby he gave judgment against the defendants, and granted an injunction against the defendants, together with an agreed sum for damages.

The plaintiffs became, by a registration dated the 18th of November, 1901, the registered proprietors of a design for motor bicycles, and by their statement of claim claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from applying for the purpose of sale to motor cycles, without licence or written consent from the plaintiffs, the said registered design or any obvious imitation thereof, and from selling or offering for sale such motor cycles in infringement of plaintiffs' registered design. The defendants denied infringement, and alleged that the registration was invalid for want of novelty, and alleged that the sales made by them before action had been made without knowledge of the registration of the design, and denied the intention to do any wrongful act, and by the last clause in their defence set up that the registration for the design was invalidated because a patent had been applied for on the 8th of November, 1901 (i.e., ten days before the registration of the design) for a frame for motor cycles the same as that shown in the design, and that the patent having been granted on an application made before the application to register the design. At the trial the defendants also contended, although the defence was not pleaded, that the copyright of the plaintiffs had ceased because the plaintiffs registered another design practically identical with that sued on, and sold machines made according to the latter design without the number of the design on them. There was no amendment of the pleadings, but Byrne, J., disposes of this defence by finding that it was not proved in fact. Byrne, J., found that the design was novel, "That the defendants had infringed, that the fact of registration was unknown to the defendants before action, and that their acts until then were protected as far as penalties or damages were concerned, but, having regard to the subsequent sales and the position taken up by the defendants on the motion and subsequently, absence of knowledge of registration at the date of the writ did not protect defendants as to such matters but, that plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and the agreed damages."

I agree with all the findings of fact by Byrne, J., and therefore the only question which has to be disposed of is the question of law raised in the last clause of the defence—viz., is the registration of the design invalidated by the grant of the letters patent? Now, section 13 of the Patent Act, 1883, provides that every patent shall be dated and sealed as of the date of application, provided that no proceedings shall be taken in respect of an infringment committed before the publication of the complete specification. The dates in the present case are—Date of application, the 8th of November, 1901. Complete specification left the 8th of August, 1902. Accepted the 23rd of October, 1902. The registration of the design was the 18th of November, 1901, and therefore after the date of application but before the leaving of the complete specification. Now, on these dates does the date of the letters invalidate the registration of the design? It is said that it is invalidated because the Crown cannot grant the sole right of manufacturing an article to two different persons, and can by the Statute of Monopolies only grant it to the first and true inventor. It is argued that, having regard to the dates in this case, the Crown had before the date of the registration of the design already granted the sole right to make the article before the design was applied for. A purchaser, it is said, from the patentee is entitled to do what he likes with the article he has bought, and ought not to be prevented by the proprietor of a registered design from so doing. This contention has at first sight considerable force, but I think the answer is that the logical result of this argument, if sound, is that there cannot be a patent and a design for the same article. This, I think, is not supported by authority. The grant of letters patent and the statutory copyright of the proprietor of the design are different in their legal nature and effect. There is only one grant, and that is of the letters patent, not of the copyright. The copyright only gives protection to the shape and configuration, although the result of such protection may be to secure important advantages such as attend mechanical contrivances which might be good subject-matter for a patent: see per Lord Herschell in Hecla Foundry Co. v. Walker Hunter & Co., 14 App. Cas. 550-555, 38 W. R. Dig. 65. The fact that the design is calculated to serve some useful purpose leaves it open to every member of the public to attain the same end by using an article which differs from it in shape and configuration: see per Lord Watson, ibid., 557. Byrne, J., says that the patent right and the copyright may so exist. I think this is right, but I do not mean to say that registration of a design which happens to serve mechanical advantages may not as an anticipation prevent the grant of subsequent valid letters patent. I think it might do so, whether the applicant was the proprietor of the design or a stranger. It is suggested in this case that the grant of the letters patent, having regard to the date of application and therefore of sealing prevents the design being new and original within the meaning of section 47 of the Act of 1883. Now, in the case of a stranger to the letters patent this clearly would not be the result. Can it be the result in the case of a patentee who registers the design between the date of a provisional specification without drawings, and a complete specification with a drawing identical with the design, that he cannot obtain a statutory copyright? I think not, unless one can say that the patentee is in some way estopped from asserting the truth that the design at the date of the application to register was new because he subsequently obtained letters patent having a statutory date prior to that of the application to register the design. I have had some doubt on this point, but on the whole I regret to say I cannot find an estoppel, or any ground for putting plaintiffs to an election between the letters patent and the copyright of the design, because I think what has been done here is an abuse of that part of the Act of 1883 relating to designs. The Legislature never intended that the copyright of designs should be used to protect monopolies, the subject of letters patent. For the reason I have given I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—In most cases it will be very difficult for a patent right in respect of a new article, and the right to a design registered under the Act for the shape of the article, to co-exist. For example, if the patent is first and the patented article is published to the world, a design of that article cannot afterwards be held novel so as to justify a subsequent application for registration under the Act. If the design of the article was first registered and published, there could not be a subsequent patent merely for that article without any substantial alteration; but in some circumstances the two rights may, I think, co-exist, as in the present case, where there is first the provisional specification and no publication of the patented article before registration of the design of the article under the Act, and that is followed by the final specification.

Under such circumstances I think the two rights, being not necessarily the same, may exist together, though no doubt to a certain extent they may overlap and interfere the one with the other; but I think the difficulty is met by saying that the second right, in point of time, must be held subject to the first right. In the case of a patented right, seeing that the patent dates as from the provisional specification, that gives rise, as in the present circumstances, to some, but, I think, no insuperable difficulty. After the provisional specification, and before the design was registered, there was no publication of the patented article. Take, then, the case where there is an independent inventor of the design ignorant of the provisional specification, and, of course, there being no publication, wholly ignorant of the patented article, and his design, at the date of his application for registration, being novel, he obtains registration of his design. It appears to me that in that case he would be entitled to say that he had a good registered design under the Act, and though, when the patent was subsequently protected by the final specification, so that the patented right dates from the date of the provisional specification, the effect would be that the owner of the registered design must take subject to the patentees' rights. But I cannot see in such a case as I have stated why the grant of the patent—the subsequent filing of the final specification—should destroy the effect of the registration of the design, which, as I have pointed out, was, at the date of the registration, perfectly good.

It was suggested, however, that though two independent persons might, under the circumstances I have indicated, have independent rights in the patent and the design, yet the same person could not hold both. I do not, on consideration, see sufficient reason for so holding. If two independent persons could hold the rights, I do not see why one person should not also hold both. Consider the case of the patentee who files his provisional specification. He may be in doubt whether his patent will ultimately be held good, though he hopes and believes that it is good; but he is perfectly certain at any rate that, so far as the design of the article is concerned, it is perfectly novel, and that he is entitled to have that design registered. Therefore, after filing his provisional specification, he applies for the registration of the design, and the design is duly registered, and he acquires rights under that registration. Then suppose that, contrary to his hopes, his patent was held bad, is there any reason, under those circumstances, why he should not still hold the rights he obtained by the registration of the design? Is he to be held to have lost his right to the design, which is otherwise good, merely because, under the circumstances I have indicated, the patent is held bad? I think not. No doubt there may be difficulties arising about damages in a case where an infringer of the patent is sued both by the patentee for infringing the patent and by the owner of the registered design for infringing the design. I think any difficulty that arises with regard to damages in such a case will be adequately dealt with by the court when the difficulty arises. I have no doubt the court, in such a case, will see its way to do substantial justice, and I think it will be borne in mind by the court, in dealing with such a case, that one of the two rights must of necessity be held subject to the other, inter se. I think, therefore, that in this case, the appeal must be dismissed, as I cannot differ from the conclusion arrived at in the court below that there was good subject for the registration of the design belonging to the plaintiffs, and that the right of the plaintiffs, in respect of that registered design, has been infringed by the defendants.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J., who has granted an injunction restraining the defendants from infringing a registered design.

On the 8th of November, 1901, Messrs. Werner, through whom the plaintiffs claim, applied for letters patent for improvements in frames for motor cycles and other vehicles. The provisional specification of that date contained no drawing, but the essential feature of the invention seems to have been to secure a space or opening in the angle formed by the lower frame member and saddle tube in which the engine could be placed. Ten days later, that is to say on the 18th of November, 1901, Messrs. Werner registered the design in question. On the 8th of August, 1902, their complete specification was filed, and it contained a plan identical with the registered design. On the part of the appellants three points have been raised. (1) It is said that the right acquired by registration of the design on the 18th of November is in some way lost or affected by the grant of the letters patent which, when granted, bore date the 8th of November, 1901, inasmuch as protection of the design for five years is inconsistent with the protection they acquired by the patent for fourteen years from an earlier date. I do not think this argument can prevail. It seems to me that a monopoly right was acquired by registering the design on the 18th of November, and that this right was in no way prejudiced or affected by the application in the final specification of this registered design to the patent article. The patent is not for the registered design. The patent may be used or infringed in many ways not involving the use of the registered design. The plaintiffs in this action do not complain of an infringement of the patent, but solely of an infringement of the registered design. (2) In the second place it is contended that the design is not a new or original design within the meaning of the Act of 1883. This really depends upon a comparison between the registered design and Chappelle's motor bicycle, a print of which was published in the Motor Car Journal of the 18th of July, 1900. At first I was impressed by the similarity of the two, but on consideration I think the objection ought not to prevail. No doubt it is a question to be judged upon a view of the two, but regard must be had to the fact that each represents a motor cycle. I think there is sufficient peculiarity in the position of the engine in the lower part of the plaintiff's drawing to distinguish it from Chappelle's. I do not attach so much importance to the different position of the cross bar, though this cannot be wholly disregarded. Upon the whole, I see no sufficient reason for differing from the decision of the learned judge on this point. (3) In the third place, it was contended that by reason of 51 of the Act of 1883 the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction, inasmuch as, after action brought and before trial, cycles to which the registered design had been applied, had not been marked with the prescribed mark before delivery on sale. This point was not raised in the pleadings, but it arose on the cross-examination of the manager and secretary of the plaintiff company. It is suggested that the plaintiffs registered a second design only colourably differing from the first registered design and attached the second number only to the cycles so sold. But in my opinion the evidence is not sufficient to prove the facts alleged. The second registered design was not put in evidence in the court below, and I am not satisfied that it differs from the first only in colourable details. No proof of an actual sale was given, and I think it would be dangerous to allow the plaintiffs' title, if otherwise unimpeachable, to be defeated by means of evidence so loose and unsatisfactory. In my opinion this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. } Dec. 9.

WILLS v. PALMER. (a.)

Mortgage—Evidence—Presumption of death—Solicitor's books.

The court will presume the death of a person after seven years, although there be strong evidence to show that the person has reason to keep his identity concealed.

A deceased solicitor's books are evidence if he charges himself therein with receipts on his client's behalf, as being entries against his interests, whether or not the entries were made in the ordinary course of his business as a solicitor.

A third mortgagee in an action to enforce his charge, having obtained judgment, an inquiry was directed to ascertain the date when the first mortgagee entered into possession. The first mortgagee admitted that he had been in possession since 1892. The third mortgagee claimed that the first mortgagee must account as from the year 1881, when the transferor of the first mortgage to the present first mortgagee became entitled. There was evidence to show that the transferor, who herself took a transfer of the mortgage, went into possession in 1881, and the only evidence to rebut it was contained in the books of an absconding solicitor, who had not been heard of since 1896. The books were in the possession of the official receiver, the said solicitor being a bankrupt.

Held, that the books were admissible evidence, inasmuch as the entries, which it was sought to give in evidence, were against the interest of the solicitor, whose death must be presumed.

Adjourned summons.

By an indenture dated the 20th of June, 1881, a first mortgage of certain premises was transferred to one Martha Olley to secure the repayment of the sum of £400.

Subsequently the aforesaid premises were mortgaged at various dates between the years 1889 and 1899 to secure various sums of money to Frederick Danby Palmer, one of the defendants in this action, the other defendant being John Palmer, the mortgagor.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 17th of March, 1893, the aforesaid premises were mortgaged to George Wills, the plaintiff, due notice having been given to Martha Olley, the first mortgagee, and Frederick Danby Palmer, the second mortgagee.

On the 22nd of April, 1902, Frederick Danby Palmer took a transfer of the first mortgage from the executors of Martha Olley.

The plaintiff George Wills having obtained the ordinary judgment in a mortgagee's action, this summons was adjourned to the judge to determine as from what date the first mortgagee was in possession of the mortgage premises.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Fuller, for the defendant Frederick Danby Palmer.—The master has held that we should account as from the year 1881, inasmuch as Martha Olley, from whom we took a transfer of the mortgage, must be deemed to have entered into possession in that year. We have, however, discovered entries in the books, now in the possession of the official receiver, of Thomas Matthias Baker, an absconding solicitor and bankrupt, which, if admitted in evidence, would show conclusively that the defendant in the person of his transferor first entered into possession in 1892. Rawlins v. Rickard, 28 Beav. 370, is an authority to support the admissibility of such evidence.

Stewart Smith, K.C., for the plaintiffs.—There is no evidence of the death of Baker. You can presume the death of a person after seven years, but not if he has any object in keeping out of the way. Now Baker is an absconding solicitor. Occasionally your lordship will direct advertisements before presuming the death of a person interested in a fund in court, but of course an advertisement in this case would have just the opposite to the desired effect. Again, there is no evidence to show that the entries are in the handwriting of Baker or that of his clerk, or that they were made contemporaneously. The ruling in Rawlins v. Rickard has been dissented from in Hope v.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Hope, W. N. 1893, p. 20, and see Taylor on Evidence (9th ed.), vol. 2, at p. 455. The account in the books is an account between Palmer and Olley and kept by Baker as an accountant. There was no duty upon him as solicitor to keep it. He must have had instructions from somebody, but there is no evidence of such instructions.

KEKEWICH, J.—An inquiry has been directed to determine when Martha Olley entered into possession of the premises the subject-matter of the mortgage. The defendant says: "I admit a certain date; you say a prior date. You must prove it." The plaintiff, accepting the burden of proof, says: "My duty is discharged because I have an admission of possession at an earlier date. For the firm of solicitors acting for the defendant stated, in a letter to a Mr. Brewer dated the 2nd of January, 1902, before the present dispute arose, that the mortgagee was in possession prior to 1881, and when he transferred his mortgage to Olley in that year, Olley retained possession." This, then, is an admission that Olley entered into possession upon the transfer to her, and that the possession continued up to the transfer to Mr. Palmer in 1902, and up to date. That standing alone is conclusive, and Mr. Palmer must be charged as from the year 1881. But an admission may, of course, be rebutted. Mr. Palmer says he can contradict it, and that raises a nice question—the admission of evidence.

John Matthias Baker was the solicitor, apparently, both for John Palmer, the mortgagor, and Martha Olley, the mortgagee, certainly for Mrs. Olley. He kept certain accounts, a copy of which has been taken from the books in the hands of the official receiver. Baker was an absconding solicitor, and, it is stated, would not face the ordeal of a public examination in respect to his bankruptcy. He went away in 1896. I must presume him to be dead. Mr. Stewart Smith says there is reason to think he is not dead, as it is his interest to conceal himself from both friends and enemies, and therefore his death is not to be presumed. But I do not understand that to be the law. In Phené's Trusts, 5 Ch. App. 139, Gifford, L.J., in a long and instructive judgment, after having referred to three cases decided by Kindersley, V.C., says: "They were all decided on the same general principle that the law presumed a person who has not been heard of for seven years to be dead." You may introduce evidence to rebut that presumption. But even though in this case the presumption arises, am I entitled to admit the accounts? In the first place it is said that there are no proofs that they are in his handwriting. It would be difficult to get any proof either of his handwriting or that of his clerk, which would be sufficient. The accounts are taken from the official receiver from books of Baker in his possession, being books concerning the bankrupt's affairs and business. That being so, I think I ought not to insist on proof that they were written by him, a fact in itself unlikely. I ought to take it that they were his books kept by someone under his direction. Next it is said that the books cannot be admitted in evidence because they were not books kept in the discharge of a duty in the course of his business, and I have been referred to a case which treats as doubtful the case decided by Sir John Romilly in 28 Beav. But that is only to do with entries made in the ordinary course of business. It is not necessary for me to decide that they are not admissible on that ground, because I think they are admissible on another ground, as containing entries against interest. The account is headed "Mr. John Palmer in account with Mrs. Martha Olley." He kept the account for Olley. There are items which go to show he charged himself with receipts. On the 6th of April, 1902, there is an item by cash for rent, and there are similar items in September and October of that year. I read that as so much cash due to a mortgagee in possession for which he was accountable. If there are any doubts on the question, there is another item, the final item in the account: "August 18th—Remitted by Thomas Matthias Baker, and paid by him out of his own pocket—£15 19s. 10d." It balances the account. That exact sum was required to make the account right, and that money had to be paid by somebody, and Mr. Baker pays it. He received so much cash and charged himself with it, and if he charged himself with a single item it is an entry against interest. The result is that the account is available. What its effect is is another matter. I have now an admission by Mr. Frederick Palmer in the person of his solicitor on the one hand, and evidence which I have admitted on the other. My duty is to contrast them. In comparing the evidence of the account with that of the admission, I must bear in mind that the admission was only a statement of belief of which the writer could have had no personal knowledge. On the other hand I look on this account and I believe it. It is of course possible that the cash received by her was paid directly to her by the tenants through her agent, Mr. Baker, but that is not the way it was treated. It is impossible to suppose that Mr. Baker had in his mind to show that Olley was not mortgagee in possession prior to that date. He was keeping the account in a more or less accurate form, and the only conclusion I can come to is that Mrs. Olley was not in possession prior to 1892, and that, therefore, I must make the defendant account as from the 6th of April, 1902.

FINANCE AND ISSUE (LIMITED) v. CANADIAN PRODUCE CORPORATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Company registered before 1900—Minimum subscription—Prospectus—Irregular allotment—Voidability of allotment—Period of voidability—Return of application moneys—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 4, 5, and 12.

If in breach of the provisions of section 4 of the Companies Act, 1900, a company registered before the Act allots shares, a right of rescission of the contract to take the shares arises, although the limit of time imposed by section 5 for avoidance of the contract does not apply, and the contract remains voidable without such time limit.

If a company states in its prospectus the number of shares as the minimum upon which it will proceed to allotment, that is a condition upon which an applicant takes his shares, and if that condition is not complied with the applicant is entitled under the general law to repudiate the contract. A company having fixed in its prospectus a minimum number of shares upon which it would proceed to allotment, inadvertently allotted shares before the minimum number had been applied for. The company was registered before 1900, but the allotment was after 1900, and was the first allotment to the public. Upon the mistake being discovered its directors proceeded to return the application moneys and cancel the allotment.

Held, that, although the limitation of the period during which an allotment is voidable, imposed by section 5 of the Companies Act, 1900, could not apply, yet the contract to take the shares was voidable, both as a breach of section 4 of the Act and also under the general law, as in breach of the conditions mentioned in the prospectus, and consequently a motion to restrain the company returning the allotment and cancelling the shares failed.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff company that the defendant company might be restrained until judgment or further order from returning to the allottees of shares in the defendant company money paid by them in respect of the shares, and from cancelling the shares.

The defendant company was incorporated in 1897 with a capital of £1,000 in £1 shares. In 1898 it increased its capital to £200,000 in £1 shares. Down to May, 1904, it had made no allotment beyond seven shares to the subscribers of the memorandum of association. In 1904 it was minded to offer its capital for subscription.

With a view thereto an agreement was, on the 12th of May, 1904, executed between the defendant company of the one part and the plaintiff company of the other part, the effect of which was that the plaintiff company agreed to pay the expenses of issuing and advertising the prospectus, and agreed to pay certain other sums, and in consideration of those payments the defendant company agreed to pay the plaintiff company a sum of £21,000, partly in cash and partly in fully-paid shares, at certain dates, calculated from the date of the first general allotment.

On the 13th of May, 1904, the prospectus was issued, offering 186,000 out of the 200,000 shares, at par, payable 1s. on application and 1s. 6d. on allotment. At the head of the prospectus it was stated that "of this issue the directors and their friends have applied for 23,726 shares," and in the body of the prospectus it was stated that "the minimum number of shares upon which allotment will be made is 40,000."

On the 20th of May, 1904, the defendant company went to allotment and allotted 40,003 shares, of which 5,000 were allotted to the plaintiffs. Of these 40,003 the 3,000 shares presently mentioned formed part. The facts as to the 23,726 shares which the prospectus stated had been applied for were that 20,726 of them had been applied for in England, and the 1s. on application paid upon them, and that the directors were told that the remaining 3,000 had been applied for in Canada and the application money paid also upon these. The real facts as to the 3,000 shares as subsequently ascertained were that the applications were largely for preference shares, whereas the defendant company had no preference shares and was not offering any such for subscription, and that all applications were made conditional upon an allotment being made by a date prior to the issue of the prospectus, a condition which was not complied with, and, further, that as regards 2,425 only of that number had the application money of 1s. a share been paid, leaving 575 upon which nothing had been paid on application. The directors learned about the 30th of June, 1904, the fact that upon the 575 shares the application money had not been paid. They immediately took legal advice, and as the result on the 14th of July, 1904, sent to the allottees a circular stating that upon the 575 shares the application money had not been paid and offering the allottees the option of having the money paid by them repaid and the allotment concelled. It was stated, though not proved, that the holders of some 24,000 shares availed themselves of this option. This circular went to the plaintiffs amongst others, and on the 19th of July they, by their solicitors, wrote a letter threatening proceedings if the circular was not withdrawn. The directors, conceiving that the course which they had taken was the only honest course open to them, did not accede to this demand, and in the result the present action was brought, claiming specific performance of the agreement of May, 1904, and damages for breach, or (in the alternative) an injunction to restrain the return of the money paid on application or allotment; and the above-mentioned motion was made.

Buckmaster, K.C., and A. Houston, for the plaintiff company.—The allotment of the shares may have been improper, but it is not either void or voidable. Section 4 of the Companies Act, 1900, does not give the allottees any right to rescind for non-compliance with its provisions. It only gives them a right of action against the directors. This was decided with regard to section 38 of the Act of 1867 (Gover's case, 24 W. R. 125, 1 Ch. D. 182), and section 4 of the last Act is similar to that section in this respect. Section 5 of the Act of 1900 gives the allottees a right of avoidance within a certain period, but it is only applicable to a company registered after 1900. Neither the company nor the subscribers can cancel the shares, and the circular of the company of the 14th of July is ultrà vires, and should be restrained.

Astbury, K.C., and G. Henderson, for the defendant company.—The allotment of the shares being the first allotment offered to the public, and, being after 1900, came within section 4 of the Act of 1900, and was in contravention of its provisions, as the whole of the 40,000 shares were not subscribed for. The allotment, therefore, was ultrà vires and void, and the directors were bound to return the application moneys, and treat the shares as unallotted.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 12.—BUCKLEY, J. (after stating the facts), said: The agreement of May, 1904, does not, in my opinion, give the plaintiff company any right to dictate to the defendant company in any way as to going to allotment, although, if the defendant company did not go to allotment, the plaintiff company might have some right to damages. For the purposes of the present application the agreement is, I think, one which gives the plaintiff company no right in respect of the order for which they are asking. The question to be decided involves an important point arising upon the Companies Act, 1900. The defendant company is one registered in 1897, and to which, therefore, section 11 of the Act of 1900 does not apply. It is a company which could not hold a statutory meeting within that section. The definition in section 5 of the point of time within which an applicant can seek to avoid an allotment is consequently inapplicable to the present case. But for the purpose of construing the Act I must, of course, regard the case of all companies to which the Act applies. By reason of the facts which I have stated the conditions mentioned in section 4 of the Act of 1900 had not been complied with, for the amount named in the prospectus as the minimum subscription had not been subscribed, and the sum payable on application upon that amount had not been paid. The provision, therefore, of the Act had taken effect that "no allotment should be made" of the share capital in question. The defendant company argues that the result is that the allotment was altogether void. In my judgment, that contention rests upon a wrong construction of the Act. An allotment in breach of section 4 cannot be void, for section 5 provides that such an allotment shall be voidable within a certain time and not later. It is, therefore, not a void but a voidable allotment. It is true, however, that the time within which section 5 provides that it shall be voidable is, for the reasons which I have given, not applicable to this case. Under what circumstances, then, is it voidable in this case, or is it not voidable at all? Upon this point it is argued on behalf of the plaintiff company that it was long ago decided, under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, that that section gave rise only to rights as against the directors or others who issued the prospectus, and did not give rise to any right of rescission, and it is said that the same is true of section 4 of the Act of 1900. It is contended that section 5 of the Act of 1900 is an empowering section creating a right of avoidance in the cases to which it applies, and that, inasmuch as section 6 cannot apply to the present case, the allotment is not voidable. This contention, in my judgment, cannot be supported. Section 38 of the Act of 1867 is addressed to the representation which induces the contract. Section 4 of the Act of 1900 is addressed to an essential constituent of the contract itself. If the allotment be successfully attacked the contract is gone. A breach of the veto which the Act imposes in certain events upon proceeding to allotment gives rise, I think, to a right of rescission of the contract. Then section 5 imposes a limit of time within which that right of rescission must be enforced. It is a limit which is not applicable in the present case. It follows, I think, that the voidable contract remains a contract voidable for breach of the statutory provision that the company shall not go to allotment unless a condition is satisfied which has not been satisfied. I am conscious that this conclusion must have a very far-reaching effect, for, as regards companies registered before the commencement of the Act of 1900, it leaves such companies exposed for an indefinite time in consequences from which companies registered after that date are in a short time relieved by section 5. Probably the remedy is to be sought in the fact that a small amount of acquiescence after knowledge would bar any right of rescission. It follows from the foregoing that the plaintiff company has no right to sue. If the defendant company were acting ultrà vires, any shareholder, could no doubt enjoin them. But if the Act of the company is not ultrá vires, and only in breach of a statutory provision, the neglect of which renders the contract voidable, the plaintiff company has no right to an injunction. A further point is this. The statement as to the 23,726 shares at the head of the prospectus, though innocently made, was, in fact, untrue. For the purpose of rescission the fact that the misrepresentation was innocently made is not material. Upon the general law, apart from the statute, it seems to me that persons who applied upon the faith that that statement was true would be entitled to relief. This goes to show that, even if the plaintiff company could sue at all, the notice of motion is at any rate too wide. There remains a third point. The words in the prospectus that "the minimum number of shares upon which allotment will be be made is 40,000" form, in my judgment, a condition upon which the applicant makes his application. If that condition is not complied with, he is entitled (if he has done no act to affirm) to repudiate the allotment on the ground that his offer could not be accepted upon the terms under which the condition attached to the offer was not complied with. From which again upon the general law it would result that he would be entitled to rescission. Upon all these grounds I think the motion fails.

Motion dismissed.

CATTLEY v. WEST. (a.)

Trustee— Co-trustees — Solicitor-trustee — Unreasonable conduct— Action against the trustees — Indemnity— Costs of lay trustee.

Where one of two trustees is a solicitor who takes an active part in the administration of the trust estate, the other trustee is entitled to expect the solicitor-trustee to act as a solicitor in a reasonable and businesslike manner, and if he does not do this, and an action is in consequence brought against the trustees by the beneficiaries, the solicitor-trustee must indemnify his co-trustee both against any costs he may have to pay the plaintiffs in the action and also against his own costs as between solicitor and client, even where there has been no loss owing to the breach of trust.

Action.

This was an action against two trustees for accounts upon the footing of breach of trust.

By her will and codicil, Sarah Linsley, who died in 1872, gave certain property to two trustees, one of whom was the defendant W. R. West, upon trust for Martha Klockmann for life, and after her death (in the events which happened) for her children equally.

In 1879, the defendant J. F. Hartley was appointed trustee of the will and codicil jointly with West, in the place of the other trustee, who had died. West was a solicitor, Hartley was a retired surgeon. West was the active trustee, and he invested part of the trust funds upon equitable mortgages by deposit of deeds. There was a dispute as to whether he informed his co-trustee, Hartley, of these advances.

Martha Klockmann had four children. She died in November, 1901. Shortly afterwards the three surviving children—one of whom was the executor of one who had died—who were the plaintiffs in the action, applied to the trustees for information as to the trust funds and for accounts. Hartley also pressed West for information and accounts. They learned that part of the trust funds had been invested upon certain equitable mortgages, one of which, a mortgage to one Piggott, subsequently turned out to be a legal mortgage, but neither the beneficiaries nor Hartley were able to obtain at any time any accounts from West.

At last, after waiting more than a year, this action was commenced by the surviving children of Martha Klockmann against the trustees West and Hartley, alleging breaches of trust, and claiming accounts upon the footing of breach of trust, and costs, and other incidental relief.

West and Hartley put in separate defences. West denied that the investment upon the mortgages was a breach of trust, and stated that the securities were sufficient, and that there would be no loss to the estate. Hartley also delivered to West a statement of claim in the action claiming to be indemnified by West against liability and costs in the action.

The trust fund was, so far as necessary, made good by West.

The arguments and judgment upon this latter claim were as follows:

Rowden, K.C., and A. Adams, for the plaintiffs.

Norton, K.C., and Romer, for the defendant Hartley.—West was the active trustee, and was, moreover, a solicitor. Hartley was innocent of the breaches of trust and of any neglect. Even if he is liable to the beneficiaries, yet as between himself and West the latter is alone responsible, and should indemnify Hartley for the consequences of the breaches of trust and the costs of the action: Lockhart v. Reilly, 4 W. R. 438, 25 L. J. Ch. 697; In re Turner, 45 W. R. 495, [1897] 1 Ch. 531. The principle is also recognized in Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 395.

Nepean, for the defendant West.—The cases where a trustee has been made to indemnify his co-trustee for breaches of trust where both are responsible to the beneficiaries are cases where has been loss to the trust estate. Here there has been none. Moreover, West has made no profits in the dealings with the trust estate, and no profit costs. Fry, J., says (34 W. R., p. 312, 31 Ch. D., p. 398): "This part of the appeal is based upon some notion that one trustee is liable to indemnify his co-trustee against loss or injury for his acts, but I cannot think that any such liability exists, for if it did exist the books would be full of authorities bearing upon the point."

WARRINGTON, J., after holding that in the absence of receiving any accounts from West the plaintiffs were justified in their action, and that both West and Hartley must pay them their costs of the action, continued: Next their arises a serious question as to what I am to do as between the two defendants. West is a solicitor and Hartley is not. The investments, with the exception of Piggott's mortgage, were made by way of loans to the clients of West. It is stated that Hartley was informed of the investments when they were being made, and assented to them. I accept that statement, but I do not think that it affects the question. The active person in making the investments was West, and if he had kept reasonable records of what he had done there need have been no difficulty, when he was asked for information as to the state of the trust estate, in furnishing the next day information of what had taken place and how the estate was invested. West was asked for a whole year by the cestuis que trustent for this information, and Hartley also, upon being pressed by them, took up the matter and pressed West for the information, telling him that he himself was being pressed by the cestuis que trustent. In the result this action was brought. As I have already said in the course of the argument, I acquit West of any dishonesty. But I think that he acted in an unreasonable and an unbusinesslike manner. If he acted as a solicitor in this way, would he not have been liable to his clients? It is recognized in several cases, especially in In re Turner, following Lockhart v. Reilly, that as between two trustees, if one of them is a solicitor, that fact makes a difference in considering the question whether the trustee is liable to indemnify his co-trustee. And I think that is properly so, because a trustee who is not a solicitor reasonably and properly looks to the trustee who is a solicitor to do that which a solicitor acting in a businesslike manner would do. That is where I think West failed, not only in his duty to his cestuis que trustent, but also in his duty to his co-trustee, who has properly trusted him as his solicitor, and as the trustee managing the business of the trust estate. Fortunately there has been no loss from the breach of trust. The conclusion to which I come is that West must pay not only the costs of the plaintiffs, but must also indemnify Hartley against any costs he may have to pay to the plaintiffs, and also against his own costs as between solicitor and client.

Election law—Registration—Parliamentary and municipal franchises—Disqualifications—Non-payment of poor rates—Meaning of expression "poor rate" for registration purposes—Sums chargeable on, or payable out of, the poor rate—Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 3 (4)—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 9, sub-section 2 (d) (e)—Poor Rate Assessment Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 41), s. 20—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42), s. 18.

Non-payment in full, on or before the 20th of July in the qualifying year, of all poor rates that have become payable, in respect of the qualifying premises, up to the preceding 5th of January, disqualifies the occupier from being entitled to be registered either as a Parliamentary or as a local government elector.

The expression "poor rate," so far as registration is concerned, is not limited to the assessment for the relief of the poor, but includes assessments for other purposes chargeable thereon according to law—e.g., the education rate and the burial rate.

These were cases stated by the Revising Barrister for the Borough of Scarborough and the Revising Barrister for the County of Wilts, respectively; the question raised in each case being whether the non-payment by a ratepayer of that portion of the poor rate applicable to education purposes disqualified the ratepayer from being registered either as a Parliamentary, local government, or parochial elector. The cases were heard together.

ASH v. NICHOLL.

The case stated by the Revising Barrister for the Borough of Scarborough, in this case, was as follows:

"The borough of Scarborough is a Parliamentary and a municipal borough, and has a borough fund, for which a borough rate is levied. A poor rate for the said borough for the year 1903-4 had been duly made and signed by the overseers, and had been duly signed by the justices on the 24th of April, 1903. A demand note for payment of the said poor rate had been duly made upon the appellant. The said poor rate included, among other charges, an education rate of one penny in the pound, and a burial rate of one penny and one halfpenny in the pound. No separate rate had been levied for the education rate under section 18 of the Education Act, 1902, and no separate rate had been levied for the burial rate under section 1 of the Burial Act, 1860. The said education rate and the said burial rate were not collected with the poor rate for the sake of convenience. The name of the appellant and of thirty-nine other occupiers, all of whom were known by the name of 'passive resisters,' had been omitted by the overseers from the list of inhabitants householders on the ground that the poor rate on the qualifying property due on the 5th of January, 1904, had not been fully paid on or before the 20th of July, 1904. The inhabitant householders' list is made out in three divisions, carrying the following franchises: Division 1, both Parliamentary and burgess; Division 2, Parliamentary only; and Division 3, burgess only. It was admitted that the appellant had refused to pay and had not paid that portion of the poor rate levied for the purposes of education in the said borough, and that the amount of 1s. 6d. was due thereon on the 5th of January, 1904, and had not been fully paid on or before the 20th of July, 1904. The appellant and the thirty-nine other persons whose names had been omitted, claimed to have their names inserted in the said list of inhabitant householders under similar circumstances. The claims were duly objected to. Three points of law were taken: (a) That the education rate was not a poor rate, and that non-payment of poor rates alone and of no other rates disqualified an inhabitant householder in a Parliamentary and municipal borough from being inserted in Division 1 of the list of voters; (b) that the education rate was not a borough rate for the purpose of the Registration Acts; (c) that non-payment of the burial rate did not disqualify an inhabitant householder in a Parliamentary and municipal borough from being inserted in Division 1 of the list of voters. On the first point I decided that the education rate was chargeable to the poor rate according to law, that it formed part of the poor rate, and that the said poor rate as made and demanded was one rate and indivisible. 'Poor rate' is defined in section 20 of the Poor Rate Assessment Act, 1869, in these words: 'Poor rate shall mean the assessment for the relief of the poor and for other purposes chargeable thereon according to law,' clearly indicating that there may be poor rates other than those to be expended simply for the relief of the poor. Statutes dealing with education point to the conclusion that the education rate is part of the poor rate. By section 18 of the Education Act, 1902, the expenses of an urban district council other than a borough are to be raised in the manner provided by section 33 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876—that is, they are to be paid out of a fund to be raised out of the poor rates for the parish or parishes for which the committee of management act, and as to a borough by the same section 18 of the Education Act, 1902, the expenses are to be paid out of the borough fund or rate, and by section 145 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, the council of a borough has power to order a parish within the borough to pay its contribution to the borough rate out of the poor rate. I further decided that in a Parliamentary and municipal borough an unpaid poor rate was not the only disqualifying rate; that payment on or before the 20th of July, 1904, of all borough rates as well as poor rates due on the 5th of January, 1904, was essential to registration in Division 1 of the said list of inhabitant householders—as to the Parliamentary franchise by section 3, sub-section 3, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and as to the burgess franchise by section 9, sub-section 2 (d) and (e), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882; and I also decided that these disqualifications operated respectively in regard to the insertion of the name of the appellant either in Division 2 or in Division 3. On the second point I decided that the education rate was a borough rate payable out of the borough fund for the purposes of the Registration Acts. The point seemed to me unarguable, having regard to section 18 of the Education Act, 1902, as the words 'the expenses under the Act shall be paid out of the borough fund or rate' seem to me to admit of no other construction. On the third point it was contended that by section 1 of the Burial Act, 1860, the burial rate was levied as a separate rate, and, therefore, non-payment of it did not disqualify the appellant from being inserted in the said list, and that, as the amount due on the burial rate (1½d. in the pound) exceeded by one halfpenny in the pound the amount due on the education rate (1d. in the pound) it followed that the education rate had been fully paid, and that no part of the poor rate remained unsatisfied. I decided that the true construction of section 1 was that for the purposes of the Burial Acts the local authority had an option to levy either a general or a separate rate, and that in the present case the said authority had levied a general and not a separate rate, and that the said burial rate was a borough rate, the non-payment of which disqualified the appellant from being inserted in the said list of inhabitant householders by virtue of section 3, sub-section 3, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867 (Parliamentary), and of section 9, sub-section 3 (d) and (e), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (burgess). I also decided that the appellant had not on or before the 20th of July, 1904, bonâ fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates that had become payable by him in respect of his said premises up to the preceding 5th of January, 1904, and that he was disqualified thereby from being inserted in the said list by section 3, sub-section 4, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. I accordingly disallowed the claims of the appellant Frederick Ash and the said thirty-nine other persons to be inserted in the said list of inhabitant householders. Due notice of appeal from my decision was given, and I ordered the appeals in all the beforementioned cases to be consolidated. If the court should be of opinion that all my decisions were wrong, the register is to be amended by inserting the names of the appellant Frederick Ash and of the said thirty-nine other persons on the said list of inhabitant householders, but if the court should be of opinion that any one of my decisions were right, the said list shall stand without amendment."

COX v. MERRIMAN.

The case stated by the Revising Barrister for the County of Wilts, in this case, was as follows:

"Edward Cox (the appellant), of 24, Herd-street, Marlborough, duly made a claim, dated the 17th of August, 1904, to have his name inserted in the Occupiers' List (Division 1) as a duly qualified voter for the parish of St. Mary, Marlborough, entitling him to vote at a Parliamentary election and also at any county council or parochial election held in and for the said Eastern Division of Wiltshire, in respect of a certain dwelling-house situate at 24, Herd-street, Marlborough, aforesaid, of which the said Edward Cox was the occupier. It was proved by the assistant overseer of the said parish upon oath that the whole of the poor rate due on the 5th of January, 1904, in respect of the said dwelling-house had not been paid either on or before the 20th of July, 1904, as required, or at all. The trustees of the Primitive Methodist Chapel in the said parish were rated as owners of the said premises, and the overseers of the poor of the said parish demanded from them payment of the poor rate made on the 20th of October, 1903, to meet expenses which would be incurred before the 25th of March, 1904, and of the arrears of former rates. The rates as demanded amounted on the 5th of January, 1904, to 6s. 0½d., made up of 4s. 6d., being an instalment of the rate made on the said 20th of October, 1903, and 1s. 6½d. arrears of former rates. The said rate due, however, on the 5th of January, 1904, was reduced to 5s. 4½d. by reason of the chapel trustees having compounded for the said rates as owners of the premises. The said owners paid on account of the said rates 3s. 5½d. on the 26th of February, 1904, leaving a balance still due of 1s. 11d., which was still unpaid on the 20th of July, 1904. The demand notes show how the rate of 1s. 6d. in the pound is made up, and is as follows:

Relief of the poor and other expenses of the guardians, 6½d.; county contributions, 10½d.; expenses of the overseers, 1d.—1s. 6d. With the exception of the said demand note, no evidence whatever was given or tendered to me as to what part of the said rate was unpaid, but it was contended by the party agent that the amount so left unpaid was in respect of the rate for education, and that that part was included in the 10½d. for county contributions. I invited evidence of these contentions, but none was forthcoming. Eight other persons claimed to have their names inserted in the said list under similar circumstances. I decided as a fact that the whole of the poor rate due on the 5th of January, 1904, and duly demanded by the said overseers in respect of the said premises, had not been paid on or before the 20th of July, 1904, and I therefore disallowed the claim of the said Edward Cox and of the eight other persons to be put upon the said list. Due notice of appeal from my decision was given, and I ordered the appeals in all the before-mentioned cases to be consolidated. If the court be of opinion that my decision was wrong, the register is to be amended by inserting the names of the said Edward Cox and of the said eight other persons in the said list."

The Representation of the People Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), by section 3, sub-section (4) provides that every man claiming to be put on the Parliamentary register of a borough shall have (inter alia) "on or before the 20th of July," 1904, "bonâ fide paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of all poor rates that have become payable by him in respect of the said premises up to the preceding 5th day of January."

The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), by section 9, sub-section 2 (d) (e), provides that a person shall not be entitled to be enrolled as a burgess unless he is qualified as follows (inter alia): "(d) has been rated in respect of the qualifying property to all poor rates made during those twelve months (i.e., the twelve months preceding the 15th of July in any year) for the parish wherein the property is situate; and (e) has on or before the 20th of the same July, paid all such rates, including borough rates (if any) as have become payable by him in respect of the qualifying property up to the last preceding 5th of January."

Cyril Dodd, K.C., for the appellant Ash.—The two points raised on this appeal are—(1) That the education rate was not a poor rate; (2) that the education rate was not a borough rate. It was never intended by the Legislature that every new charge put upon the poor rate should, if not paid, form a disqualification for franchise, and thereby by a side route make the qualification for franchise more difficult. The qualification for franchise was the payment of poor rate, which was a poor rate properly so called, and did not depend on the payment of a charge which, although collected with the poor rate, was not in fact a poor rate in the ordinary sense of the word. At the time the franchise was given there was nothing in the nature of an education rate which was put upon the poor rate. If this was a question of a contract between a landlord and a tenant whereby the landlord agreed to pay the poor rate, there was authority for saying that it did not follow that every new charge put upon the poor rate would have to be borne by the landlord under such a contract. [He referred to Earl of Cork v. County Council of Cork, [1903] 2 Ir. Rep. 490.] Another Irish case, McDaid v. Galbraith, [1901] 2 Ir. Rep. 49, where it was held that the poor rate was an indivisible rate, could be distinguished from the present case, on the ground that the wording of the Irish Act in that case was materially different.

W. J. Jeeves, for the respondent Nicholl (the town clerk of Scarborough) did not argue.

R. Mortimer Montgomery, for the appellant Cox, contended that on the facts stated the appellent was not disqualified from being on the lists as a county and parochial elector, even if the court should think that he was disqualified as a Parliamentary elector. Further, as he was a tenant and the burden of the rate was on his landlord, the appellant did not become disqualified by reason of his landlord's neglect to pay the rate unless notice of that neglect had been served on him by the overseers; there has been no decision upon this point in England; in Ireland it has been held that the omission of the landlord to pay the rate disqualified the tenant, even although no notice of the rates being unpaid had been given to the tenant (Clark v. Buchanan, 20 L. R. Ir. 244); but in Scotland the contrary has been held: Neilson's case, 18 Rettie 338.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—On the substantial point raised in these cases I have no doubt. The contention, broadly stated, is that although a demand made, in proper form as poor rate, upon a person or persons liable to pay that poor rate, yet because the rate is made not only for poor rate properly so-called but also for other purposes which could not properly be so described, the ratepayer may say, "I decline to pay that portion of the poor rate which is not for the purposes of poor rate properly so-called," and that in doing so, he does not become disqualified from being on the list of Parliamentary, local government and parochial voters. It is not necessary to go through the various statutes that have been referred to in argument. It is only necessary to refer to section 3, sub-section 3, of the Representation of the People Act, 1867, and to section 9, sub-section 2 (d) (e), of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. [His lordship here read those sections, and continued: The same question arises under both these sections—namely, whether a person who objects to part of the purposes to which a rate is to be put can decline to pay that part of the rate and yet incur no disqualification under the Registration Acts? I think it important to point out that these cases do not depend merely on the particular objection raised by the persons described as "passive resisters." Soon after 1867, at all events, poor rate has been levied for a number of purposes which are not poor rate properly so called; and in the Poor Rate Assessment Act, 1869, poor rate is defined (section 20) as "the assessment for the relief of the poor and for other purposes chargeable thereon according to law." I think, moreover (as was pointed out by my brother Kennedy) that that fact was recognized by sub-section 2 (e) of section 9 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. The same question that was raised in these cases might have been raised by any ratepayer contending that he would only pay so much of the poor rate as was referable to the objects of the rate as they existed in 1867, but that he declined to pay the balance, which was for other purposes. I am of opinion that a ratepayer cannot refuse to pay part of the rate. With regard to the borough rate, I agree with the revising barrister (in Ash v. Nicholl) that the point is unarguable, having regard to section 18 of the Education Act of 1902, by which the expenses under the Act are to be paid out of the "borough fund or rate." It seems only common sense that a man should not be able to embarrass the local authorities by saying he would not pay the whole of the rate because he objected to the burial rates, or to some other portion of the rate included in the poor rate. As had been pointed out in a recent case, such objections could not be raised even on an appeal from the rate itself; and to say that a person who was liable to pay, and who was properly assessed, could decline to pay more than he liked in the pound, was a contention, so far as I know, without any authority, and it certainly had no principle to support it. I am therefore of opinion the decision of the revising barrister in each of these cases was right, and that these appeals should be dismissed.

With regard to the point, raised by Mr. Montgomery for the appellant in Cox v. Merriman, as to the position of the appellant as the tenant, I do not think that the court ought to assume that a notice had not been served on the appellant by the overseers to the effect that the landlord had not paid the rate; neither ought the court to assume that this point had been taken before the revising barrister. This court, therefore, did not decide what would have been the result had such notice not been given.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, and have little to add. I think it is important to point out that poor rate is levied as one and indivisible rate, and not the less so because the separate purposes for which it is levied are set out in the demand note. The ratepayer has no right to apportion any part payment for particular purposes; nor, in my judgment, could any such part payment be properly accepted by officials. In my opinion the poor rate is one indivisible rate, and I think it therefore impossible to say, under the circumstances, that the appellants in these cases have paid the poor rate.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

CITIZENS' LIFE ASSURANCE CO. (LIMITED) v. BROWN. (a.)

Company—Libel—Servant of company—Publication—Agency—Scope of employment.

A limited company is responsible for a libel published by one of its officers, where the act is done in the course of employment which is authorized by the company.

This was an appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Asquith, K.C., and Frank Russell, for appellant.

H. Drysdale Woodcock, for respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords Macnaghten, Davey, Lindley, and Sir Arthur Wilson) was delivered by Lord LINDLEY.—The question raised by this appeal is whether a limited company is responsible for a libel published by one of its officers. The action has been tried three times. The plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment every time, with damages which have been every time increased. Counsel for the company feel that it would be useless to send the case back for another trial, and they therefore ask that the last verdict and judgment should be set aside and judgment entered for the company. The facts are shortly as follows: The appellants are an assurance company incorporated with limited liability and carrying on business in New South Wales. From January, 1900, until June, 1900, the respondent Brown (the plaintiff in the action) was in the service of the company as an insurance agent at Tamworth. Brown was introduced to the company by Fitzpatrick, who was employed by the company as a superintendent of agencies under the terms of an agreement dated the 12th of June, 1899. His duties will be referred to presently. Shortly after leaving the employment of the company—namely, in the month of July, Brown entered the service of a rival company called the Standard Life Association, and while in the service of such company Brown visited divers of the policy-holders in the appellant company, and endeavoured to induce such policy-holders to leave the appellant company and to insure in the Standard Life Association, and for the purpose of bringing about such a result made statements derogatory to the appellant company. Fitzpatrick learned that such statements had been and were being made, and he published the libel complained of. It was a circular letter sent to several persons insured in the appellant company in answer to inquiries made by them. It was plainly defamatory. Some statements contained in it were not true, and Fitzpatrick knew they were not true. There was evidence of express malice on the part of Fitzpatrick. There is no note of the learned judge's summing up, but the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, gave him £650 damages, and found that "Fitzpatrick was acting in publishing the libel within the scope of his employment and in the course of his employment." Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for this sum and costs; and the Supreme Court refused to set aside the verdict and enter judgment for the defendants and refused to grant a new trial. Hence the present appeal.

Counsel for the appellants contended, first, that the verdict was wrong in finding that Fitzpatrick acted in publishing the libel within the scope and in the course of his employment; and, secondly, that even if he did, yet the malice with which he wrote it cannot be imputed to the company. In support of this proposition reliance was placed on the well-known judgment of the late Lord Bramwell in Abrath v. North-Eastern Railway Co., 32 W. R. 50, 11 A. C. 247, see p. 250.

It will be convenient to dispose of the second question first. There is no doubt that Lord Bramwell held strongly to his opinion that a corporation was incapable of malice or motive, and that an action for malicious prosecution could not be maintained against a company. Lord Cranworth in Addie v. Western Bank of Scotland, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 145, 15 W. R. H. L. Dig. 14, had expressed a similar opinion as to the liability of corporations for frauds. But these opinions have not prevailed, and their lordships are not prepared to give effect to them. If it is once granted that corporations are for civil purposes to be regarded as persons, i.e., as principals acting by agents and servants, it is difficult to see why the ordinary doctrines of agency, and of master and servant, are not to be applied to corporations as well as to ordinary individuals. These doctrines have been so applied in a great variety of cases, in questions arising out of contract, and in questions arising out of torts and frauds; and to apply them to one class of libels and to deny their application to another class of libels on the ground that malice cannot be imputed to a body corporate appears to their lordships to be contrary to sound legal principles. To talk about imputing malice to corporations appears to their lordships to introduce metaphysical subtleties which are needless and fallacious. Their lordships concur with the view of the Acting Chief Justice in this case, that if Fitzpatrick published the libel complained of in the course of his employment, the company are liable for it on ordinary principles of agency. Fitzpatrick's letter, although published on a privileged occasion, was not itself privileged; and not being privileged the letter must be treated as any other libel written and published by an officer of the company.

There remains, however, the important question whether there was evidence on which the jury could properly find that the publication of the letter was within the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority or, what is the same thing, within the scope of his employment. He was engaged by a written agreement; he was a superintendent; he was to act under instructions given to him by properly authorized officers and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the company. He was to devote his whole time to furthering the company's business. He was to receive and pay money, keep proper accounts, and to supervise various agencies under him. He was to be paid a salary of £5 a week and a commission on policies procured by him. The written agreement did not state more precisely what his duties were. Witnesses were called to throw further light upon the subject. Mr. Eedy, the general secretary of the company, said that if policy-holders wanted to know why the company did not prosecute Brown for his statements about the company, Fitzpatrick should have communicated the matter to the head office before taking action. "It would have been his duty." Another witness said his duty was to appoint and look after agents, and "to stand as an intermediate between the assured and the office. His authority is to secure business and save business, and to visit policy-holders whose policies have lapsed or are likely to lapse. In the district itself there is no one above him." It is clear that the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority and employment was wide, and by no means clearly defined. In considering the scope of his authority and employment their lordships agree with the Acting Chief Justice in thinking that the jury were entitled to act on their own knowledge of Colonial business and habits. They were entitled to consider the necessities of the case arising from the size and nature of the district placed under Fitzpatrick's supervision and what would naturally be done in the colony by a person in his position. He had no actual authority express or implied to write libels nor to do anything legally wrong; but it is not necessary that he should have had any such authority in order to render the company liable for his acts. The law upon this subject cannot be better expressed than it was by the Acting Chief Justice in this case. He said: "Although the particular act which gives the cause of action may not be authorized, still if the act is done in the course of employment which is authorized, then the master is liable for the act of his servant." This doctrine has been approved and acted upon by this Board in Mackay v. Colonial Bank of New Brunswick, 22 W. R. 473, L. R. 5 P. C. 394; Swire v. Francis, L. R. 3 A. C. 106, and the doctrine is as applicable to incorporated companies as to individuals. All doubt on this question was removed by the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 15 W. R. 877, L. R. 2 Ex. 259, which is the leading case on the subject. It was distinctly approved by Lord Selborne in the House of Lords in Houldsworth v. City of Glasgow Bank, 28 W. R. 677, L. R. 5 A. C., at p. 326, and has been followed in numerous other cases.

Such being the evidence, their lordships cannot judicially hold that there was no evidence to warrant the jury in finding that it was within the scope of Fitzpatrick's authority and employment to write to policy-holders in order to counteract the mischief which Brown was doing to the business of the company; and although Fitzpatrick went too far and made charges against Brown which he knew were not true, their lordships are of opinion that the company are legally responsible for what he wrote.

As regards the verdict being against the weight of evidence, it must be borne in mind that Simpson, J., who tried the last action, was satisfied with the verdict, and he reports that the judges who tried the two previous actions were also satisfied with the verdicts given in them. Their lordships see no reason for thinking the verdict wrong on the evidence adduced.

Their lordships will therefore humbly advise his Majesty to dismiss the appeal, and the appellant company must pay the costs.

Lunacy.

Appeal.

In re E. V. W., A PERSON OF UNSOUND MIND SO FOUND BY INQUISITION. (a.)

Lunacy — Illegitimacy — Disposition of property after death—Deed of trust executed by lunatic after inquisition—Application to test validity or perpetuate testimony—Rights and duties of the Crown—Conflict of control—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict. c. 5), s. 120.

The court cannot recognize, or regard as otherwise than void, a deed executed by a lunatic, after inquisition, disposing of his property after death; and therefore will not, at the lunatic's instance, order a trial for testing the validity of such deed, or for perpetuating testimony of capacity to execute it.

Ex parte Sir Benjamin Wright, 1 Vern. 155, discussed.

Appeal from the order of a Master in Lunacy.

The applicant was an unmarried lady, fifty-six years of age, who had been found of unsound mind by inquisition on the 8th of April, 1869, and had been in an asylum till some two years ago, since which she had lived in various houses hired for her, and had been kept under proper supervision.

She suffered still from occasional fits of violence, and was subject to strong delusions, but when free from these was clear-headed and capable of forming a rational opinion.

She was possessed of, or entitled in reversion to, sums aggregating about £80,000 invested in New Consols, which were in court, and as she was of illegitimate birth and her interest in the property was absolute, it was desirable, as she was well aware, that some disposition should be made to prevent the property passing to the Crown at her death, and to secure it to certain persons who were relations of one or other of her parents, and who were in some degree dependent upon her, she being in the habit of making them certain allowances out of her income with the sanction of the court.

(a) Reported by R. HILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

With this view she made application through the committee of her estate to the master, asking that she might be at liberty to execute a will and deed-poll, by which latter she desired to declare herself trustee of her property, as to the income, for herself for life, and as to the capital, for the persons above-mentioned in various shares, certain charitable gifts being also included, and asking that, on such deed being executed, she might be at liberty to bring an action by her committee as her next friend, against the Attorney-General, for the purpose of deciding as to the validity of the instrument. The master, after several hearings, came to the conclusion that she had no power to execute such a deed, and he made no order except as to costs.

In the meantime, in the absence of any prohibition by the master, the applicant had executed the will and deed-poll, and she now gave notice of appeal, asking that the order might be discharged and that she might be at liberty to bring an action in the Chancery Division, by the committee of her estate as her next friend, against one or more of the other beneficiaries under the deed, for a declaration that the deed was valid, or that such other directions might be given as might be proper for the institution of proceedings for establishing the validity of the deed, or, alternatively, that such directions might be given as might be proper for the institution of proceedings to set it aside.

The appeal was by arrangement adjourned into court without being heard by the Lord Justice in chambers.

Upjohn, K.C., and MacSwinney, for the applicant.—The object of the application is to have the question of validity set at rest in the applicant's lifetime, which will be a great relief to her mind. If she be refused and left to make her dispositions by will, their validity can only be determined after her death, when perhaps all those who could have testified as to her capacity at the time of execution may be dead too. The desired object might be attained by allowing her to bring the proposed action through her committee, and at the expense of her estate, or by intimating that if those interested under the deed should undertake litigation, the court would accede to it, and allow the proceedings to be carried on at the expense of the estate, and with the approval of the master, so that no improper costs might be incurred. The action might be brought to try the direct issue of capacity as in Sir Benjamin Wright's case, 1 Vern. 155, or it might be merely one for perpetuation of testimony. The latter is not mentioned in the notice of appeal, but we ask that the notice be read as if such an action were expressly referred to therein. This deed is like a will made in a lucid interval, and which would be admitted to probate. The language of Sir William Grant in Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. 605, 610, shows that an absolute conveyance by deed in a lucid interval is on the same footing as a will. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—That was not a case of a lunatic so found by inquisition. ROMER, L.J.—I was thinking of a case we have all heard of, where a lady was in the habit of recklessly getting rid of her property, and was afterwards found lunatic by inquisition. Do you say that finding made no difference? Is not a lunatic's power of dealing with his property taken away by the inquisition?] The effect of the finding is to shift the burden of proof, which previously was on those impugning the validity of the lunatic's act, to those who assert its validity. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Can it be that there are two persons who can dispose of the same property—the lunatic and the committee?] There is nothing in the deed to withdraw the property from the control of the committee. He can at any time exercise, as to part or the whole, by order of the court, the power of revocation which the deed contains. The instrument has been expressly framed so as to pass nothing before the lunatic's death. The principle laid down in Beverley's case, 4 Rep. 123, 127*b*, relates to alienations during the life of the lunatic. There is nothing in the Lunacy Act, 1890, to vest a lunatic's property absolutely in his committee, as the Bankruptcy Act vests a bankrupt's property in his trustee. The committee's powers are purely administrative. It is difficult to see on what ground the capacity to execute a deed can be denied, when there is capacity to make a will. This difficulty occurred to Lord Cranworth in Elliot v. Ince, 5 W. R. 465, 482, 7 De G. M. & G. 475, 484. The object in view is to ensure the peace of mind of this lady by bringing the matter to a conclusion in her lifetime. In the words of Cockburn, L.C.J., in Banks v. Goodfellow, L. R. 5 Q. B. 549, 566, 18 W. R. Dig. 101, it cannot be the object of the legislator to aggravate an affliction in itself so great by the deprivation of a right the value of which is universally felt and acknowledged.

They also cited In re Tayleur, 19 W. R. 462, L. R. 6 Ch. 416; In re Stoer, 32 W. R. 1005, 9 P. D. 120.

The case stood over for a week, that the Court might have an opportunity of looking at the record in Sir Benjamin Wright's case.

Nov. 7. — VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., read extracts from the record in the above-mentioned case, which had been furnished from the Record Office, and the particulars of which will be found in his lordship's judgment. They showed that Sir Benjamin had been found a lunatic with lucid intervals in 1681, that he executed a settlement on the 29th of March, 1683, while the inquisition was still in force, and that the Lord Keeper, on his application, afterwards directed that an issue should be tried, but whether as to his sanity generally or as to his capacity to execute the settlement on the 29th of March was not clear.

Sir R. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the Crown.—We submit that the issue to be tried in Sir Benjamin Wright's case was as to his sanity, and not as to the validity of the deed which he had already executed—a fact which was not mentioned to the court. It is quite possible to reconcile that case with sound principle in this way. The Crown's rights in lunacy depend on the Crown's prerogative, which is asserted by the inquisition, and so becomes matter of record. In any proceedings founded on a bond or contract of a lunatic so found—e.g., a fine levied—the Attorney-General would intervene and put a stop to the action. What the Lord Keeper did was done for the purpose of superseding the inquisition. The lunatic was to plead to the inquisition that he had recovered, and the Attorney-General, instead of demurring to the plea, was to join issue. The further direction which is mentioned in Minute A on the record, but of which no entry can be found, was, we submit, intended to be (supposing Sir Benjamin should be found to have recovered) a direction that a writ of supersedeas should issue, and so the inquisition would be vacated, just as it would have been after petition to the Crown in the usual way. So long as an inquisition stands it is inconsistent that any document should be executed by the lunatic transferring his property, because this is vested in the committee. The Statute of Prerogatives (17 Ed. 2, stat. 1, cc. 9, 10 (Ruffhead)) shows what is the position of the Crown with regard to the property of an idiot and a non compos respectively. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Viner's Abridgment, vol. 15, p. 135 (2nd ed.), D. 2, and asked if there was any case raising the question of the validity of a lunatic's deed executed after the inquisition.] The only possible case is this of Sir Benjamin Wright. Mansfield's case, 12 Rep. 123, shows that a fine levied by an idiot before inquisition cannot be avoided because it is matter of record; but after inquisition, we submit, any conveyance, however solemn, is absolutely void. It is laid down in Beverley's case, 4 Rep. 123, 126*b*, 127*b*, that after inquisition the acts of an idiot are absolutely void, and that those of a non compos are in exactly the same position. The more one looks at the consequences of the deed now in question before your lordships, the more inconsistent they appear with the control of her property vested in the Crown. The lady is to be made trustee, but she would be an unfit trustee, because a lunatic, and the other beneficiaries could apply for the appointment of a new trustee. They would also have the right to require that the trust fund should not be improperly invested. Again, the lady might alter her mind and desire to make new dispositions; she might revoke the deed, execute a fresh one, and come again to the court for leave to test its validity. Moreover, any action brought as she suggests must be collusive—for all the parties would be in the same interest—or unnecessary, if brought to set aside the deed, for the committee can revoke it at any time. Her object will be best attained by revoking it and disposing of her property by will. This she can re-execute from time to time as witnesses to her capacity die off, and so she can herself practically ensure perpetuation of testimony.

MacSwinney in reply.—The suggestion that the lady might dispose of her property by a will to be re-executed de anno in annum as witnesses to her capacity die off is a most unpractical one. As to the evidence of the Lord Chancellor's visitors, it was held in Roe v. Nix, [1893] P. 55, 41 W. R. Dig. 200, that production of their reports cannot be compelled by subpœna, they being confidential. The propositions in Beverley's case relied on by counsel for the Crown are merely obiter. We rely on Elliot v. Ince, where an issue was directed to try the validity of instruments executed by a lunatic; the only difference between that case and this being that there the execution was before the inquisition. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—Is not that a vital distinction?] Lord Cranworth in that case seems to have considered that a deed and will executed during a lucid interval were on the same footing. A will so executed is valid subject only to proof of the lucid interval by the parties interested, and it makes no difference whether the execution is before or after the inquisition. As to Sir Benjamin Wright's case, it is important to notice who were the parties, and also who was not a party, to the litigation in the Common Pleas consequent on the Lord Keeper's direction. The parties to the fine were the trustees of the settlement which the lunatic had executed, the lunatic himself and his wife and son, beneficiaries under the settlement, but the Attorney-General was a party neither to the fine, which was levied in Easter term 1683, nor to the recovery, which was suffered in the following term, and there is no trace of any plea by him nor of any vacation of the inquisition. As to the conflict of control which it is alleged would result from Miss W.'s deed, I say that the powers of the Crown delegated to the committee are analogous to powers of sale conferred on trustees of a settlement, which put an end to the estate when executed, no doubt, but not until then. So in the present case, until the committee exercises his powers under section 120, there is something left in the lunatic, and of this she can declare a valid trust.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is an appeal from what was originally the order of the master made on the 25th of July in this year. There was an appeal from the master to Mathew, L.J., who was the Lord Justice acting in lunacy, and he referred the matter to this court. Now, the application to the master was an application that E. V. W., a lunatic so found, might be at liberty to commence an action, by her committee as her next friend, in the Chancery Division of the High Court, against one or more of the other beneficiaries under the deed-poll exhibited to the committee's affidavit of the 12th of July for a declaration that the deed-poll is valid, or that such other directions may be given as may be proper for the institution of proceedings for establishing the validity of the said deed-poll; or, alternatively, that such directions may be given as may be proper for the institution of proceedings to have the said deed set aside.

Now, the master refused that application, and what we have to consider in this case is whether he was right in so doing. This lady was found a lunatic on an inquisition as long ago as 1869. We were told that she was not born in wedlock, and is therefore nullius filia and can have no kin. We were also told in the course of Mr. Upjohn's opening that there have been various examinations of this lady, both by the Lord Chancellor's visitors and by other doctors qualified to form an opinion as to her mental condition, and we were told that the view of these gentlemen was that generally this lady, apart from the unfortunate delusions which resulted, and I must take it properly resulted, in her being found a lunatic is of such mental capacity that she could generally be expected to deal with her property in a reasonable and sensible manner. We were told that the object of the deed was to make a reasonable provision for the children and other relations of her mother and of the gentleman who was her father in fact—a provision suitable for the condition in life of these people. We were also told that, there being a very large sum of money to which this lady was entitled, even after making this provision for these people who are not her relations in law, whatever they may be in blood, there would be a considerable surplus; and I rather gathered from the opening that this deed disposed of the surplus by giving it to hospitals or other charitable institutions.

Under these circumstances, the state of mind of this lady being that which we have been informed, and the provisions of the deed being such as I have mentioned, we are asked to say that the master was wrong in refusing this application, which was an application for the purpose, to put it shortly, of testing the validity of this deed thus executed by the lady. The deed, I ought to have mentioned, is one that gives nothing away during her lifetime, but only disposes of her estate after giving her the benefit of it for the whole of her life. Now we have to ask ourselves whether we ought to recognize that deed in any way—that is to say, to recognize it sufficiently to justify us in making some order by which the validity of this deed and the present mental capacity of this lady can be immediately determined. The conclusion that we have come to is that we ought not to do so. We think we ought to treat this deed as being absolutely void and of no effect whatsoever. It was suggested in the course of the argument of Mr. Upjohn that even although we might not think we had jurisdiction to make such an order as that which is suggested in the notice of appeal, yet we might make some order for the perpetuation of testimony. I may say, once for all, that we are of opinion that if we take the view which we do take, that this deed is absolutely void, it follows (and I need not go into the authorities upon it) that we ought not to make any order for perpetuation of testimony.

In order to judge whether we ought to recognize this deed in this court at all, we have had to consider what is the position of the Crown with reference to lunatics so found. Of course the Lunacy Act of 1890 makes a quantity of provisions with regard to persons who are not lunatics so found, but who are incapable of managing themselves and their property. This case is one of a lunatic so found, and I only propose to deal with such a case; but it must not be supposed that by so doing I mean to limit my reasoning entirely to such a case. It may very well be that when one comes to look at the provisions of the Act of 1890 in the case of a person not a lunatic so found, but who has been made subject to an order under this Act, the same reasoning which brings the court to the conclusion that it has done, with reference to a lunatic so found, might bring one to the same conclusion with reference to a person who is subject to an order under the Act, who is not a lunatic so found. But I say nothing about that one way or the other. I may as well at once read the terms of one portion of section 120, which deals with powers exercisable by a committee under the order of the judge. It is in these terms: "The judge may by order authorize and direct the committee of the estate of a lunatic to do all or any of the following things—(1) Sell any property belonging to the lunatic." Then when one looks at section 341, which is the definition section, one finds that property "includes real and personal property, whether in possession, reversion, remainder, contingency, or expectancy, and any estate or interest and any undivided share therein." I thought it convenient to refer to those provisions of the Act of 1890 before I said anything about the relation of the Crown to lunatics. Generally it may be taken that the Crown is the custodian of the property of a lunatic so found. I think it may be said in general terms that property only passes out of the control of the lunatic, and comes under the control of the Crown for the purpose of the lunatic having the protection which a lunatic is entitled to from the Crown. Therefore, when one has to consider the question as to whether this deed is void, one cannot dispose of it by saying that that which was the property of the lunatic has ceased to be the property of the lunatic, and has become the property of the Crown. But during the whole period of history of which we have reports, the Crown has always had the prerogative, although it was not always defined as it was later by statute, of dealing with and controlling the property of a lunatic. It is quite sufficient, it seems to me, to dispose of the case that we have now to dispose of, to say that the Crown has such control, as distinguished from property, of the property real and personal of the lunatic; because the moment one sees that the committee, as representing the Crown, has the rights which I have just referred to in reading a portion of the 120th section of the Act of 1890, it is perfectly plain that those rights cannot be effectively exercised by the Crown in the interest and for the benefit of the lunatic, if someone else is to have the control during the same period of time of this same property. In such a case there would be a conflict of control which would be entirely inconsistent with the exercise by the committee of the Crown's rights which have been delegated to him.

It is said against this that it is plain that, if a lunatic is of sufficient mental capacity to execute a will, he can execute a will, and that that will can be proved if the court before whom the application for probate is made is of opinion that the lunatic at the time of the making of the will was of testamentary capacity and understood what he or she was doing. As to that there is no doubt.

Then it is said, if the lunatic has this capacity to make a will which can be proved after her death, why should she not also have the power to execute a deed which is only, on the face of it, to take effect upon her death, and only creates reversionary interests arising after her death. It does seem a little inconsistent, at first sight, that the law should recognize the capacity of the lunatic to make a will and refuse to recognize the capacity of the lunatic to execute a deed which is intended only to take effect after the death of the lunatic. But the answer to this is, that the beneficiaries under the will have no interest, and no locus standi whatsoever, until the death of the testator or testatrix as the case may be. The will is ambulatory, and may be revoked by the maker of it at any time before death, and the result of that is that the execution of a will gives no immediate interest whatsoever to the beneficiaries. It gives neither interest in possession nor interest in reversion; it is a mere ambulatory document which is of no effect whatsoever until the death of the maker of it, and the consequence of that is that the making of such a will does not give rise to any conflict of control whatsoever. The beneficiaries under the will cannot, when orders are being made in respect of the lunatic's property, or in respect of the property the subject of an alleged deed like the present, come forward and claim to interfere in any way, whereas those claiming under a deed could insist upon a locus standi to be heard, and successfully insist upon it, and immediately, therefore, the conflict of jurisdiction would arise. It is said that this deed is in such a form that that could not arise. I do not think we ought to look at the deed, but it is suggested hypothetically that it might be in such a form as, in substance, to make any rights given under it subject to the rights of the Crown, but even that would not take away the locus standi of those claiming under the deed to be so heard. They would have a voice, for instance, in the appointment of a trustee if the grantor made herself the trustee under the terms of the deed. Under those circumstances, it seems to me that the argument which is based upon the state of the law being such that the lunatic's will would be given effect to if it turns out that she executed it during a lucid interval, she being of sufficient testamentary capacity, does not carry us to the conclusion that because she has such a testamentary power she ought also to have power to deal with property by a deed inter vivos.

I really do not think that it is necessary for me to say much more with regard to the present motion than that we ought not to recognize this deed in any way, and the court ought to treat it as entirely void on the plain and simple ground that the execution of that deed is inconsistent with the control which the Crown has the right and duty of exercising over the property of a lunatic, and that that itself is sufficient reason for the conclusion to which the court has come.

But then it is said that, although it is inconsistent with the powers and duties which the Crown has always exercised in reference to lunatics, powers and duties which are recognized by the Legislature by the statute of 1890, there is authority to show that, notwithstanding the fact that the Crown has such control, custody, and power, notwithstanding the fact that the Crown has the right to exercise, and has constantly exercised, the power of selling and disposing of the property of a lunatic, both real and personal, for the benefit of the lunatic, yet the court ought to recognize such a deed, however inconsistent with such powers of the Crown, because it is said that the authorities bind us to do so. I do not propose to go through the authorities at any length, because it really would only be wasting time. I may say generally of Beverley's case that, having regard to the passage which Mr. Parker read to us this morning with regard to lunatics as distinguished from idiots, it does not favour the argument of those who presented this motion, but rather favours the proposition of the Attorney-General that such a deed is absolutely void. But it is said that although Beverley's case is against the propositions which have been urged in support of the motion, Sir Benjamin Wright's case is an authority for the proposition that if a lunatic so found does, between the date of the inquisition and the death—that is to say, during the continuance of life, execute a deed, the court ought, and is bound, to make such an order as will result in the issue of the sanity of the lunatic, or the capacity of the lunatic at the moment of the execution of the document in question, being tried and disposed of and put on record in some shape or other. One would be glad to arrive at any conclusion which might mitigate the sorrows of the position of a lunatic so found. No one can doubt but that many a lunatic properly so found chafes very much under the restrictions which prevent him from dealing with property, and doing other acts, which his mere mental capacity would probably suffice to enable him to do, and to do reasonably; but if it is necessary for the protection of lunatics generally that they should be debarred from the exercise of such powers, one must, however regretfully, refuse to accord them to lunatics who are under the protection of the Crown. Still, if one could have found a means of doing it consistently with what is essential for the protection of lunatics, the court would have been glad to do so. We have not found any such means; and, when one examines the case of Sir Benjamin Wright, I do not think that it would justify us in saying that it is an authority for the proposition that the court ought to decide upon the validity of a deed inter vivos executed by a lunatic so found, and while the inquisition still stands unvacated or superseded.

The report is a very short one. It states: "A motion was made that a man, who was found to be a lunatic, being now by his confinement become of sound mind, might be inspected, and might make a settlement of his estate. But the Lord Keeper refused to make any order in it; but directed them, that if he made any settlement of his estate, the same should be done before the justices of the Common Pleas by fine, that so they might examine him and inspect him. And directed, that for as much as now he was found a lunatic on record, they should reply to it that he was now restored to his understanding; that so issue might be taken upon it and tried in the Common Pleas."

We have had the opportunity of examining the original record in the Record Office with regard to this case. The request was made by the court to the Record Office that they would supply us with copies of all documents which might throw any light upon Sir Benjamin Wright's case, so that we might be informed at once of what really was the meaning of the order in that case. I want to take this opportunity of saying how extremely carefully and well and quickly those in the Record Office have made the necessary search and provided us with every document throwing any light upon the matter. We have got these documents now before us, and with them in our hands we can follow pretty well (I do not say with absolute certainty) what was done in the case. It is plain upon the report in Vernon that it is consistent with either of two possibilities. An issue was to be tried of some sort. What was the issue? It may have been an issue as to whether the soundness of mind of Sir Benjamin Wright had been restored, so that the inquisition ought to be vacated or superseded, or it may have been an issue, as those who support this motion say that it was, to try the question of the capacity of Sir Benjamin Wright to execute this particular settlement. It may have been the intention to direct an issue to try that question, which was consistent with the continuance of the inquisition finding Sir Benjamin Wright a lunatic. When one looks at these documents one finds that the commission seems to have gone in 1681. The inquisition finding Sir Benjamin Wright a lunatic is dated the 3rd of October in that year, and runs thus: "Inquisition finding him a lunatic for one month last past with lucid intervals." Now, it is possible that, as far as the report in Vernon is concerned, the object of the issue was to try whether the deed was executed in such a lucid interval. Then on the 29th of March, 1683, the settlement seems to have been executed by the lunatic, Sir Benjamin Wright, and it conveyed the Manor of Wokinden to Nathan Wright, who was the son of the lunatic, and who covenanted to convey the same to trustees upon certain trusts. I do not know that it is really material to mention the trusts, but that being so, that deed was acknowledged on the 2nd of April, 1683. On the 25th of April the deed was enrolled. On the 16th of April, in Hilary term, there were two minutes made by Mr. Registrar Devenish, which minutes are marked for our convenience "A" and "B." I do not know that there is very much difference, if any, in the effect of them. "A" runs thus: "Mr. North would have a reinspecon of Sr Benn. Hee is now better and there is a settlement to bee made on the sonn. Mr. Attorney-General: The King doth only take care and is not otherwyse concerned and there must bee a method of trying it." "It" may mean either the question of the lucid interval, to put it shortly, or the question of the general sanity of Sir Benjamin. Then it goes on—"By the Court: Let there be a plea put in to the inquisition and Mr. Attorney-Generall to join yssue in it and let it bee tryed as soon as may bee and then will give further direction." It does not appear that any record of the further direction after the trial of the issue can be found anywhere in the Record Office. Then minute "B," which is of the same date and is obviously the same order, runs thus: "Mr. North: This comes upon the point of lunacy, wee pray that it may be put in some way that may plead to the inquisicio Mr. Attorney Cur plead to the inquisicio lett Mr. Attorney joyne issue and if any settlement to be made the fine and recovery shall be in open cort in the Cort of Common Pleas." I rather gather from all this that the issue was to be tried in the Common Pleas. There is nothing to show that the issue was an issue upon what I call for shortness the lucid interval point. The objection which occurred to my own mind to holding that the inquisition as to the state of mind generally of the lunatic, Sir Benjamin Wright, could not be tried in the Court of Common Pleas in these proceedings of fine and recovery, was met by Mr. Parker by saying that you would, as a result of those proceedings, have a finding of record, and it might be that that finding would go to the general condition of the mind of the lunatic at that time, and that if the Attorney-General was present, and that state of mind was put on record, it would be sufficient record to enable the Crown and its officers to deal with the Crown's office, or office and title, whatever it may be called, and if the finding in the Common Pleas of such a record was favourable to the sanity of Sir Benjamin Wright, then the Crown could thereupon order the inquisition to be vacated or superseded. I am not prepared to say that that is not sound. It is not, of course, the same thing as the commission which originally issued, upon which the finding in lunacy was based. There has been, in such a case, no second inquisition with a finding thereon justifying a superseding or vacation. But still there would, or might, be in the proceedings in the Common Pleas, a finding of record that might be sufficient to determine the state of mind of the lunatic to enable the original inquisition to be vacated or superseded at the instance of the Crown. It is sufficient that I should say about this case that now we have got all the particulars we have been able to get of it, it is not possible to say that it is a clear authority for the proposition which is put forward by those who are making this motion, that if a deed is executed by a lunatic so found the court ought to recognize that deed sufficiently for the purpose of determining and putting on record either the decision of the validity of that deed or a finding as to the capacity of the lunatic executing it at the date of the deed. Under those circumstances I can only say that we are bound in this state of authority to refuse to recognize this deed, even for the purpose of testing its validity, and we are bound to treat it as void, and to make no order for any trial to test its validity or for the perpetuation of testimony in view of any future action. Therefore the appeal will be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this application ought not to be acceded to. It is admitted on behalf of the appellant that the court cannot be asked to approve the provisions of the so-called deed which is in question before us, nor can the court be asked to sanction the committee on behalf of the lunatic executing that deed or a similar deed. But it is said on behalf of the applicant that the court ought to sanction or recognize the document to the extent of authorizing some proceedings on the basis of it, by which either evidence could be preserved or an issue found in favour of the lunatic having, at the date of the document, either testamentary power or some power of dealing with her estate to a certain extent. I cannot see my way to accede to that suggestion. The lady is a lunatic so found, with a committee appointed. An application of this kind is a mere experiment, and I think, had there been any real ground for it, we should have had some authority to justify such an application.

To my mind there are two fatal objections to this appeal. In the first place, having regard to the rights of the Crown and the provisions of section 120 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, it is clear to me that this so-called deed, purporting to bind the lady's property as from its date, and pending the lunacy, is wholly inoperative and void, and ought not to be recognized by us in any way. In the second place, I cannot see how any practicable and proper proceedings could be sanctioned by us which would have the effect desired by the applicant. I can see how certain collusive proceedings could be taken, but those certainly the court could not sanction. On those grounds I think the application fails.

I will only add one word with regard to the case of Sir Benjamin Wright. That case is not satisfactorily reported, nor easy to follow, but at any rate it is to my mind no authority which we can recognize as justifying this application. I cannot help thinking that the case only shows that the court at that date, 1683, adopted the course it did in order to allow an issue to be in effect tried whether the lunatic had wholly ceased to be so, and ought no longer to be treated as one; in other words, as a method of obtaining a supersedeas. Fine and recovery being hypothetical proceedings, and of record, it appears to have been considered that a finding of sanity in those proceedings might have had the desired effect of superseding the finding of the inquisition, which is also of record, and could have, of course, only been effected by matters of equal force. In the present case it is open to the lunatic to take the recognized proceedings by way of supersedeas if she think fit to do so. In that case, if she took these proceedings and succeeded, she would then of course be able to deal with her property in any way she thought fit. But she has not taken those proceedings, nor indeed do I gather that it is considered that she could do so successfully. At any rate she has not taken them, and I cannot think that the present application, the lunacy remaining, as it does, in full force, ought to be in any way or on any ground acceded to, and it must accordingly fail.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We are bound to treat the deed executed by this lady as absolutely void and of no effect. I can see no answer to the argument which Mr. Parker presented to us, derived from Beverley's case, which seems to me to be a clear authority. Lord Coke, after dealing with the case of an idiot from birth, and pointing out that his alienation is absolutely void both of lands and of goods and chattels, proceeds to say there is no difference in the case of a lunatic after office found. He says: "And therefore, after the office found thereof, the alienation, gift, &c., of him who is non compos mentis are in equal case with the alienation or gift of an idiot." Then he goes on to say: "So that it appears that in judgment of law fatuus et idiota include as well non compos mentis, as idiota a nativitate, and therefore they are in the same case as to the alienation of their lands and tenements, goods and chattels."

Now is there any authority to the contrary of that? Sir Benjamin Wright's case, to which we have devoted a good deal of attention, seems to me to be only a suggestion by the Lord Keeper as to a mode of deciding the issue whether Sir Benjamin Wright was or was not of sound mind; whether, in short, in some subsequent proceedings a supersedeas could be granted. Our attention has been called to various authorities in which the courts have directed an issue whether a deed executed by a person of unsound mind was or was not valid. But when the cases are examined it will be found that in every single case the deed in question was one executed before inquisition found and not after inquisition found. That being so, there was not that conflict of control which in point of principle enables us to decide this case. It cannot be right that the Crown, or the committee representing the Crown, should have the control and management of this estate, and, at the same time, that the lunatic should have power to dispose of her estate as she thinks fit. I think this deed ought to be treated as absolutely null and void.

Appeal dismissed; costs to come out of the estate, including costs of preparing the deed and of an application for leave to stamp it, though the stamping had not been proceeded with.

THE KING v. JUSTICES OF KENT. (a.)

Highway—Diversion—Notices on highway—Time for affixing—Resolution of district council—Refusal of two justices to certify—Jurisdiction to apply to two other justices—Certificate—Consent of landowner—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 84, 85.

Where a highway is proposed to be diverted, the notice required by section 85 of the Highway Act, 1835, to be affixed at each end of the highway need not be affixed at such a date as to leave a period of four weeks before the issue by the justices of their certificate.

Where, pursuant to a resolution of a district council, the surveyor has applied to two justices to view a highway which is proposed to be diverted, and the justices refuse to certify, the surveyor may, without a fresh resolution of the district council, apply to two other justices to view, who, if they approve of the proposed diversion, may certify. The consent of the owner of the land through which the proposed new highway lies need not appear upon the face of the certificate.

Judgment of the Divisional Court ([1904] 2 K. B. 349), 52 W. R. Dig. 63 reversed.

Appeal by the Tonbridge Urban District Council from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills and Kennedy, JJ., reported [1904] 2 K. B. 349) making absolute a rule for a certiorari to bring up and quash a certificate of two justices and an order of quarter sessions for the diversion of a highway in the parish of Tonbridge.

By a notice in writing dated the 25th of April, 1903, and addressed to the Tonbridge Urban District Council, certain owners of land in the district stated that they were desirous that a footpath across their land leading from Douglas-road into Brook-street should be in part diverted and a more commodious highway across their land substituted therefor, and they required the urban district council to summon a meeting to consider their wish and proposal.

The council on the 1st of July resolved that the owners' proposal be agreed to, and directed their surveyor to make application to two justices to view.

On the 3rd of July the surveyor applied to two justices, who had a view and declined to make any order. Without any fresh resolution of the council the surveyor on the 9th of November applied to two other justices, who had a view on the 11th of November, and directed the surveyor to affix a notice in the form or to the effect of schedule (No. 19) of the Highway Act, 1835, at the place and by the side of each end of the highway from whence the same was proposed to be diverted, and to insert the same notice in a newspaper for four successive weeks from the 11th of November, and to affix a like notice on the church doors on four successive Sundays next after the same date. The notice, which was dated the 11th of November, was affixed at each end of the highway on the 14th of November, and it stated that the justices' certificate would be lodged with the clerk of the peace on the 7th of December, and that an application would be made on the 7th of January to the quarter sessions for an order for diversion. The notice was inserted in the Tonbridge Free Press, a newspaper published once a week in the district, on the 14th, 21st, and 28th of November, and the 5th of December, and was affixed to the church doors on Sundays, the 15th, 22nd, and 29th of November, and the 6th of December.

On the 7th of December, twenty-three days after the notice was first published, the two justices who had viewed on the 11th of November gave a certificate, which was on the same day lodged with the clerk of the peace. The certificate stated that proof had been given to them of the publication of the notices required by the statute, and that they had viewed the highway proposed to be diverted and also the proposed new highway, and that upon that view they found that the proposed new highway would be more commodious to the public "because the said old highway is a mere footpath across an open field, which is very wet and muddy in winter and very inconvenient to the liege subjects of our lord the king using and travelling along the said highway, whilst the proposed new highway will be of a uniform width of 6ft., and will be formed with a solid bottom and with a 3in. top course of tar paving. It is understood that such 6ft. pathway will eventually form part of a new 36ft. roadway to be ultimately lighted and taken over by the urban district council of Tonbridge." The consent of the owners of the land through which the proposed new highway would pass was not stated on the face of the certificate. Notice of appeal to quarter sessions against the certificate was given by the Tonbridge Rural District Council and Mr. Charles Eastwood. On the 7th of January, 1904, the quarter sessions dismissed the appeal as being out of time, and made an order that the certificate should be enrolled and that the diversion should be made and the old highway stopped up.

The rule for a certiorari was obtained on the grounds, inter alia—(a) that the request of the 25th of April, 1903, and the resolution of the urban district council of the 1st of July, 1903, having been acted on and the justices having viewed pursuant thereto and having refused a certificate under section 85, further proceedings on the same request and resolution were incompetent; (b) that section 85 was not complied with as regards notices; (c) that the written consent of the owners was not shown on the face of the certificate; and (d) that the reasons given by the justices in their certificate were insufficient and bad. The Divisional Court held that it was a condition precedent to the justices' granting a certificate for the diversion of a highway under section 85 of the Highway Act, 1835, that the notices should have been affixed at each end of the highway proposed to be diverted at a date which would leave twenty-eight days between that date and the date of the issue of the certificate. The court further held that the justices who issued the certificate had jurisdiction to do so without a fresh resolution of the urban district council, and that the written consent of the owner of the land through which the proposed new highway would pass need not appear on the face of the certificate. The court accordingly made the rule absolute to quash the certificate and the order of quarter sessions. The Tonbridge Urban District Council appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and R. Cunningham Glen, for the appellants.—Section 85 of the Highway Act, 1835, does not prescribe any date for affixing the notice at each end of the proposed diversion, nor that it shall remain affixed for any length of time. The section requires the surveyor to "affix" the notice. That is done once for all. It is not an apt expression to denote the maintaining of a notice. The words "for four successive weeks" apply only to the insertion of the notice in the newspaper. The decision of the Divisional Court was therefore wrong.

They referred to Reg. v. Surrey Justices, L. R. 5 Q. B. 466, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 48.

Danckwerts, K.C., and C. F. Hohler, for the respondents.—The words "for four successive weeks" in section 85 of the Highway Act, 1835, apply both to the affixing of the notice on the highway and to insertion of it in the newspaper. Otherwise there is no time prescribed before the issue of the certificate for affixing the notice on the highway. The object is to give those who do not read the local newspaper, and who do not see the notice on the church door, the opportunity of seeing it posted up on the highway. That is the most likely place where persons who use the highway will see it. The section means that the notice must be affixed on the highway, and must remain affixed for four successive weeks next before the issue of the certificate. The diversion of a highway is a taking away of a public right, and the section authorizing it should be construed strictly against those who seek to take away that right. The Divisional Court were therefore right upon that point. Secondly, the Divisional Court were wrong in the three other points raised. In the first place, as the two justices who were first applied to by the surveyor refused to certify, the surveyor could not apply to two other justices to view without a fresh resolution of the district council. The resolution of the council was exhausted when the first application was made. The council might have changed their minds if the matter had been brought before them again. If that were not so, the surveyor might go round to every justice in the county until he got two who would certify. The legislature cannot have intended that. In the next place, the certificate does not state that the consent in writing of the owner of the land through which the proposed highway lies has been given. Section 85 requires the consent in writing of the landowner as a condition precedent to the diversion, and the certificate must state all the preliminaries necessary to give the justices jurisdiction to certify: Reg. v. Worcestershire Justices, 3 E. & B. 477, 2 W. R. C. L. Dig. 128; Reg. v. Harvey, 23 W. R. 231, at p. 232, L. R. 10 Q. B. 46, at p. 50. Section 118 provides that the forms must be followed, and a form of consent is given in Form 18 in the schedule to the Act. A material variation from the forms is fatal: Davison v. Gill, 1 East 64. In the third place, the reasons given by the justices in their certificate were bad. The reasons why the new road is more commodious than the old one must appear "upon such view"; Reg. v. Wallace, 28 W. R. 149, 4 Q. B. D. 641. The reasons assigned in the certificate were that it was intended to make the new road of more solid foundations, and that it was likely to be taken over by the district council. These alleged benefits could not appear upon view. The commodiousness must not depend upon the mode in which the road will be made up in the future, but upon looking at the locus in quo whether the proposed road is shorter or more accessible or less steep, or such like, than the old road. The certiorari, therefore, was rightly issued.

Macmorran, K.C., in reply upon the first point.—The notice here was affixed to each end of this highway so as to cover the period during which the notice was inserted in the newspaper and was affixed on the church door. That, at any rate, is sufficient. [He was not called upon on the other points.]

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court upon a very technical point raised under section 85 of the Highway Act, 1835. That section imposes certain conditions before an order can be made for the diversion or stopping up of a highway, and the main question raised is whether a certain condition has been fulfilled so as to satisfy the section. Section 85 provides that "when it shall appear upon such view of such two justices of the peace, made at the request of the said surveyor as aforesaid, that any public highway may be diverted and turned, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, so as to make the same nearer or more commodious to the public, and the owner of the lands or grounds through which such new highway so proposed to be made shall consent thereto by writing under his hand, or if it shall appear upon such view that any public highway is unnecessary, the said justices shall direct the surveyor to affix a notice in the form or to the effect of schedule (No. 19) to this Act annexed, in legible characters, at the place and by the side of each end of the said highway from whence the same is proposed to be turned, diverted, or stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, and also to insert the same notice in one newspaper published or generally circulated in the county where the highway so proposed to be diverted and turned or stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid (as the case may be), shall lie for four successive weeks next after the said justices have viewed such public highway, and to affix a like notice on the door of the church of every parish in which such highway so proposed to be diverted, turned, or stopped up, either entirely or subject as aforesaid, or any part thereof, shall lie on four successive Sundays next after the making such view; and the said several notices having been so published, and proof thereof having been given to the satisfaction of the said justices . . . the said justices shall proceed to certify under their hands the fact of their having viewed the said highway as aforesaid, and that the proposed new highway is nearer or more commodious to the public." I assume that all the conditions other than the one referred to above have been fulfilled. The appellants raised certain objections upon them which the Divisional Court overruled. Those objections have been again raised here, but I am content to say that I agree with the decision of the Divisional Court upon them. The Divisional Court, however, have held that one particular condition had not been fulfilled—namely, that the notice had not been affixed at each end of the highway at the place where it was proposed to divert it, as required by the section, the Lord Chief Justice saying that the justices' certificate must be quashed because that statutory provision as to the exhibition of the notices on the road had not been complied with. The notice was in fact affixed at each end of the road, but in the notice itself a day was named, which was less than four weeks from the day on which the notice was affixed, as the day on which the justices' certificate would be given, and on the day so named the justices' certificate was given. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that unless the notice was affixed at those places four weeks before the certificate was given, and remained so affixed during those four weeks, the condition required by the statute has not been fulfilled, and the certificate is bad. That depends upon whether the statute requires that to be done. If there is any such requirement it must be found in the statute, within the four corners of the statute. There is nothing of the kind to be found there. The word is "affix." The section makes no provision for the time during which it is to remain affixed. Then follows the other requirements of the section. The surveyor is to insert the notice in one newspaper, published or circulating in the county, for four successive weeks next after the view. The Divisional Court were satisfied that that requirement was satisfied by the insertion of the notice in four issues of a newspaper which was published once a week. Then comes the further provision as to affixing the notice on the church door on four successive Sundays next after the view. That was done. The section then goes on to provide that, "the said several notices having been so published," the justices were to proceed to certify. Nothing is there said about maintaining the notice for any time at each end of the highway. The condition as to time relates to the insertion of the notice in a newspaper for four successive weeks, and the affixing of the notice on the church door on four successive Sundays. I cannot find any connection between the words "for four successive weeks" and the provision as to affixing the notice on the highway. The word "affix" is not an apt word to describe the duty of keeping up a notice when once it has been affixed. We should have to read words into the section if we were to hold that a notice on the highway was bad because it named a day for the issue of the justices' certificate which was within the period of twenty-eight days. I have no alternative in the circumstances but to differ from the decision of the Divisional Court upon this point. I do not find that it is made a condition of the issue of the certificate that the notice shall remain affixed on the highway for four weeks.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and as we are differing from the Divisional Court I desire to state my reasons in my own words. The question is whether the proper procedure necessary for the diversion of a highway has been followed in the present case. The procedure is laid down in sections 84 and 85 of the Highway Act, 1835. Shortly put, section 84 provides for a view by two justices, and section 85 deals with what is to happen after such view. If upon such view it appears to the justices that the highway may be diverted so as to make it nearer or more commodious to the public, and the landowner through whose land the proposed new highway lies consents, the justices are to give certain directions to the surveyor. Those directions are "to affix a notice in the form or to the effect of schedule (No. 19) to this Act annexed, in legible characters, at the place and by the side of each end of the said highway from whence the same is proposed to be diverted . . . and also to insert the same notice in one newspaper published or generally circulated in the county where the highway so proposed to be diverted . . . shall lie for four successive weeks next after the said justices have viewed such public highway, and to affix a like notice on the door of the church of every parish in which such highway so proposed to be diverted . . . shall lie on four successive Sundays next after the making of such view." The question really is, at what date can the justices, after the view, resume the consideration of the matter and proceed to certify. There is a limit of time imposed by the section. The justices are to direct the surveyor (1) to affix a notice at each end of the highway; (2) to insert the notice in a newspaper for four successive weeks next after the view; and (3) to affix the notice on the church door on four successive Sundays next after the view. As to the insertion in the newspaper, it is open to the surveyor to insert it in a newspaper published once a week, and that insertion is to be for four successive weeks next after the view. The notice must also be affixed on the church door on four successive Sundays next after the view. So far as those two requirements are concerned, it does not appear that either of them involves the suspension of proceedings by the two justices for a period of twenty-eight days. The insertion of the notice in a weekly newspaper for four successive weeks and the affixing of the notice on the church door on four successive Sundays can be, and was in this case, completed within the twenty-eight days. But it is contended that the Act requires that the notice, which is to be affixed at each end of the highway, shall remain affixed there for a period of not less than four successive weeks next after the view. The question is whether the Act imposes that obligation. I am unable to see that it does. All that the Act directs is that the notice shall be affixed at a certain place on the highway, and that it shall be inserted in the newspaper for four successive weeks and affixed on the church door on four successive Sundays next after the view. It is said that the words "for four successive weeks" must be read so as to apply to the previous words as to affixing the notice on the highway. That is not a grammatical way of reading the words. One does not speak of "affixing" a notice for four successive weeks. A notice is "affixed" once for all. The Act does not say that the notice must be kept so affixed. While it is important to see that the Act is complied with in such cases, at the same time we are not justified in imposing conditions not required by the Act. All that the Act requires is that the proceedings by the two justices shall not be resumed until after the notice has been affixed on the highway, and the other requirements have been complied with within the periods specified, and it was not thought to be important that any provision should be made as to keeping the notice up on the highway. The justices, before proceeding to issue their certificate, have to be satisfied that the notice has been properly affixed on the highway, and that the notices have been properly published for the requisite periods in a newspaper and on the church door. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is said that the diversion of a highway is the taking away of a public right, and that therefore the Act must be construed strictly against those who propose the diversion. But the Act contemplates the diversion of a highway as a matter of public convenience and in the interests of the public, and therefore that constitutional argument may be disregarded. In my opinion there is nothing in the Act which requires the notice, when once affixed, to be retained on the highway for four weeks. The Act only requires the notice to be affixed. We are not dealing with a case where the notice, having been once affixed, has been wilfully pulled down by those who put it up, when other considerations would arise. The two other requirements, that relating to notice in the newspaper and on the church door, can be complied with within the period of four weeks, and yet it is said that the Act requires the notice to remain affixed on the highway for four successive weeks before the certificate can be issued. In my opinion the Act does not require that.

In re EASTERN INVESTMENT CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding-up—Voluntary liquidation—Approaching dissolution—Stay of proceedings—Postponement of dissolution—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 89, 143.

The voluntary winding up of a company continues after the meeting has been called and the return made to the registrar under sections 142 and 143 of the Companies Act, 1862, and during the three months appointed by the latter section, at the expiration of which the dissolution of the company takes place; and the court has during those three months, under sections 89 and 138, jurisdiction to stay the proceedings in the winding up for the purpose of keeping the company on foot and preventing the operation of section 143, and will in a proper case make such an order.

Semble, such an order as above-mentioned will prevent the dissolution of the company at the expiration of the three months.

Motion.

This was a motion to stay the proceedings in the voluntary winding up of the above company for the purpose of preventing its approaching dissolution.

The above company was incorporated in 1895, primarily to carry on financial, mercantile, and mining operations.

The Associated Share and Investment Co. (Limited) was incorporated in 1899 for similar objects.

It was resolved to amalgamate the two companies, and in April, 1903, an agreement was entered into between them for the Eastern Investment Co. (Limited) (called in the case the "old company") to sell certain specified property to the Associated Co. in consideration of receiving a certain number of fully paid-up shares in that company. Part of the property sold consisted of interests or participations in various mining claims and other property in the Transvaal, South Africa, all of which were entered upon the local registry in trust for the persons equitably entitled thereto (including the old company) in various shares.

In May, 1903, the old company resolved to wind up voluntarily. The liquidator, in pursuance of the agreement of sale, transferred the assets of the old company to the Associated Co., which had then changed its name to the New Eastern Investment Co. (Limited). The winding up was then supposed to be complete, and on the 21st of September, 1904, the final meeting of the company was held pursuant to section 142 of the Companies Act, the liquidator made out his account, and on the 22nd of September, 1904, he made the return to the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies of the result of the meeting. The consequence was that on the 22nd of December, 1904, the three months limited in section 143 would expire, and the company would become automatically dissolved. For the purpose of completing the transfer of the participations and claims of the new company the liquidator of the old company gave directions to the parties who held them to hold them in the future on account of or in trust for the new company. It was, however, discovered that this course would not work, and that to satisfy the requirements of the revenue laws of the Transvaal it was necessary that the persons who held the mining rights on the registry should transfer them to the old company, who should in their turn transfer them to the new company. There was not, however, time to carry out these transactions before the 22nd of December, 1904, when, if the dissolution took place, the old company would no longer be in existence.

Under these circumstances a motion (which as amended was by a contributory of the old company) was made to the court to stay the proceedings in the winding-up under sections 89 and 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, and thus postpone the dissolution of the company so as to enable the necessary transfers to be carried out.

A. H. Jessel, for the applicant.—The court has power under section 89 of the Companies Act, 1862, to stay the proceedings in the winding up. This will prevent the completion of the winding up and the dissolution of the company: In re Crookhaven Mining Co., 15 W. R. 28, L. R. 3 Eq. 69. Unless this is done the company will be dissolved on the 22nd of December, and the transfers to the New Eastern Investment Co. cannot be effected. In the Scottish Fluid Beef Co. (Limited) v. Auld, 25 Rettie 1056, the application was not made under section 89 to stay the proceedings, but to stay the dissolution, and this was held to be beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

WARRINGTON, J.—This is a peculiar application. It is an application which, when amended, will be by a contributory under section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862, asking the court to put in force the powers given by section 89 in a compulsory winding up. It is admitted on the authority of The Scottish Fluid Beef Co. (Limited) v. Auld that the court has no jurisdiction to stay the dissolution of the company, which takes place automatically under section 143 of the Companies Act, 1862; and that part of the application is therefore not pressed. But the applicant asks the court, in the alternative, to stay proceedings in the winding up, suggesting that if this is done the company necessarily continues, and the operation of section 143 will be prevented. There is some authority for that view in In re Crookhaven Mining Co. In that case the application, which was for an order in the winding up, was made before the expiration of the three months which commenced on the 4th of June, but the matter actually came before the court after the three months had expired. Lord Romilly made the order asked for, and I think that it is plain that he considered that he had jurisdiction to make the order on the 4th of June, and I think that he must have considered that the dissolution of the company would then not have taken place, as otherwise the order he made would have been wrong. That case, although not an authority for the order I am asked to make here, is, I think, an authority as to the effect of that order when made. The words of section 89 are very strong and seem to me to cover everything. If the winding up is in operation until the dissolution of the company has taken place, then if I am at liberty to stay all proceedings in relation to the winding up, I think these words are wide enough to keep the company on foot, as the applicant desires. I propose, therefore, to make an order that, the court being satisfied that for the purpose of effecting the transfer of the assets of the old company comprised in the agreement of April, 1903, to the New Eastern Investment Co. (Limited), all proceedings in relation to such winding up ought to be stayed, direct the same to be stayed.

HAMPSTEAD BOROUGH COUNCIL v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Local government — New street — Paving expenses — "Owner"—Strip of land fenced off and planted as ornamental garden — Land rendered incapable of yielding rent for the benefit of an individual — Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 105, 250—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77—Midland Railway Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxliii.), s. 18.

By section 18, sub-section 2, of the Midland Railway Act, 1900, the company, for the protection of the owner of certain land acquired by them for the purpose of sidings, were to acquire from the owner all the land up to a certain road, but were to leave a strip of the land so taken along the whole length of the road to be fenced and planted out with shrubs and trees and maintained as an ornamental garden. The local authority subsequently paved the road under section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and apportioned part of the expenses on the railway company under section 77 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862.

Held, that the provision in the private Act restricting the user of land in such a way as to render it incapable of yielding a rent being imposed for the benefit of an individual who might release it by agreement, and the land be thus capable of yielding a rent without the aid of further legislation, did not prevent the persons to whom the land belonged from being "owners" within section 250 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and as such liable to contribute to the expenses incurred by the local authority in making up the street upon which the land in question abutted.

Special case stated under ord. 34, r. 1, as follows: The dispute between the parties was as to the liability of the defendants to the plaintiffs to contribute to the estimated expenses of paving a certain portion of a new street, known as Westbere-road, in the metropolitan borough of Hampstead.

The plaintiffs were by virtue of the Metropolis Management Acts the local authority charged with the duty of paving new streets within their district, and they resolved, on the 4th of June, 1903, to pave this road, and served upon the defendant company a notice demanding from them the sum of £1,200 12s., the apportioned amount of the estimated cost due from them as the owners of land "bounding or abutting" on the new street. The defendants contended that they were not the owners of the land within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, and were therefore not liable.

The case stated that the land in question was acquired and held by the defendant company in the manner following: By section 18 of the Midland Railway Act, 1900, it was provided, "That the following provisions shall, unless otherwise agreed, apply and have effect for the protection of Percy Horace Gordon Powell-Cotton and his trustees (in this section called 'the owners')—(1) The company shall not use any part of the sidings to be placed upon the land to be acquired from the owners . . . for any purpose except for the purpose of standing empty passenger trains; (2) the company shall acquire all the land of the owners up to Westbere-road and shall leave a strip of twenty feet wide along the whole length of such Westbere-road, and shall at their own expense plant and maintain the same with shrubs and trees to the reasonable satisfaction of the owners, and shall at the like expense and to the like satisfaction fence off the said lands from the Westbere-road by an open unclimbable iron fence seven feet high, such planting and fencing to be carried out within one year from the company obtaining possession of such lands, and to be maintained by the company."

In accordance with the provisions of sub-section 2 of the above section, the defendants acquired the whole of the land from the owners and dealt with it in the manner provided in the section.

The questions submitted for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether on the true construction of the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 and 1862, and having regard to the said provisions of the Midland Railway Act, 1900, the defendants were liable to pay to the plaintiffs the amount claimed in this action in respect of the estimated expenses of paving the new street known as Westbere-road; and (2) by whom the costs of this action and of the special case ought to be paid.

Macmorran, K.C., and Courthope Munroe, for the borough council.—The railway company are the owners of this strip of land within the meaning of section 150 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, so as to be liable to contribute as frontagers to the paving expenses of the new street on which it abuts: London County Council v. Wandsworth Borough, 51 W. R. 499, [1903] 1 K. B. 797. To succeed the company must show that the land was subjected in perpetuity to the burden of a public right, which deprives it of all beneficial value: Wright v. Ingle, 34 W. R. 220, 16 Q. B. D. 379; Hornsey District Council v. Smith, 45 W. R. 581, [1897] 1 Ch. 843; and Hackney Borough Council v. Lee Conservancy Board, [1904] 2 K. B. 541. Where the restriction on the user of land may at any moment be removed without the intervention of the Legislature by agreement of the parties for whose benefit it was imposed, the land is not made extra commercium within the meaning of that expression as defined by Lord Watson in Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway, 32 W. R. 341, 25 Ch. D. 511, affirmed sub. nom. Great Eastern Railway v. Goldsmid, 33 W. R. 81, 9 App. Cas., at p. 693: see also Savin v. Hoylake Railway, 14 W. R. 109, L. R. 1 Ex. 9; Rothes (Countess of) v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners, 7 App. Cas. 694.

Montague Lush, K.C., and William Wills, for the railway company.—The provisions of the Midland Railway Act, 1900, render the land sterile, and incapable of being let at a rent. They are not of the same character as the restrictions in user discussed in Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway Co., and cannot be waived. Whether the restriction could be waived by the Powell-Cotton trustees is open to doubt; but whether that be so or not, the court has only power to decide the question on the facts as they now stand, and not on a hypothetical assumption that the restriction might be removed on the happening of something in the future.

They cited Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Co., 23 W. R. 133, L. R. 10 Q. B. 203.

Macmorran, K.C., replied.

BIGHAM, J.— I have had an opportunity of examining the cases that were cited before me, and I think the result of them is that where land is incapable of yielding a rack-rent by reason of its being subjected to some public user, the owner is not liable. For instance, where it has been dedicated as a highway, or where a church has been built upon it, or where the land has been appropriated by Act of Parliament to some public purpose. But where the incapacity is created in favour of an individual, or of a particular class of persons, then the owner does not escape liability; for instance, where the owner has covenanted not to use the land for any purpose of profit or where he has voluntarily devoted it to a purpose which is inconsistent with the receiving a rent, as in the case of a Wesleyan chapel: Wright v. Ingle, 34 W. R. 220, 16 Q. B. D. 379.

The reason for the distinction seems to me to be that in one case nothing short of an Act of Parliament can restore to the land its capacity to yield rents, whereas in the other case the capacity can be restored by the mere act of the parties who have for the time destroyed it. Then in which catagory does the present case fall? I think in the second. It is true that the restriction which prevents the railway company from turning the land to a profitable use is embodied in an Act of Parliament, but the Act creates no public right; it does no more than give a legislative sanction to an agreement between Mr. Powell-Cotton and his trustees on the one hand and the railway company on the other. Such an agreement can be put an end to by the parties to it at any moment, apparently, without the intervention of the Legislature: see Goldsmid v. Great Eastern Railway, 32 W. R. 341, 25 Ch. D. 511. The arguments adduced by Mr. Lush for the railway company were put forward in that case by Mr. Hemming, and were dismissed as insufficient. It therefore does not afford any answer to the claim of the local authority to be paid the amount sued for. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs; but there will be a stay if notice of appeal is given within ten days.

POLLEY v. FORDHAM. (a.)

Public authorities—Magistrate—Improper conviction—Distress—Action against magistrate—Limitation of actions—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

The defendant, a magistrate, having convicted the plaintiff for an offence under the Vaccination Acts, ordered him to pay a fine, which the plaintiff failed to pay, whereupon the magistrate issued a distress warrant and the plaintiff's goods were distrained upon. Subsequently the plaintiff's conviction was quashed for want of jurisdiction. The plaintiff thereupon brought an action against the magistrate for illegal distress. The action was commenced more than six months after the date of the conviction, but less than six months from the date of the distress.

Held, that the action was not barred by section 1 (a) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, as the period of six months thereby limited began to run from the date of the distress and not from the date of the conviction.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Smyly, sitting at the Shoreditch County Court.

The plaintiff was on the 11th of February, 1903, convicted by E. S. Fordham, Esq., a metropolitan magistrate, for neglecting to have two of his children vaccinated within six months after the birth of such children contrary to the provisions of the Vaccination Acts, and was fined £1 and 16s. costs in each case.

The plaintiff having failed to pay the fines, the learned magistrate, on the 11th of April, 1903, issued a warrant of distress against the plaintiff's goods.

On the 17th of April, 1903, a distress was put in on the plaintiff's premises, and was paid out by the plaintiff under protestion the 29th of April.

On the 8th of July, 1903, a Divisional Court made an order absolute quashing the convictions against the plaintiff on the ground that, the children being twins eighteen months of age at the time of the conviction, the plaintiff had been improperly convicted.

On the 26th of August, 1903, the plaintiff brought an action in the county court against the learned magistrate, claiming damages for illegal distress.

It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that the action was out of time, and that the defendant was protected by the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

The learned county court judge held that the plaintiff's action was barred by section 1, sub-section (a), of that Act, as the injury was suffered by the plaintiff from the conviction on the 11th of February, more than six months before action brought, and he entered judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

The Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, provides as follows:

Section 1: "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:

"(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof . . ."

By the Justices Protection Act, 1848 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 34), s. 3:

"And be it enacted, that where a conviction or order shall be made by one or more justice or justices of the peace and a warrant of distress or of commitment shall be granted thereon by some other justice of the peace bonâ fide and without collusion no action shall be brought against the justice who so granted such warrant by reason of any defect in such conviction or order or for any want of jurisdiction in the justice or justices who made the same, but the action (if any) shall be brought against the justice or justices who made such conviction or order."

Kingsbury, for the plaintiff.—The action is not barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. The action was commenced within six months next after "the act complained of"—namely, not the conviction, but the distress which followed the warrant. The conviction and the distress are quite separate acts.

He referred to Carey v. Bermondsey Borough Council, 67 J. P. 447, and Brittain v. Kynnaird, 1 B. & B. 432.

G. S. Robertson, for the defendant.—The decision of the county court judge was right. The action is barred by section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, because the "act complained of" within the meaning of the section is the conviction and not the distress; the latter is only the natural consequences of the former. The issuing of the distress warrant and the levying of the distress were not a judicial, but only a ministerial act.

[He referred to section 3 of the Justices Protection Act, 1848.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I express no opinion as to whether this action can be maintained or as to whether there is a defence to it. The only point before us is whether the county court judge was right in applying the Statute of Limitations to this alleged right of action, so as to bar the proceedings, and whether in fact he has rightly declined to entertain the action upon the ground of the lapse of six months. I think we have only got to construe for this purpose sub-section (a) of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, which was a new enactment with a statutory limitation, and must be construed strictly. That says: "Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect: (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of." The act complained of here was not the conviction. The act complained of here was the trespass to the plaintiff's premises by the levying of the distress. So far as it has any bearing on the case, section 3 of the Justices Protection Act, 1848, does not seem to me to have anything to do with the question of time. Section 3 is for the purpose of protecting a justice who has issued a warrant upon a conviction which was apparently legal, and then subsequently it turns out that he ought not to have issued that warrant, and then an action is brought against the justice who made the original order. In this case, where the action is for trespass and there is a plea of justification, it would require a very plain enactment with regard to a statutory limitation to say that that period of action is to run not from the date of the real cause of action, the entry on the premises, but from some order of anterior date, under the authority of which that entry was made. It may be that there are enactments which enable you to claim as damages matters of aggravation in respect of subsequent acts done as corollory to that act. That is quite possible, but I am unable myself to see any statute which enables us to say that the right of action for wrongful entry has been taken away because brought too late if the action is commenced within six months of the act which is alleged to be wrong. I think if it was intended to ante-date the period of limitation to an earlier date, there must be clear and distinct language to that effect. Whatever may be the result of this action when it comes to be heard, I think the case must go back to the county court judge.

WILLS, J.—I am very clearly of the same opinion. It seems to me the act complained of is the distress, and nothing else. No such thing was ever heard of as an action for making an order against a person without jurisdiction. If the order is not followed by consequences against the individual it comes to nothing. One used to be in former days very familiar indeed with matters of this kind. I do not know how many declarations I have drawn in my old pleading days for levies of one sort and another—complaints that people had been distrained upon against whom there was no right of distress or to enforce consequences of a similar nature, but such actions were always actions of trespass, and nothing else. The complaint used to be that the defendant had wrongfully entered the house or premises of the plaintiff and had done so and so. Then any question which arose about the warrant, the conviction, or order on which the erroneous proceedings by way of distress and entry were founded was raised on a defence setting up that it was justified because of the warrant and the conviction or order on which the warrant was founded. But the action itself was not for erroneous exercise of jurisdiction, but was for making a distress and breaking and entering a man's premises where there was no right to do so.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

THE J. P. TRUST (LIMITED) AND OTHERS v. THE ABOVE-NAMED COMPANIES (a.)

Company—Issue of debentures issued jointly by three companies—Validity—Ultra vires—Covenant to pay both joint and several—Companies' undertakings charged with such debentures—Application of proceeds—Construction of articles of association.

Three companies by their memorandum and articles of association had power to borrow money on the security of debentures charged upon the property of the company. They subsequently in order to raise money to meet certain liabilities, issued joint debentures, by which they jointly and severally agreed to pay to the holder for the time being the money so lent, together with interest on the same, and they thereby respectively charged with such payments their several undertakings, and all their present and future property and assets.

Held, that the debentures constituted a valid charge upon the assets of the company, so far as the money so advanced had come into the hands of each company, although it was an ultra vires act for any company to charge its assets with money advanced to another company.

Held, also, that a clause in the articles of association of a company which empowered the directors to borrow any sum of money, not exceeding the amount of the preference share capital of the company, on the security of the property of the company by, e.g., debentures, did not limit the amount which could be raised on the security of debentures, when no preference shares had been issued.

Decision of Byrne, J., on the first point reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J.

The facts were as follows:

This was an application for the purpose of determining the validity of certain debentures which were issued purporting to be jointly and severally the debentures given by the three different defendant companies. The companies were limited companies. The Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited) was incorporated in September, 1899, the nominal capital being £50,000, divided into ordinary shares of £1 each; the Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited) was incorporated in June, 1898, its nominal capital being the same; and the Johnstonia Engraving Co. (Limited) was incorporated in September, 1900, its nominal capital being £20,000 divided into 10,000 preference shares and 10,000 ordinary shares of £1 each. The defendant companies were all promoted and controlled by one man, a Mr. J. G. Johnston, they had the same set of directors, secretary, and business offices. In 1901 the companies were in want of money, and it was proposed to raise money for the purposes of all the companies on the security of joint debentures to be issued by the directors of the three companies.

On the 23rd of December, 1901, there were separate board meetings called of the directors of each of the companies, and at each of these meetings resolutions were passed which were the same for all the companies. The following is an example: "Johnstonia Engraving Co. (Limited). Present—three directors, solicitor, and secretary. Resolved, in conjunction with the Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited) and the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited), to create and issue twenty-five first mortgage debentures of £1,000 each, to be secured upon the joint property and assets, undertakings, and businesses of the three companies, to be repayable on or before the 30th day of June, 1902, with a bonus of £50 on each £1,000 debenture, and to carry interest in the meantime at £6 per cent. per annum. And resolved, that the debentures be in the form submitted to this meeting, and that the seal of the company be affixed to such debentures and that such debentures be from time to time issued as and when applications are received for the same. (Signed) J. Bevan Edwards, chairman"; and at other subsequent meetings it was "Resolved, that all moneys received from the issue of debentures recently authorized shall be paid into a special banking account to be opened with the London City and Midland Bank, to be called 'The Johnston Companies Debenture Account.' That from time to time as occasion arises the three companies shall be financed from the said account, but that every payment thereout shall be sanctioned in writing by a committee consisting of Mr. H. P. Clinton and any two of the undermentioned gentlemen" (whose names were given—"and that all cheques on the said account shall be signed by any two members of the board of the three companies as at present constituted and countersigned by the secretary, Mr. P. Gray." At this meeting Mr. H. P. Clinton was elected the manager of the company. Soon after the 23rd of December, 1901, joint debentures of the three companies were subscribed for in cash, and the form of the debenture, so far as is material, is to this effect: It was headed with the names of the three companies. "Debenture Mortgage £1,000. Issue by the above-named companies jointly of twenty-five first mortgage debentures of £1,000 each. Redeemable on or before the 30th of June, 1902, at £1,050 per debenture, and carrying interest meantime at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum." Then follows the charge: "The three above-named companies (hereinafter called the companies) jointly and severally agree to pay to (the registered holder) to whom this debenture is issued, or other the registered holder or holders for the time being hereof (all of whom are intended to be included in the expression 'the debenture-holder' when used herein), the principal sum of £1,000 together with a bonus of £50, and also interest in the meantime at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum on the 30th day of June, 1902, or on such earlier day as the said several moneys may become payable in accordance with the conditions subscribed hereto. And the said three companies hereby respectively charge with such payments their several undertakings and all their present and future properties and assets. And it is hereby declared that this debenture is issued upon and subject to the conditions subscribed hereto which are to be deemed to be incorporated herein." Then follow the seals of the companies, and certain conditions were attached: "(1) This debenture is one of a series of debentures issued or about to be issued by the above-named companies for securing an aggregate principal sum of £25,000, such debentures being numbered 1 to 25. (2) The debentures of the said series will all rank pari passu in point of charge without any preference or priority over one another. (3) The charge hereby created shall be a floating charge, and accordingly the companies shall be at liberty in the course of their businesses and for the purpose of continuing and carrying on the same, and the bonâ fide prosecution and conduct of their undertakings and businesses or any part thereof, to use, employ, sell, mortgage, charge, lease, exchange, or otherwise deal with or dispose of all or any part of their property for the time being which may require to be so used, employed, dealt with, or disposed of, but so that the companies shall not have power to create any mortgage or charge ranking pari passu with or in priority to the said debentures. (4) The moneys hereby secured shall, in each of the events following, become immediately payable: (a) When default shall have been made in the payment of any moneys hereby secured; (b) when an order shall be made by any competent court or an effective resolution shall be passed for winding up either of the companies; (c) when any process of execution or distress shall be levied on any of the property hereby charged unless such process shall be satisfied within three days from the date of levy." None of the other clauses are material. Pursuant to the resolution, the proceeds of the issue of the joint debentures, together with a sum of £1,000 provided by Mr. Haddrill on the security of a debenture issued by the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited), were paid into the new banking account. In point of fact the debentures were issued to Mr. Haddrill, and a debenture of £1,000 to Mr. Pakeman, who subsequently transferred it to the J. P. Trust (Limited). Each company was, by its memorandum of association, given power to borrow money on the security of debentures. Except a sum of £666 expended in charges in connection with the issue of the debentures, the balance was received by the companies in the following proportions—the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited), £15,024 15s.; Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited), £6,493; the Johnstonia Engraving Co. (Limited), £2,815. A summons was taken out by the J. P. Trust (Limited) and H. J. Haddrill on behalf of themselves and all other the debenture-holders of the defendant companies claiming a declaration that they and all other the debenture-holders of the defendant companies were entitled to a joint charge upon the undertakings of the companies and the present and future property and assets, that an inquiry might be made of what the said property consisted, and in whom the same was then vested, that an account might be taken of what was due to the plaintiffs and all other such debenture-holders as aforesaid under or by virtue of the said debentures, for the appointment of a receiver and manager, and that the debentures might be enforced by foreclosure or sale. By an order dated the 12th of March, 1902, upon a motion for the appointment of a receiver, supported by various affidavits, one being by Mr. Lacey Downes, secretary to the plaintiff company, pointing out the financial embarrassment of the defendant companies, and the necessity of appointing a receiver and manager to protect the interests of the debenture-holders, judgment was given by consent, and it was ordered that the plaintiffs and other holders of joint mortgage debentures of the three defendant companies were entitled to a charge upon the several undertakings of the said companies and all the present and future properties and assets of the said companies, and after directing the usual accounts and inquiries it was ordered that F. P. Walter should be appointed receiver and manager of the three defendant companies, but that he should not act as manager after the 31st of July, 1902, without leave of the judge, and that the said F. P. Walter should forthwith out of any assets coming into his hands pay the debts (if any) of the defendant companies, which had priority over the claims of debenture-holders under the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 19), and be allowed all such payments on passing his accounts. On the hearing of this motion the judge suggested that another debenture-holder should be joined as plaintiff, and Haddrill was joined. Subsequently three separate orders were made for the compulsory winding-up of the companies, and the official receiver was appointed liquidator for each company.

With regard to the legality of the joint issue of the debentures, after consulting counsel, it was deemed advisable, having regard to the form of the memorandum and articles of association of the Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited), that that company should issue to one of the other two companies a debenture to secure the actual amount (part of the £25,000) applied to the purpose of that company. Accordingly, the Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited) issued to the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited) a debenture to secure the sum of £10,700, but it received less, as stated above. On behalf of the liquidator, advice of two well-known counsel was taken as to the validity under the circumstances of these debentures, and as to the steps to be taken to upset them. The advice given was that the joint debentures issued by the three companies were ultrà vires and void. At the dates of the liquidation of the three companies, their liabilities to unsecured creditors appeared according to the respective statements of affairs filed by the directors in pursuance of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 63), s. 7, as follows: (i.) The Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited), £45,595 0s. 9d.; (ii.) Johnston Die Press Co. (Limited), £22,717 12s. 1d.; and (iii.) the Johnstonia Engraving Co. (Limited), £11,906 4s. 1d.

The memorandum of association of the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited), by clause 5, gave the company a power "to advance or lend money on such terms as may seem expedient, and with or without security, and to discount bills and notes generally, and to carry on business as bankers." By clause 11 is "To enter into partnership or into any arrangement for sharing profits, union of interests, joint adventure, reciprocal concessions or co-operation, amalgamation with or purchase from any person or company carrying on or engaged in or about to carry on or engage in any business or transaction which this company is authorized to carry on or engage in, or any business or transaction capable of being conducted so as directly or indirectly to benefit this company, and to take and otherwise acquire and hold shares in or securities of, and to subsidize or otherwise assist any such company, and to sell, hold, re-issue, with or without guarantee, or otherwise deal with such shares or securities." Clause 19 was the clause under which primâ facie the debentures were issued, "To raise, borrow, or receive money on deposit or otherwise at interest from any person or persons or secure the payment of money (including liabilities of or taken over by the company) in such manner and on such terms as may seem expedient, and also by the issue of debentures or debenture stock, whether perpetual or otherwise, and charged or not charged upon the whole or any part of the property of the company, both present and future, including its uncalled capital." Article 114 of the articles of association, so far as material, is as follows: "The business of the company shall be managed by the directors, who may exercise all the powers of the company except such as by the Acts or by these articles are required to be exercised by the company in general meeting, subject nevertheless to any regulations of these articles, to the provisions of the said Acts, and to such regulations (being not inconsistent with the aforesaid regulations or provisions) as may be prescribed by the company in general meeting; but no regulations made by the company in general meeting shall invalidate any prior act of the directors which would have been valid if such regulations had not been made; and the directors may do all acts and things which they shall consider proper or advantageous for accomplishing the objects or carrying on the business of the company, and may in particular, but without derogating from the generality of the foregoing powers, exercise the following powers: (a) (c) "Sell, lease, licence, mortgage, charge, or exchange any of the property of the company at such times and in such manner, and on such conditions as they may think fit." (d) [Set out in Vaughan Williams, L.J.'s judgment at length, vid. infra.] (e) (f) "Exercise and carry into effect any or all of the objects mentioned in or referred to in the memorandum of association."

The liquidator took out a summons for a declaration that the joint debenture of the defendant companies for £1,000 purporting to have been issued by them to J. R. Pakeman and transferred by him to the plaintiffs, the J. P. Trust (Limited), and the six several joint debentures of £1,000 each of the plaintiff H. J. Haddrill, were respectively invalid and void and ultrà vires the defendant companies and each of them, and created no charge upon the assets of the defendant companies or any of them, and that the said debentures be delivered up to the appellant to be cancelled.

Byrne, J., before whom the matter came, held that the transaction was ultrà vires and void, and that the debenture-holders could not rely upon their security in the winding up, and he ordered that the debentures should be delivered up to be cancelled.

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. Beddall replied.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—This is a summons in liquidation proceedings, and the liquidator desires to have certain debentures which had been issued declared to be void and ordered to be given up to be cancelled. Byrne, J., has made an order to that effect, and we have to consider whether that order was right or not. Now what we have got before us here is the debenture itself and the circumstances brought to our notice by the liquidator under which these debentures were issued. But before I deal with this case in the light of this debenture, and what we find within the four corners of it, and the circumstances brought to our notice by the liquidator in his affidavit, I should like at once to deal with a point which has been made, which point really overrides all other considerations. This point arises upon the 114th article of the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited). Now it is said with regard to that particular company that it had no right to issue debentures at all, and that is by reason of clause d of this article 114, which is as follows: "Borrow or raise or secure any sum or sums of money, not exceeding the amount of the preference share capital of the company on the security of the property of the company (including uncalled capital, if any) or any part thereof, either by way of mortgage with or without power of sale, or of debentures or of debenture stock or other security or without security, and upon terms as to payment, interest or redemption or otherwise as they may think fit, and out of the assets of the company redeem and pay such securities and loans, and in connection therewith may make such arrangements as may be deemed expedient for vesting any property of the company in trustees or otherwise for the benefit and security of the holders of such debentures." Now it is seen that in those early words in that section it says "borrow, raise, or secure any sum or sums of money not exceeding the amount of the preference share capital." The point made is that inasmuch as it is an admitted fact here that at the time of the issue of these debentures no preference share capital whatsoever had been issued by the company, the true meaning of this clause d is that unless and until there is an issue of preference share capital, the company is not to exercise its borrowing power, and that when there is such an issue of preference share capital then the power of borrowing is only to be exercised to the extent of the amount of that preference share capital. If that were so it would certainly make the debentures issued by the Johnston Foreign Patents Co. (Limited) ultrà vires and altogether bad. But I do not agree in that construction. But before I say what I think the true construction is, I want to call attention to a word or two in the earlier part of this article. It is an article which says at the end of the preface "and the directors may do all acts and things which they shall consider proper or advantageous for accomplishing the objects or carrying on the business of the company, and may in particular, but without derogating from the generality of the foregoing powers, exercise the following powers." If one turns to the memorandum and articles of association of this company one finds that there is a power expressly given to borrow and raise money.

Now, I think we must construe this clause d in the light of those words in the preface, and in the light also of the memorandum giving the power to borrow and to raise money. This clause d is a clause which has, in form at all events, been inserted in order to take effect without derogation from the generality of the foregoing powers. It is a clause which, in my opinion, ought not easily to receive the construction that it is an absolute prohibition of borrowing, unless and until preference shares have been issued. In my judgment this is a clause which is really introduced for the benefit and for the protection of the preference shareholders, and I think that unless and until there are preference shareholders this protection is not wanted. I think, therefore, that the business understanding of this clause would be that you may issue debentures under the general powers that are given you with no limit all, excepting the express limits that are found in the earlier part of the articles and memorandum without any restriction whatever beyond that. But as soon as ever you issue preference share capital, after you have once done that, you must not be allowed to issue debentures beyond the amount of the preference share capital, because, unless the company holds out that sort of security to the public whom they invite to come in as preference shareholders, nobody would come in at all. What it means is this. Avail yourself of your debentures to raise capital by debentures, and do that freely; that is a fact that will be known to all the world, but if you propose, in addition to that, to use the inferior security (because it is an inferior security) of preference shares as a means of raising capital, then from that time forward you are not to issue debentures exceeding the amount of the preference share capital. I think, therefore, that this point fails, and as this point fails, I will now go on to say what it is I gather from this debenture, and from the affidavits which I have mentioned, with reference to the circumstances under which this debenture was issued. I have no doubt myself on these affidavits, that these three companies were each of them in want of money, and in the absence of any suggestion by the liquidator to the contrary, I am entitled to assume, in want of money to be spent for intrà vires purposes. They had debts and they had liabilities and they desired to discharge those. Now Mr. Johnston had been in the habit of financing these three companies by lending money to each of them. These companies were pressed with these liabilities and they applied to Mr. Johnston, and he declined because he was not in a position to make the advances which these companies theretofore had got from him. Thereupon this scheme is suggested, that money might be raised to meet the liabilities of each of these companies by the issue of debentures. It is suggested that there is a difficulty about the issuing of debentures by each of the companies in respect of a separate advance to them. It is said that at the moment when that was proposed to be done there was considerable uncertainty both as to the liabilities of the respective companies and also as to the property which belonged to each one of them, their properties having been very much intermixed. Thereupon it occurred to the legal adviser of these three companies that it would be a very good plan that if instead of having three sets of debentures issued by the respective companies, they had one set of debentures issued by the companies jointly. Under those circumstances my conclusion in fact here is that the ultimate object which was in view by these three companies was the raising by each of them of a sum sufficient to meet the financial wants of each company, but that as a matter of machinery it was thought better that this security should be given in this form. Under those circumstances this debenture was issued. Before I read the debenture I may as well say with regard to the moneys which were raised, and which were subsequently raised all at one moment, and all lumped together for user, that at the time when this sum of £25,000 was thus raised a resolution was passed by the directors—the same directors for each one of these companies acting together as the representatives of all three companies in a committee—that these moneys should be placed in the City and Midland Bank and should be placed to a separate account, and should be paid out to the companies respectively according to their wants, and by cheques which were to be signed by the members of the committee and by the gentleman who was the manager of all the three companies in question. In this way ascertained sums of money varying in amount—one something over £15,000, and another something under £2,000—came into the coffers of all these companies respectively. The ultimate result of all this is that each one of these companies got into its coffers from the pockets of the persons to whom the debentures were issued a sum of money, and this sum of money, in my judgment, ought to be treated as if it had been advanced rateably by each one of these lenders to these companies in such a way that if any one of the three companies was insolvent or unable to pay, the amounts which were advanced by each individual debenture-holder should be treated as being divided rateably between the two solvent companies and the insolvent company. I am not aware whether in fact there was any difference in the solvency of the companies, but the matter was easy enough. If it was a £100 debenture and you had got a certain number of these debenture-holders, and the £100 of each one of these number of persons who become debenture-holders, and who paid £100 to the two companies who were solvent and the one which was insolvent, you will find each of these debenture-holders treated as having advanced £33 6s. 8d. to each of the solvent companies and £33 6s. 8d. to the insolvent company. I do not see any difficulty in doing perfect justice in that manner. I am only saying this to show that the ultimate result was an advance by each of these debenture-holders to the company to the extent that his money goes into the coffers of the company. Now, it is said that either we ought to treat these debenture-holders as not being creditors at all of the company, or secondly, that if we do treat them as creditors at all, we are to treat them as unsecured creditors. It seems to me that in this state of facts it is impossible for us to say that we ought not to treat these debenture-holders as creditors of the companies. Upon the face of each debenture there is an admission of a debt of £1,000, that may not be and will not be the right amount in respect of each company. But it seems to me that, however much the machinery may have been misconceived—if that is the proper word to use—there still is to the extent of the moneys that each debenture-holder found for each company a debt by that company to him. Now, assuming that there is a debt, then the next question which arises is, are these creditors who have advanced these moneys to these companies respectively to come in with the unsecured creditors, and rank with the assets pari passu, or are they unsecured creditors, or do the debentures give them a security? Now we will look at the debentures and see what the objections are. The first objection to the debenture is that it is called a debenture mortgage issued by the above-named companies jointly of twenty-five first mortgage debentures of £1,000, each redeemable on or before the 30th of June, 1902, and so on. Now, I shall assume for the purpose of my present judgment that for these companies to issue twenty-five debentures jointly was ultrà vires. I am not deciding the question to-day, and I do not wish to be understood as saying that in my opinion in all cases where companies for trading purposes, whether it is the purchase of goods, or whether it is the raising of money, enter into such a transaction, such a transaction would be necessarily ultrà vires. I think that it must depend upon the circumstances of each case. But I am happy to say that I have not got to decide that, and I am only dealing with the present case upon the basis that this issue by the companies jointly of these debentures was ultrà vires. Now, when you go on, and look at the debenture, you see that it says: "The three companies (hereinafter called the companies) jointly and severally agree to pay," and then it gives the amount of the debenture. Now, it is to be observed that the covenant there is a joint and several covenant, and if there had been the several covenant only, nobody could have said that this debenture was qua that several covenant void. But it is suggested that it is void because this is accompanied by the joint covenant. Then it goes on: "And all the said three companies hereby respectively charge with such payments their several undertakings and all their present and future properties and assets."

The objection is that the companies there are charging their assets with moneys which are not coming into their coffers, and moneys which, in the circumstances I have mentioned, it is plain were intended to a certain extent to go into the pockets of other companies—that is to say, others speaking of the one and the two that remain, making up the three. I think I have now read sufficient of this debenture. The conditions are set out, and I do not know that they affect anything that was done here. As a joint debenture, I am assuming that this document is bad, but does that make it a totally void security? The companies, each of them, had a power to borrow money, to the extent that these moneys actually came to their coffers, and for the purpose for which these moneys were intended to be used, and were in fact used. Am I bound to say that because this debenture mortgage is void and ultrà vires, in so far as it makes each one of these three companies charge its property, and contract to pay the debts of the other two companies, yet this mortgage debenture may not stand good to the extent that it gives security for the separate debts which might be incurred and secured by these companies respectively for the purpose of their own business? I do not think so. I think that when one bears in mind the undoubted fact that these amounts of money have gone into the pockets of these companies respectively, and these moneys have come from these debenture-holders, and that they have been used by each company for its benefit for proper purposes, and have been used in such a way as to increase the assets of the company, we ought not to refuse to give effect to the debenture in so far as it creates a security for sums which were borrowed within the powers of these companies respectively. I do not think that these sums were the less borrowed by those companies intrà vires, because at the moment they gave these debentures they intended to make themselves responsible also for sums of money as to which they could not without doing something that was ultrà vires incur a responsibility. Under those circumstances I think that, although the several companies undoubtedly purport on the face of the debenture to do things which for the purpose of my present judgment I am holding to be ultrà vires, yet I think that we ought to hold that this debenture stands good as a security for these moneys, which have come from the pockets of the debenture-holders, and have been received and enjoyed by the companies respectively. I do not propose to go at any length into the authorities, but I think that the principle is very well stated in the judgment of Willes, L.C.J., in the case which counsel for the appellants cited to us of Wilkinson v. Tranmer, Willes Reps. 682. As the covenant is here set out in 2 Wils. Reps., p. 75, I will read the covenant from there. The covenant is on p. 78. That was a case in which a conveyance was intended to operate by way of release, but it could not do so, and the court, gathering the obvious intention of the parties so far as the form of the document was concerned, sought to justify it in carrying out the real intention of the parties by treating the release as operating as a covenant to stand seised. In this passage the court says: [His lordship read the passage, and continued:] I think here that although the machinery was wrong, the machinery was in part something beyond the powers of the company, and that we ought to prevent injustice by holding here that this security is a good security, in so far as the moneys of the debenture-holders have come into the coffers of each company for purposes which were intrà vires, and have been so employed. In one part of the case there was a suggestion made as to an inquiry to see how far the moneys had been so employed, but unless some such inquiry is asked for I think we ought to assume that the moneys have been so employed. Under those circumstances I think that this appeal ought to be allowed. And I think, therefore, these costs ought to come out of the fund.

ROMER, L.J.—I have come to the same conclusion. With regard to the part which concerns the only company we are dealing with, which I will call the Foreign Patents Co., that point bears upon the true construction of clause d in article 114. Now, with regard to that clause d, it is clear that primâ facie that was intended to confer a power and not to cut down any previously existing powers belonging to the directors.

I notice that in clause 114, before it comes to specify the particular powers numbered by letters, it is expressly provided that these powers should be conferred without derogating from the generality of the foregoing powers, which are mentioned in the article. It must be remarked that clause d is not negative in form; it is positive in form so far as it purports to confer a power. No doubt it may imply a negative too; the negative must arise by implication. But what that implication is is a question to be determined by a consideration of the wording of the clause, and the circumstances, and the case. I think that so far as any implication is to be drawn from clause d, it ought not to be an implication that until preference shares are issued there shall be no borrowing powers given to the company at all. I think that such a construction would lead to the greatest possible inconvenience, and would not be reasonable under the circumstances, and I think that it would not be justified by the wording of clause d. I think that the clause really implies only a restriction when preference share capital exists. I do not think it was directed to the case of there being no preference share capital at all; and I cannot help thinking, though this may be a matter of speculation, that the real intent of the clause was to restrict the borrowing in favour of existing preference share capitalists, so that they should not have their security cut down by persons with a higher right being put before them without their consent and approbation. At any rate I cannot myself come to the conclusion that as a question of the construction of clause d, it is to be inferred that when there is no preference share capital existing there is no power to borrow at all. On the contrary, I think the general power exists, and therefore, so far as this point is concerned, the appellants are right. That brings one to the main point, as to which I will say what I have to say as shortly as possible. I will assume—and, indeed, it must not be inferred from anything I say that I differ from what Byrne, J., has decided—that so far as these debentures purported as a matter of substance to make each company pledge its credit and assets for money not coming to the company itself, but to the other companies also, that was ultrà vires; and I think the transaction must be taken, to say the least of it, to have been irregular so far as the companies purported to contract jointly, and so far as the moneys raised were carried to a joint account, and not paid direct in proportions to the several companies. But the transaction we are considering here was an honest transaction. It is not a case where there has been fraud. Money in cash has been honestly advanced, and has come into the pockets, if I may use the expression, in shares, of each of these companies, and I think that under these circumstances, so far as each company obtained its proportion of the moneys that were borrowed, the court ought, if possible, to support the transaction as against that company in so far as the court can legitimately do so. Now, I think in this case the court can, and ought to, uphold the debenture as against each company to the extent to which the money borrowed came into the coffers of the company. I may point out that there is nothing on the face of the debentures which renders it impossible for us to make the debenture effectual to the extent which I have indicated. It is not as if on the face of it there were merely a joint liability imposed upon the three companies. Each company undertakes, and agrees to pay, the whole debt, and each company charges its own assets with the payment of the whole debt. Therefore, so far as the form of the debenture is concerned, although the joint covenant may be treated as bad and non-existent, yet there is nothing to prevent the covenant of each company to pay the debt being enforceable merely because the amount of the debt may exceed the amount absolutely coming to that company. So far as the form is concerned it seems to make each company liable for the whole debt. It is not impossible, therefore, to say that the company may even on the face of the debenture be at any rate liable for so much of the amount covenanted to be paid as came to the company, and of course no difficulty arises on the form of the debenture from the fact of the charge being given, for it is a charge for the whole debt and therefore clearly a charge for the lesser amount. Therefore it works down to this: In substance what was the transaction, and can it in substance not be held good to the extent to which the moneys borrowed from the lenders came to the coffers of each company? I take the transaction to be in substance this. I gather that each company wanted the money for its own purpose, but that they had the same governing body and the same directors. Erroneously it was thought that they could raise the money wanted for the companies in a lump sum, and subsequently divide it between the three companies after carrying the moneys to a joint account, when it was ascertained exactly how much each company wanted for its particular purposes. Now, so far as each company got from that machinery of the joint account moneys for its own purpose, and used them for its purpose, is not the transaction this: That so far as that company is concerned, while purporting to borrow that money, and to make itself liable for more moneys, it did at any rate borrow that amount and make itself liable for that amount. I agree the machinery was wrong; that the joint covenant was inoperative; and that the joint account was as a piece of machinery irregular. But still it comes to this, that the company did intend to borrow moneys which would come to itself. I agree it intended to make itself liable for more, but it did intend to borrow moneys, though through a curious form of machinery. It intended to borrow moneys, part of which should come to itself, and part of which did come to itself; and so far as that is concerned, I think each company may be said to have borrowed that amount, and that that amount borrowed was within its powers. As I have already pointed out, there is no objection to giving the transaction validity. On the face of the debentures themselves, and so far as the substance is concerned, in looking how the moneys are dealt with, I think the matter ought to be, and can be supported as I have said, so far as the money raised absolutely came to the coffers of the company, for the reasons given by my lord, and which may have been given by me already. Under those circumstances, as I have said, I agree that to the extent I have indicated these debentures ought to be upheld, and as substantially these matters are indifferent to the appellants, whether they had greater rights or not, I think that in substance the appeal may be said to have been completely successful.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and at this time of day I do not propose to add very much; indeed I do not propose to add a word as to the construction of article 114. But with reference to the point of law which has been argued, speaking for myself, I entirely agree with what Byrne, J., has said in his judgment, that a general power to borrow given to a company, and exercisable by the company, under the terms which are to be found in the present case does not authorize a joining with other companies in the borrowing of a sum of money, which is to be joint borrowing and charged upon the whole undertaking of the three companies. It is upon that assumption that I approach the consideration of this debenture. But when I do that I cannot shut my eyes to this, that the real intention and object was that each of the three companies should have a portion thereafter to be ascertained of the £25,000 to be advanced by the debenture-holders. In that there was no illegality. Now, suppose there had been three separate debentures each for £25,000, one given by each of the companies. Then in that case it would have been plain that each debenture could only be ranked and said to be good, not for the whole £25,000, but only for the amount which was actually received by the company from the £25,000, and which ultimately got into the coffers of the company. Is there any difficulty at all in our giving the like effect to this debenture? It is muddled in form I agree, but it contains a separate covenant by each of the companies and a separate charge upon the assets of each of the companies. It seems to me that, even in substance, regard being had to the honesty of the whole transaction, we ought not to deprive these debenture-holders of this security, but ought to say that the debentures are a valid security by each of the three companies upon its own assets to the extent to which such company has received any part of the £25,000. If necessary there may be an inquiry.

WELLS v. ALLOTT. (a.)

Practice — Application for judgment under ord. 14, r. 1 — Action by money-lender—Harsh and unconscionable transaction — Interest charged primâ facie excessive—Money-lenders Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 51), s. 1.

Where in an action by a money-lender to recover money lent with interest it appears that primâ facie the interest charged was excessive, the special jurisdiction conferred by the Money-lenders Act, 1900, comes into operation. Therefore that part of the claim for interest cannot be dealt with upon an application for summary judgment under order 14, but the action must go to trial for the purpose of having it determined whether the interest is so excessive as to entitle the defendant to relief under the Act.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., at chambers, giving the plaintiff leave to sign final judgment under order 14 for the amount indorsed on the writ.

The plaintiff was a money-lender; the defendant a clerk in holy orders. The claim indorsed on the writ was for £70, being the amount due on a promissory note dated the 26th of March, 1904, and made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff, by which note the sum of £70 was made payable by three consecutive quarterly instalments of £23 6s. 8d., each on the first day of each succeeding quarter, the first of such quarterly instalments to become due and payable on the 1st of June, 1904, and it was provided that, should there be default in any one or more payments, the entire amount left unpaid should become due and payable on demand.

The defendant having made default in paying the first instalment, the plaintiff sent him a notice demanding payment of the sum of £70, and as that notice was not complied with took out a summons under order 14 for leave to sign judgment in a summary manner.

The defendant filed an affidavit in answer to the summons, in which he stated that he was a curate with a stipend of £150 per annum. In 1902 he desired an advance, and he wrote asking the plaintiff if he would lend him on reasonable terms £50, and offering to give him as security a charge on his furniture and to pay 5 per cent. on the loan. The plaintiff had replied that he did not do business in that way, but that he would advance £50 if the defendant would agree to sign a promissory note for £70, and in that case he would not require the security of the furniture, and the money advanced under the note could be paid off by twelve monthly instalments. The defendant accepted the offer, except that he said he preferred to pay off by three equal quarterly instalments of £23 6s. 8d. The money was advanced and the first two instalments were paid. When the third instalment was nearly due the defendant wrote asking for a further loan. The plaintiff replied that he did not open two accounts with one creditor, but he would advance another £50 on the same terms as before and cancel the first promissory note. This was done, and £50 was advanced under a second promissory note, less the amount due on the first advance. There was also under similar terms a third sum of £50 advanced to the defendant, who had paid off £140 of the £150 thus advanced. The first instalment under the third promissory note not having been paid, the plaintiff issued this writ claiming the whole £70 as there and then due. The defendant averred that the interest claimed was at the average rate of £105 per cent. per annum, and on the particular sum which the defendant now claimed it was at the rate of £125 per cent. per annum, and he was advised and believed that such interest was excessive, harsh, and unconscionable, and that he was entitled to relief under the Money-lenders Act, 1900; that he had offered before action to pay the plaintiff the sum of £10 balance of principal and interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the sums advanced.

The Master made an order giving the plaintiff leave to sign judgment for £10 principal and 5 per cent. on the three loans of £50 each from the dates of such loans, and giving the defendant leave to defend as to the residue of the claim. The plaintiff appealed to Phillimore, J., who gave him time to make a further affidavit. An affidavit was accordingly made by the plaintiff's clerk which referred to certain correspondence between the plaintiff and the defendant. In that correspondence the defendant had stated that the loan was required by him to purchase a plot of land adjoining property he owned at Sheffield, and he had written in more than one letter that it was really immaterial whether the advance was made him or not. Therefore this was not a case of an impecunious man who was in so "tight a corner" that he was obliged to get the money at any price. There were also certain statements alleged to have been made by the defendant in his letters which it was said were not true. Therefore this was not a case for indulgence. The defendant was an educated man, and was not only able to appreciate, but did appreciate, the rate of interest he was paying, and it was submitted that in the circumstances the rate of interest charged was not excessive; nor was the transaction harsh and unconscionable, nor such as a court of equity would relieve against; and that the said transaction did not come within the Money-lenders Act, 1900, the said loan being advanced without any security whatever. It was also denied that the alleged rate of interest charged was as high as the defendant averred it to be.

Phillimore, J., held on these facts that the plaintiff was entitled to sign judgment for the total sum claimed.

The defendant appealed.

J. R. Randolph, for the defendant.—The defendant has here filed an affidavit stating that the interest is excessive, and claiming relief under the Money-lenders Act, 1900. Where in an action by a money-lender an application is made for leave to sign final judgment under order 14, and it is shown that primâ facie the interest charged is excessive, the special jurisdiction of the Act of 1900 comes into operation, and the jurisdiction of the master or judge in chambers to deal with the case is ousted, for the case, ipso facto, becomes one to which the procedure under order 14 does not apply: In re A Debtor, Ex parte The Debtor, 51 W. R. 370, [1903] 1 K. B. 705. Section 1 of the Act shows that the court which is to determine whether relief shall be given is the court which tries the action. [COLLINS, M.R.—Is the defendant satisfied to have the order of the master restored?—Yes; perfectly. COLLINS, M.R.—Then we will hear the plaintiff's counsel.]

G. Wightman Power, for the plaintiff.—The transaction here cannot be described as harsh and unconscionable, because no unfair advantage was taken by the money-lender. The borrower is an educated man, and there is evidence that this is not the first time that he has had dealings with money-lenders. His own affidavit rebuts the presumption that he borrowed the money because he had got into such financial difficulties that he was bound to raise money, no matter how hard the terms were upon which alone the money-lender would advance. There are no merits in the defence, and it is clear upon the affidavits that his full liability was appreciated by the defendant, who knew from the first exactly what he was agreeing to pay for the accommodation. In Levene v. Greenwood, (1904) 20 Times L. R. 389, it was held that the court had power to reopen a transaction and to say what was fair where the liability of the borrower exceeded what he understood he had undertaken; the transaction being, in the opinion of the judge, harsh and unreasonable. No such considerations arise here. The order of the learned judge should therefore be affirmed.

Randolph was not heard in reply.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an application by the plaintiff, who is a money-lender, for leave to sign final judgment under order 14 for the amount of his claim against the defendant, who is a clerk in holy orders, and who holds the position of a curate. The master gave the defendant leave to sign final judgment for the balance due in respect of the principal sums actually advanced and interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum on the three sums of £50 calculated from the dates of the respective loans and gave the defendant leave to defend as to the rest of the claim. The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the judge, who, holding that there was no defence to the action, gave the plaintiff leave to sign judgment for the full amount claimed.

Now, the question we have to determine is whether the plaintiff in the case is entitled to judgment under order 14. It seems to me that whatever the law might have been before the passing of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, it is impossible now to say that the procedure of order 14 can be made applicable to an action by a money-lender to recover interest on money lent, where the loan appears primâ facie to carry an excessive rate of interest. In such a case the money-lender has not an absolute right to recover what the borrower has agreed to pay, but only a right sub modo involving an investigation by the proper tribunal for the purpose of seeing if the plaintiff's primâ facie right of action is one to which in the particular circumstances effect ought to be given. That is not, I think, a class of case which is intended to be dealt with under order 14. It is clear that in the present case there is primâ facie a debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant has, however, made an affidavit, which, if true, may establish a defence under the Money-lenders Act, 1900, to the greater part of the claim. The procedure under order 14 is meant to give a short and speedy remedy for the recovery of debts which are either admitted to be due or as to which there is no defence. But where in a particular class of case a special jurisdiction is given to determine whether the plaintiff is entitled in the circumstances to recover what is primâ facie a debt, it seems to me clear that that class of case is taken out of order 14. Now, section 1, sub-section 1, of the Money-lenders Act, 1900, is as follows: "Where proceedings are taken in any court by a money-lender for the recovery of any money lent after the commencement of this Act . . . and there is evidence which satisfies the court that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent is excessive, or that the amounts charged for expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, premiums, renewals, or any other charges are excessive, and that, in either case, the transaction is harsh and unconscionable or is otherwise such that a court of equity would give relief, the court may reopen the transaction and take an account between the money-lender and the person sued, and may, notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account or any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and create a new obligation, re-open any account already taken between them and relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of such principal, interest, and charges as the court, having regard to the risk and all the circumstances, may adjudge to be reasonable." Now in the present case the sum of £150 in all was received by the defendant from the plaintiff. The defendant had paid back £140, leaving a balance of principal of £10. The plaintiff claimed in the action £70. The master ordered that if the defendant paid the £10 and interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on all that had been advanced he should be at liberty to defend as to the rest of the claim. The defendant was willing to do that. Phillimore, J., reversed that order and allowed the plaintiff to sign judgment for the amount of the claim. In my opinion, having regard to the allegations contained in the defendant's affidavit, and having regard to the decision of this court in the case of In re A Debtor, 51 W. R. 370, [1903] 1 K. B. 705, the case we are now considering comes within the Money-lenders Act, and is taken, therefore, out of the operation of order 14, because the case involves an investigation, which ought to be made, not upon an application under order 14, but before the proper tribunal for the trial of actions which would have the witnesses before it. Therefore the order of the master must be restored. The costs of this application to be the defendant's in any event.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I entirely agree with all that the Master of the Rolls has said. This is not a class of case that can be dealt with under order 14. The Money-lenders Act of 1900 has introduced an entirely new element into every case which falls within its provisions. Where the interest appears on the face of the transaction to be excessive, whether it be £100 per cent. or less, the further inquiry has to be undertaken — namely, whether the interest is so excessive as to make the bargain harsh and unconscionable. That inquiry must be made, not upon an application for summary judgment under order 14, but before a tribunal which has the parties and the witnesses before it. Phillimore, J., at chambers overlooked, it seems to me, what fell from the Master of the Rolls in In re A Debtor when he said: "Relief may be given if the bargain is harsh and unconscionable by reason of excessive interest or other excessive charges. Before the Act the courts of equity used to give relief in special cases where the parties stood in a particular relation to each other or upon the ground of fraud or undue pressure upon the borrower, but they did not regard excessive interest alone as a ground for setting aside a bargain in the absence of some particular relation between the parties, as, for instance, if the borrower was an expectant heir. I will not say that under this section the interest charged and the other charges made might not be so excessive as to render the bargain harsh and unconscionable, even as against a borrower who was of full age and who stood in no special relation to the lender." The other members of the court concurred in that view. In arriving at this conclusion I desire to express no opinion as to the result of the action; I merely say that the case, for the reasons stated by my lord, is one that in my judgment ought not to be dealt with under order 14.

Bankruptcy—Debt due to a partnership—Partnership dissolved—Appointment of a receiver in partnership action — Assignment of judgment debt — Leave to receiver to issue execution—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 6.

Where a receiver has obtained an assignment of a judgment debt he is entitled to present a bankruptcy petition, as a creditor, against the debtor.

In re Sacker, 37 W. R. 204, 22 Q. B. D. 179, explained and distinguished.

This was an appeal from a receiving order in bankruptcy made by Mr. Registrar Brougham.

In 1901 the debtor, a Mr. J. R. Macoun, was indebted to a firm of stockbrokers for certain Stock Exchange transactions.

On the death, in 1902, of one of the partners in the firm the partnership determined, and the surviving partners in the same year assigned all the partnership assets to a Mr. Levett for him to collect and receive the same and wind up the affairs of the partnership. Notice of this assignment was served upon the debtor.

In the latter part of the same year the assignee Levett obtained judgment against the debtor for £662 16s. 7d. and costs in respect of the debt which the debtor owed to the said firm.

By an order dated the 12th of August, 1903, in the winding up of the partnership, made by Swinfen Eady, J., a Mr. Peat was appointed receiver of the partnership assets.

In October, 1903, Levett assigned to Peat the judgment debt due from the debtor, and on the 13th of November, Peat obtained the leave of the court to issue execution on the judgment.

In January, 1904, a bankruptcy notice was served upon the debtor for this judgment debt. The debtor having failed to comply with this notice, on the 9th of March a bankruptcy petition was presented against him by Peat, the surviving partners of the firm, and the personal representatives of the deceased partner.

At the hearing of the petition an objection was raised by the debtor that the petitioners had no legal right to present the petition on the principle of In re Sacker, 37 W. R. 204, 22 Q. B. D. 179. On the objection being overruled and the receiving order made, the debtor appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the creditors.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J. — I think that the appeal fails. There is undoubtedly a good deal in Lord Esher's judgment in In re Sacker which does suggest—I think I may go further and say which does positively assert—that in the hypothetical case which he puts there of a receiver being able to bring an action at law in his own name, he would not be entitled to become a petitioning creditor, because he does not come within the description of a petitioning creditor under the words of section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. I think those words go very far to cover the proposition for which counsel for the debtor contended; but it was not really necessary for the case which was before the Court of Appeal that this question should have been determined—that is, the question whether a receiver, having a title to sue at law, could be a good petitioning creditor. It is plain from the judgments, I think, of each of the Lords Justices that in that case the position of things was such that it was perfectly impossible for the receiver to bring an action to recover the debt either at law or in equity; and therefore I think we must treat these observations of Lord Esher as obiter, and one can only look at the case as having decided that a receiver who could not sue could not be by himself a good petitioning creditor. Looking at the judgment of Fry, L.J., I observe that he begins by saying that in that case the receiver could not have maintained an action either at law or equity, and later on he deals with exceptional cases in which a receiver could maintain such an action. One of the cases which he gives is where the receiver is the holder of a bill of exchange, and the other is where he is in possession of chattels, and the chattels are wrongfully detained from him. In these circumstances, it seems to me that we ought not to hold the case of In re Sacker to be an authority for the proposition that a receiver cannot be a good petitioning creditor even though the state of things is such that he could maintain an action at law. It is plain that Fry, L.J., thought that he could; and Lopes, L.J., seems to have taken the same view—that is, the view that if the receiver were the holder of a bill of exchange, he could be a good petitioning creditor. In the present case the receiver happens to be the assignee of a judgment, and I think that being the assignee of a judgment he can be a good petitioning creditor even though when the money is recovered it is recovered for the purpose of enabling the Court of Chancery to deal with it. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree,

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree.

Electric lighting—Company—Supplying electric energy outside statutory area — Injunction — Metropolitan Electric Lighting Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. cxcvi), ss. 3, 5—Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict c. ccxxxv.), ss. 2, 16.

A company obtained statutory powers to supply electrical energy within three statutory areas in the Administrative County of London. The company subsequently obtained statutory authority to set up a generating station at a place outside those areas and outside the County of London, and to supply their areas from the new generating station. The company used their new generating station for the purpose of supplying customers outside their statutory area.

Held, that the meaning of the Acts was only to enable the company to substitute a generating station outside, for the generating station within the area, and that the company were not entitled to supply electric energy outside their statutory area.

Action.

This was an action by the Attorney-General to restrain the defendants, the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co., from supplying electrical energy for consumption within the urban district of Willesden, otherwise than under the authority of Parliament or under a licence by the Board of Trade.

The Metropolitan Electric Lighting Act, 1889, provides:

Section 3.—The undertakers for the purpose of this Act are the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Limited), being a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, with limited liability. . . . The undertakers shall not purchase or acquire the undertaking of or associate themselves with any other company or person supplying energy under any licence, provisional order or special Act, within the Administrative County of London unless the undertakers are authorized by Parliament to do so.

Section 5.—The undertakers shall not at any time after the passing of this Act supply energy or (except for the purposes of this Act) erect or lay down any electric lines or works beyond the area of supply otherwise than under the authority of Parliament or under a licence granted by the Board of Trade under the principal Act.

The Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. Act, 1898, provides:

Section 2.—It shall be lawful for the company to hold and use as a station for generating electric current or electrical energy certain lands recently acquired by them in the parishes of Willesden . . . and to establish and work on these lands plant for generating electrical energy and for other purposes incidental to or connected with their undertaking or business.

Section 16.—It shall be lawful for the company to use any of their cables or wires and any mains or cables connected therewith for the transmission of electric current or electric energy from their works on the said lands at Willesden and Acton to the several distributing stations of the company in their Paddington, Marylebone, and Mid-London areas defined by the several provisional orders hereinbefore mentioned . . . and to use the generating station on the said lands for the purpose of supplying electric current or electrical energy within the several areas or districts over which the company have now powers of supply or over which they may hereafter have such powers under any special Act or provisional order.

Cripps, K.C., Jenkins, K.C., and Sargant, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an action by the Attorney-General, in which he complains that the defendants, the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Limited), are contravening the negative prohibition in the Act of Parliament and the orders confirmed by Act of Parliament under which their undertakings are held, and seeks for an injunction to restrain them. Of course the Attorney-General can maintain such an action irrespective of the fact that the Willesden Urban District Council, who join as relators for the purpose of costs, would have no right of action themselves.

Now, the question really turns on the construction of two Acts of Parliament. I should say that the defendants have three statutory areas, all within the Administrative County of London. The wording of the negative clauses is practically identical in all three, and I propose only to refer to the Acts of Parliament. The defendants have recently found that they were unable conveniently to generate sufficient electricity in their several areas for the supply of their customers within those areas. They have, accordingly, obtained statutory authority to set up a generating station at Willesden, which is without those three areas, and also without the Administrative County of London, and they have also acquired statutory authority to supply their areas from that generating station. That being the state of circumstances, I now turn to the Acts of Parliament. The first is dated the 26th of August, 1889. I should mention that the defendant company is not formed under any private Act of Parliament, but is a limited company under the Act of 1862 and the following Acts, and it is not suggested that there is anything ultrà vires the powers of its memorandum of association, but for the purpose of the argument in this case it is in very much the same position as an individual would be if he chose to do this as a private speculation.

First of all the Act of 1889 defines "the undertakers" as "the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. (Limited), being a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, with limited liability and a capital of £500,000." Before I go through the two or three sections to which it is necessary to refer, I should perhaps say that, having regard to the arguments that I have heard, I think it is germane to the subject to consider what the Legislature had in view in making the provisions which I find in the Act of Parliament itself. As it was put in Heydon's case, 3 Rep. 7*a*, which Lord Halsbury cited in Eastman Photographic Co. v. Comptroller of Patents, 47 W. R. 152, [1898] A. C. 571, "We are to see what was the law before the Act was passed and what was the mischief or defect for which the law had not provided; what remedy Parliament appointed and the reason for the remedy." That is a very general way of stating it, but no doubt one is entitled to put one's self in the position in which the Legislature was as at the time the Act was passed in order to see what was the state of knowledge as far as all the circumstances brought before the Legislature are concerned, for the purpose of seeing what it was the Legislature was aiming at. I have been told by counsel on both sides that the object of Parliament was first of all to allot certain districts which should be dealt with by certain companies, and as appears from Major Marindin's report to the Board of Trade, to which both parties have agreed to refer, the idea in the London district, at any rate, was that there should be two companies because there are two alternative systems of supply, and one might use one and the other the other, but there could not be more than two in any one area. Competition no doubt was intended to be limited, so that each company should have its own area or so as each of the two companies should have their own area to themselves. But further than that—and I do not think counsel for the defendants denied it—I think also that the Legislature took into consideration the financial condition of the company, to which it was giving statutory authority. I think it is only right to infer that they would do so, for it is obvious with regard to the company asking for statutory powers, to break up streets, to interfere in the way that one sees only too often with the traffic of the highway, and to carry on the various works which necessarily interfere a good deal with the general use by the public of what is public property, that the Legislature would naturally take pains to see that the company which they do so authorize to interfere has money enough not only to carry out its work but also to continue to carry on the undertaking when it has once established it. For those purposes it seems to me that the Act of Parliament has inserted in it various clauses with reference to the solvency of the company, and its accounts and so on, showing that that is the true view. Bearing in mind that those two objects are two of the objects which Parliament had in view, I find a provision at the end of section 3 of the Act, to which I will refer. It is "The undertakers shall not purchase or acquire the undertaking of or associate themselves with any other company or person supplying energy under any licence, provisional order, or special Act within the Administrative County of London unless the undertakers are authorized by Parliament to do so." Having regard to what I have just said as to the practice of allowing two companies to compete within each area in the Administrative County of London and not outside, I think that it is exceedingly probable that that section was put in having that in view, and that it is probable that it never was contemplated that this company or any other company would be the least likely to want to go outside the administrative county. However that may be, I can only deal with the words as I find them, and that, no doubt, does extend only to companies and so on within the administrative county, but it also is limited to the purchase or acquisition of an existing undertaking, and it is sufficient for me to say that that section has no application to the case before me.

Then comes the fifth section, which is the material section in the present case, and it is in terms both general and explicit. The defendants are driven to ask me to put a limitation upon the clear negative words—"The undertakers shall not at any time after the passing of this Act supply energy or (except for the purposes of this Act) erect or lay down any electric lines or works beyond the area of supply otherwise than under the authority of Parliament or under a licence granted by the Board of Trade." The undertakers are in this case supplying energy to the London and North-Western Railway Co. at Willesden, which is outside their area. I am asked to say, first of all, that "the undertakers" cannot mean simply the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. for all time. To that extent, although it is not necessary for me to determine it now, I should be disposed to agree. I do not suppose it was intended to say that the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. shall never do this, whatever happens, but the qualification, if any, which is necessary is: "The undertakers, so long as they remain undertakers in the sense that they are running the undertaking." That qualification I am willing to accept, but it does not help the defendants. The qualification they ask me to put in is: "Shall not use any of the powers given to them by the Act for the purposes of this undertaking." I find it absolutely impossible to insert any such words at all. Counsel put it tersely as "Shall not qua undertakers." I do not know that the use of the Latin word qua assists him much.

It is in effect when translated at length into English, "shall not use any of the powers given to them as undertakers." I may say that I see no ground whatever for so limiting the words, nor do I feel justified in doing anything of that sort. Even if there were any possibility of limiting them so as to make it not inconsistent with section 3—as to which I express no opinion—it would not help the defendants in the present case because the circumstances have not arisen; they have not "acquired or purchased the undertaking of," and so on. They are simply themselves using their new generating station for the purpose of supplying customers outside their statutory area. I think that counsel for the defendants had not the courage to ask me to insert the words "within the Administrative County of London," nor do I see how it would be possible.

There is a further point to which I adverted during the argument, and that is that the proviso immediately following these negative words excludes any idea of any limitations on the use of the powers, for the proviso is "where the undertakers were on the 20th of May, 1889"—which is months before the Act was passed—"supplying or under any binding agreement to supply energy to any premises beyond the area of supply, they might continue to do so for six months"—or at any rate for a limited period. If this was confined to a general prohibition, that proviso is absolutely unnecessary. It is quite plain that the undertakers before the passing of the Act were not using any of the powers of the Act, for there were none to use; and if they were supplying energy beyond the limits of supply, they were doing it by virtue of some rights or powers of their own as a limited company, and not as "undertakers" under this Act. The proviso is absolutely inconsistent with any such limitation as I am asked to insert, and I find myself wholly unable to insert it.

Then, that being the negative clause, one finds, as one would expect, a corresponding affirmative clause—namely, section 9, which provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Act the undertakers may supply energy within the area of supply," and so on.

I do not think there is any other section in this particular Act to which it is necessary to refer, and I pass on to the Act of 1898. It is to be remembered that the argument which I have heard deals with each area as intended to be a self-sufficing area in which there should be a statutory company, generating its own electricity and supplying it to its customers within its own area.

The preamble of the Act of 1898 contains this recital: "And whereas the demand for the supply of electric current within the areas supplied and authorized to be supplied by the company has increased, and is increasing very rapidly, and in order to enable the company to meet this demand the company have found it practically impossible to provide adequate station accommodation within their then said areas." See now what Parliament is told. The Legislature has thought it proper to have a number of small electric domains complete within themselves, and Parliament is told that that particular system in the present case will not work because the supply and demand have increased so rapidly that their generating stations are insufficient to supply the needs, and for obvious reasons in densely populated districts you cannot put up a very large generating station or multiply generating stations without the risk of continued injunctions against nuisance. They accordingly applied to Parliament to relax its policy with regard to this—because they cannot undertake to supply their own customers within their statutory areas from generating stations within those areas—and to allow them to put their generating stations outside those areas. That is the whole purview of the statute. To my mind it is as plain as possible. "Whereas the company in order to provide for the demands upon them," that is, the demands referred to in the previous sentence from their own customers within their own areas, "have acquired a piece of land in the parishes of Willesden and Acton, and are engaged in constructing a large electrical generating station and works thereon, on which they have expended and are in course of expending large sums of money. And whereas it will conduce to the convenience of those who use the electric current in the said several areas of supply of the company that the company should be empowered to supply from the said electrical generating station and works electric current to their distributing stations within the several areas of supply hereinbefore mentioned, and for that purpose to lay down," &c. The whole thing on the preamble is limited to the convenience and the benefit of the customers within the statutory areas, and the whole Act is a mere enabling of the company to substitute a generating station outside for the generating station within the area. Section 2 is in general terms. I express no opinion about what may happen if the Metropolitan Electric Supply Co. should eventually deprive itself of or give up its three statutory areas. What this section will mean then somebody else may construe when the event happens. I pass it by with the observation that it is simply an authority to hold and to use as a station for generating purposes a certain piece of land, and to establish and work on that land plant for generating electrical energy and for other purposes incidental to their undertaking or business. That does not in terms or by implication authorize the supply of anything from that station, it simply authorizes the manufacture and the generation of power on that spot. I will take the 16th section next, which enables them to supply. It is plain to my mind, and it is consistent with the preamble, that the supply is only to the several areas or districts over which the company have now powers of supply, or over which they may hereafter have such powers under any special Act or provisional order. The argument is that the words "and elsewhere wherever they may think fit to use it as a limited company," or words to that effect, should be added. But it appears to me to be absolutely impossible that I should do anything of that sort, or that I should hold that there is anything in this Act which impliedly authorized their doing anything of that sort in contravention of the express provision of section 5 of the Act of 1889. But it does not stop there, because, if I go back to sections 12 and 13, I find there is an express saving: "Nothing in this Act contained is to be deemed to release the company from any of the duties, liabilities, or conditions." Counsel for the defendants admitted that the negative section was a condition "imposed upon them." One is the lighting order containing words exactly to the same effect, and the other is another lighing order which also contains words to the like effect. On all these grounds it appears to me that the company are acting in direct contravention of the Act of Parliament in doing that which they are now proposing to do. I therefore propose to grant an injunction as asked. I propose to suspend it for a little time so as not to inconvenience the London and North-Western Railway Co. by suddenly depriving them of an electric supply.

In re IRWIN'S SETTLEMENT. (a.)

Settlement—Equitable estate in realty—Grant without words of limitation—Estate for life or in fee simple—Assignment to trustees.

An equitable estate of inheritance in real property cannot be passed by grant or assignment without proper words of limitation, and the intention of the grantor or assignor to pass it, even although manifest, is not sufficient, except in two cases—(1) where the grant or assignment is expressed to be for the same estate as that for which other property has been granted or assigned, where this latter grant or assignment has been in terms absolute; and (2) where the grant or assignment is expressed to be for the whole estate which the grantor has in the property.

A. being possessed of an equity of redemption in certain freeholds and of the right to have other freeholds conveyed to him which he had purchased, by post-nuptial settlement assigned all these freeholds to trustees, without using any words of limitation, upon the usual trusts for sale and investment, and to hold the proceeds for himself, his wife, and children, with the usual provisions.

Held, that the trustees only took an estate for their joint lives and the life of the survivor.

By indenture of post-nupital settlement made the 25th of November, 1884, between William Charles Irwin of the own part, and Thomas Boucher Irwin and William Charles Parkes, who, and their executors or administrators, were thereinafter designated "the trustees," of the other part, after reciting that the said W. C. Irwin was absolutely possessed of and entitled to the freehold hereditaments and premises mentioned in the first schedule thereto, and also to the household furniture, plate, goods, chattels, and effects mentioned in the second schedule thereto, "which said freehold property, household furniture, and effects he is desirous to settle in manner hereinafter provided in favour of his wife, Ellen Irwin, and their present or any future children," W. C. Irwin did thereby "assign the said freeholds and household effects unto the trustees to hold the same or the proceeds thereof upon the trusts and for the intents and purposes hereinafter declared (that is to say) upon trust for the said trustees to stand possessed of and retain the said freeholds and household effects so long as they shall think desirable, and at their absolute discretion to sell all or any part of the same" as mentioned, and to invest the moneys arising from the sale as mentioned, and during the joint lives of the settlor and Ellen, his wife, to pay the interest and annual produce of the said shares or trust moneys to Ellen Irwin, without power of anticipation, and for her separate use, and after her death to pay the same to the settlor for his life, or until the events mentioned, and, after the decease of the survivor of the settlor's wife and himself, for their children at twenty-one and daughters at twenty-one or marriage.

The settlement contained provisions for the application of the income of expectant shares of infants for their maintenance and education, and for the investment and accumulation of the surplus income. And in case of failure of such children the trust funds were to be held for the next-of-kin of the settlor. The settlement also contained the usual provision for the appointment of new trustees in case "the said trustees or trustee" died, or desired to be discharged or became incapable.

Among the freeholds mentioned in the first schedule to the settlement were nine houses which were then mortgaged, and to the equity of redemption of which the settlor was entitled in fee simple, and also certain plots of land which he had contracted to purchase, but which had not been conveyed to him.

There were nine children of the marriage. Mrs. Irwin died in 1902, and Mr. Irwin, the settlor, died in September, 1903.

One of the daughters took out this summons making the surviving trustee of the settlement, the executors of Mr. Irwin's will, the heir-at-law, and other of the children, defendants, asking (among other things) whether, according to the true construction of the settlement, the freehold hereditaments, assured thereby to the trustees thereof, passed to them for an estate in fee simple or only for an estate for the joint lives of the trustees and the life of the survivor, or for what other estate or interest, and whether the surviving trustee could sell the hereditaments in fee simple or for what estate or interest.

J. M. Stone, for the plaintiff.—The settlor had only an equitable fee simple estate in the houses mortgaged and in the plots contracted to be purchased. This equitable fee simple passed to his trustees by the settlement, and was held by them in trust for the children of the marriage in fee simple. It is not necessary to use words of limitation to pass an estate of inheritance in equitable property. The intention of the settlor is to be regarded, and if that intention is apparent upon the instrument that is sufficient: Co. Litt., by Butler, fo. 290*b*, note h. xvi.; Gilbert on Uses and Trusts (3rd ed.), p. 143; Sandars on Uses and Trusts (5th ed.), p. 280; Hayes Conv. (5th ed.), vol. 1, p. 91; Garde v. Garde, 3 Dru. & War. 435; Pugh v. Drew, 17 W. R. 988; and In re Tringham, decided quite lately by Joyce, J. (20 Times L. R. 657).

He also referred to Lewin on Trusts (10th ed.), p. 117; Elphinstone on Interpretation of Deeds, r. 104, p. 276; Holliday v. Overton, 15 Beav. 480; Lucas v. Brandreth, 28 Beav. 274; Tatham v. Vernon, 29 Beav. 604; Meyler v. Meyler, 11 L. R. Ir. Ch. 522; Middleton v. Barker, 29 L. T. 643, 22 W. R. Dig. 259; Dearburg v. Letchford, 72 L. T. 489, 43 W. R. Dig. 58; In re Hudson, 72 L. T. 982; and In re Whiston's Estate, 42 W. R. 327, [1894] 1 Ch. 641.

Tylee, for the heir-at-law.—The earlier authorities are no longer law. In re Hudson is precisely in point, and North, J., decided there that the trustees only took an estate for life. That case is a binding authority upon the court. Garde v. Garde and Pugh v. Drew were cases where the absence of words of limitation was supplied by a reference to a previous absolute grant. All the other modern authorities show that equity follows the law in this matter, and that an equitable estate in fee simple cannot be granted without proper words of limitation.

Whinney, for Kathleen Hitchcock, one of the daughters.—The intention of the settlor to pass an estate in fee simple to his trustees is clear. He gives his trustees power to sell the property, and he could not have intended them to sell merely their own life estates. He provides for the death of his trustees, which shows that he thought he had given them an estate lasting after their deaths. The cases of Holliday v. Overton, Lucas v. Brandreth, Tatham v. Vernon, and Middleton v. Barker do not apply to the present case, because in those cases there was an express gift to the trustees "and their heirs," which showed that the omission of words of limitation in the gifts of the beneficial interests in those cases was intentional. I rely on In re Tringham.

BUCKLEY, J.—If there is to be any relaxation of the rule as to the necessity of the use of words of limitation in passing real estate, I think that that relaxation must be made by the Court of Appeal, and not by myself. I am bound by the authorities to decide in a way in which, if the matter were res integra, I do not hesitate to say that I should not decide. W. C. Irwin, the settlor, was at the date of the deed of settlement of November, 1884, entitled to certain lands for an equitable estate in fee simple and other lands for a legal estate in fee simple. With regard to the former I will, before considering the contents of the deed of settlement, refer shortly to the authorities which have been cited to me in order of date. In Holliday v. Overton there were no words of limitation in the gift to the trustee. Lucas v.

Brandreth is in its essential particulars a repetition of Holliday v. Overton. Tatham v. Vernon is the same as the previous cases, except that there was a gift over in default of there being children or issue. In re Whiston's Settlement was decided by Chitty, J., perhaps as great a master of this branch of the law as any judge of recent times. There the settlor, being entitled to an equity of redemption, assured it to trustees and their heirs upon trust for his wife and himself for life, and then for their children, without words of limitation. Chitty, J., says: "If this case had to be decided according to the doctrine of legal limitations it is plain that these children would only take life interests; but the limitations are in fact only of an equitable interest, and on this point some of the older text writers, such as Cruise and Hayes, seem to have been of opinion that equity regarded the intention of the settlor in these cases, and did not follow the law; so that the court had some considerable latitude in the construction of equitable limitations like the present; but the more modern text writers seem to have rather come round in their opinions, and in Elphinstone on the Interpretation of Deeds it is stated: 'An equitable limitation by way of trust executed has the same construction as a legal limitation.' In Lewin on Trusts it is laid down that if an estate be conveyed by deed to the use of a trustee and his heirs in trust for the settlor for life with remainder in trust for his children simply, without the word heirs, the children by analogy to legal limitations take an estate for life only." Chitty, J., then comes to a conclusion in accordance with the rule laid down in Elphinstone on the Interpretation of Deeds and approves of the Irish case of Meyler v. Meyler, and of the views expressed in Lucas v. Brandreth and Lewin on Trusts. He also says: "Some reliance was placed in the course of the argument on the recital that the settlor was desirous of settling all his freehold and personal estate for the benefit of his children, and it was said that this would distinguish the case from the authorities in Beavan. In my opinion that recital is not sufficient to carry the fee to the children; besides, the settlor, after having so far benefited them by giving them a life interest, might have intended the reversion in fee to result to himself." That is a passage which I think will become very material when I come to read the provisions of the deed before me.

Those four cases have no express application to the case I have to decide, because in all of them there were words of limitation in the gift to the trustees. But those four cases are relevant to this extent, that Chitty, J., said the modern rule, and not the rule of the older text writers, is now the rule that ought to be applied—that is to say, this court is not at liberty to regard the intention of the settlor in such cases, instead of following the law.

In Dearberg v. Letchford, Letchford, the son, assigned to Letchford, the father, absolutely all his estate in the property devised by a certain will; no words of limitation were inserted; Wright, J., held that the fee simple in an equitable estate did not pass, and said: "It seems to me of great importance not to introduce any uncertainty into the construction of conveyances and instruments of that kind; and that if any doctrine is established, no exception should be allowed from it without the greatest reluctance."

The next decision is that of North, J., in In re Hudson. That is a decision of a judge of co-ordinate jurisdiction with myself, and I think that I ought to follow it. If there is anything wrong in it, it is for the Court of Appeal, and not for me, to determine the contrary. It that case the settlor assigned his share and interest under a will to two persons to hold to them, their executors, administrators, and assigns, without words of limitation. It was held that the assignees did not take an equitable estate to which the settlor was entitled under the will in fee simple. The learned judge had no doubt, and I may say that I have no doubt in the case before me, that the settlor meant to pass an absolute interest, but on the face of the deed he had not done it. "Although I have no doubt," said North, J., "that the settlor intended his whole interest to pass, I think that intention cannot have effect," and later on he says—and this is the dominant sentence of the judgment—"If there were any words which showed that the trustees were to take all the share and interest which the testator had in the same way as the testator had it, that might be sufficient; but I cannot find such words." And he goes on to say that although the assignment was of his share and interest under the will, those words were merely words of description.

There is only one other case I need refer to, that of Pugh v. Drew. There leaseholds were disposed of for an absolute interest to A. and B., and freeholds were disposed of upon the same trusts as were declared concerning the premises described in the deed disposing of the leaseholds, or as near thereto as the difference of the estates would admit. James, V.C., held that the freeholds were disposed of in fee simple, and indicates in his judgment that he did so upon the ground that you can by reference convey freeholds for an absolute interest without words of limitation.

Now, the result of these decisions, as it appears to me, is this: An equitable estate in fee simple may be passed without words of limitation, if the assurance is made by reference to other words which show that the estate granted is to be held for an absolute interest and estate, as, for instance, that it is to be held upon the same trusts as leaseholds which have been assigned to A. B., his executors, administrators, and assigns, or as near as the rules of law and equity will permit. That will do. Or such an estate in fee simple may be passed without words of limitation if words are used which express that the grantee is to have all the estate and interest which the grantor had. Except in those two cases I am not aware of any decision that an equitable estate in fee simple can be passed without words of limitation.

Now the relevant provisions in the deed before me are these: [His lordship then read the appointment of trustees, the recital of the settlor's ownership and desire to settle the freeholds and effects, the assignment, and the trust for sale, and continued:] I do not attach importance to the use of the word "assign." The words "grant" or "convey" or "assure" are the proper words to use, no doubt. But an assignment to trustees and their heirs would pass the fee simple. But here we have no words of limitation, and there is so far nothing to assist the matter except that the settlor recites that he is absolutely possessed of the freeholds, and that he is desirous to settle them in manner thereinafter provided. What he does, therefore, is to create some estate or other in that to which he is equitably entitled in fee, and he does it by words which, by reason of the absence of limitation, create only a life interest in the trustees. Then he goes on with the trust for sale and conversion, and there are subsequently beneficial interests created. Now, I agree that when you read the provisions of this deed you cannot doubt that the settlor thought that he had sufficiently passed to his trustees the fee simple, and not merely an estate for their joint lives and the life of the survivor. But if he has not passed the fee, I cannot pass it for him. There are no words of limitation in favour of the trustees, and their omission brings the case within Dearberg v. Letchford and the authorities upon which that decision was based. Then are there any referential words by which the settlor gives his freeholds upon the same trusts as some other property given absolutely, or by which he gives the interest in the freeholds for his whole estate and interest therein? There are not. The settlor says that he has got an absolute interest and is going to settle it in manner thereinafter provided, and he simply assigns that in which he had the equitable fee simple to trustees, without words of limitation, and thus creates only an estate for life. In addition I need only mention a very recent decision of Joyce, J. (In re Tringham). In that case there were words of limitation in the gift to the trustees, although none in the subsequent trusts, and the decision was based on that circumstance.

I come, with regret, to the conclusion that by reason of the absence of words of limitation there passed to the trustees merely an estate for the lives of the trustees and the life of the survivor—that is, for the lives of Thomas Boucher Irwin and William Charles Parkes, and the survivor of them.

WOODALL v. CLIFTON. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant running with land—Option of purchasing fee simple—Executory interest—Rule against perpetuities.

Lands were demised to W. for ninety-nine years at a yearly rent, with an option in favour of W., his heirs or assigns, of purchasing the fee simple thereof at any time during the term. Other lands were similarly demised to W., with a similar option in favour of W., his executors, administrators, and assigns.

Held, that whether the options were or were not covenants running with the land, they created an interest in land, which interest did not at the time of its creation necessarily vest within the limits allowed by the rule against perpetuities, and consequently were void. The dicta in Muller v. Trafford, 49 W. R. 132, [1901] 1 Ch. 54, relating to covenants for perpetual renewal, distinguished.

By an indenture dated the 6th of July, 1867, lands were demised by S. to W., his executors, administrators, and assigns, for ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £142, subject to the proviso that W., "his heirs or assigns," should have an option of purchasing the fee simple of the lands at any time during the term.

By an indenture dated the 14th of July, 1869, other lands were demised by S. to W., his executors, administrators, and assigns, for ninety-nine years at the yearly rent of £112 1s., subject to the proviso that W., "his executors, administrators, and assigns," should have the option of purchasing the fee simple of the lands at any time during the term.

The lands comprised in both leases were now vested in the plaintiff, who claimed that, as assignee of the terms, he was entitled to the benefit of both options. Subject to these leases and options, the reversion in fee of the lands was vested in the defendants as trustees of a settlement, dated the 3rd of June, 1890, upon trusts still subsisting.

The plaintiff gave notice to the defendants of his intention to purchase the fee. The defendants refused to sell on the ground that the options in both leases infringed the rule against perpetuities, and that the first option was given to W., his heirs and assigns, and was not annexed to the lease. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the options were valid and subsisting, and specific performance, or, in the alternative, damages.

Cave, K.C., and Marigold, for the plaintiff.

Rowden, K.C., and Beaumont, for the defendant.

WARRINGTON, J., stated the facts, and gave judgment to the following effect: The rule against perpetuities fixes a limit of time, now accepted as a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards, within which every executory limitation, not being a limitation subject to an estate tail, must necessarily vest, if it vests at all, on pain of being otherwise void. Does this option amount to an executory limitation within the meaning of that rule?

The provision in the lease by which the option is granted amounts to an agreement or covenant on the part of the then owner to grant the fee simple to another person at a period of time which undoubtedly may infringe the rule against perpetuities. If the grant creates an interest in land, it seems to me that the effect of it is to render it something more than a mere covenant, and to create an interest in land which does not vest at the moment at which it is granted, but requires for its vesting the happening of another event—namely, the exercise of the option and the payment of the purchase-money, which event may happen beyond the limit. For the moment I shall not deal with any question as to whether that provision runs with the land or not. Taking that provision by itself, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that it does create an estate or interest in land, and, if it does, it is one which is obnoxious to the rule against perpetuity, on the authority of London and South-Western Railway Co. v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 321, 620, 20 Ch. D. 652. In that case, the company conveyed land to Powell in fee simple, and the deed contained a covenant that Powell, his heirs or assigns, would at any time thereafter, on six months' notice and the receipt of £100, re-convey the land to the company. Comparing that covenant with the present one, they are for all practical purposes identical. In that case the defendant was not the covenantor, nor directly bound by the covenant. He was the then owner of the land, but, notwithstanding that fact, he was said to have bought with notice of the covenant. Kay, J., decided that the defendant was bound by the covenant in equity, and that it did not create an interest in land, and that the case was therefore one of contract. It is plain that if Kay, J., had thought he was dealing, not with a mere case of contract, but with a case where the effect of the contract was to create an estate or interest in land, his decision would have been the other way. The Court of Appeal took a different line from Kay, J. All the judges in that court held that the defendant was not bound by the contract in question—not at law, because the covenant could not run with the land; and not in equity, because it was negative, and therefore not falling within the principle of Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Ph. 774. That might have been an end of the case, but the court, and especially Jessel, M.R., thought it right to deal with the question whether, assuming that this covenant was binding on the defendant, it did or did not create an interest in land, and was therefore obnoxious to the rule against perpetuities. They concluded that it did create an interest in land. There is a remarkable interlocutory observation of the Master of the Rolls which shows plainly how his mind worked in arriving at the conclusion (20 Ch. D., at p. 579): "What is the distinction between this case and a conditional limitation that, if A. B. pays £100 at any time, the estate shall vest in him?" That question was not answered. Having that before him, he puts the point in this way at p. 580: "If, then, the rule as to remoteness applies to a covenant of this nature, this covenant clearly is bad as extending beyond the period allowed by the rule. Whether the rule applies or not, depends upon this, as it appears to me, does or does not the covenant give an interest in land? If it is a bare or mere personal contract it is, of course, not obnoxious to the rule, but in that case it is impossible to see how the present appellant can be bound. He did not enter into a contract, but is only a purchaser from Powell, who did. If it is a mere personal contract, it cannot be enforced against the assignee. Therefore the company must admit that it somehow binds the land. But if it binds the land, it creates an equitable interest in the land. The right to call for a conveyance of the land is an equitable interest or equitable estate. In the ordinary case of a contract for purchase there is no doubt about this, and an option for re-purchase is not different in its nature. A person exercising the option has to do two things. He has to give notice of his intention to purchase and to pay the purchase-money; but so far as the man who is liable to convey is concerned, his estate or interest is taken away from him without his consent, and the right to take it away being vested in another, the covenant giving the option must give that other an interest in land." He further decided that the rule against perpetuities applied to the interest so created. The other Lords Justices took the same view.

The only possible ground on which the plaintiff can escape from the decision in Gomm's case is that this covenant ought to be treated as an exception to the rule against perpetuities. The plaintiff's contention is that in leases, covenants to renew and even to renew in perpetuity are held valid, although the interest which they create may be one which arises outside the limits of the rule against perpetuities; that this covenant, although it is a covenant to convey the fee simple, is for all practical purposes nothing more than a covenant for perpetual renewal. Covenants to renew are undoubtedly valid. Are they an exception to the general rule, and is there some ground on which that exception is founded which would apply to the present case? There is admittedly no authority on that point. The authority which has been most relied on in order to induce me to say that the validity of those covenants depends on a ground applicable to the present case is the case of Muller v. Trafford, 49 W. R. 132, [1901] 1 Ch. 54—not the decision, because the decision in that case was against the plaintiff seeking to enforce the covenant—but the dicta of Farwell, J., in dealing with one part of the case. These dicta amount to this, that the covenant to renew runs with the land, and, that that being so, the doctrine of perpetuities has no application to it. I will assume for the present purpose (although I do not wish to decide it, because further questions may arise upon which I prefer to reserve my opinion) that this covenant, being contained in a lease, does run with the land, as being a covenant touching and concerning the thing demised. Even then I do not see why that fact takes it out of the mischief that it infringes the rule against perpetuities. I should have thought, on the contrary, that it was just that fact which did create an interest in land; that, if it was a mere personal and collateral covenant, it might well have been argued that it had no such effect; and it will be noticed that for the purposes of his judgment in Gomm's case, the Master of the Rolls assumed for the purpose of his decision on that part of it that the covenant bound the defendant—that is to say, that it did either run with the land, or that the defendant was in such a position that, having notice of it, he was bound by it. Now Farwell, J., was dealing in the passages which have been cited to me only with a covenant to renew (I think that is important to bear in mind)—that is to say, with a covenant which was recognized as being one of the exceptions to the general rule. He says ([1901] 1 Ch., at p. 61), "I will assume that this is a covenant for renewal running with the land; it is then, in my opinion, free from any taint of perpetuity, because it is annexed to the land." Then he goes on to say, "It must bind the land from its inception, because it would otherwise be an executory interest in land arising in futuro, and therefore obnoxious to the rule against perpetuity." When he says "It must," I suppose he means that it must be a condition of its enforceability that it shall bind the land from its inception. Then he says: "Perpetuity has no application to covenants which run with the land, because they are so annexed to the land as to create something in the nature of an interest in the land. As between lessee and lessor, therefore, the lessee accepts and the lessor grants something which is more or less, according to the point of view from which you look at it, than the actual term or interest granted. It is a term subject to something and with the benefit of something. It is a reversion subject to something and with the benefit of something, and those two something are annexed to and form part of the land from the beginning of the term in such a sense that the doctrine of perpetuity has no application." I think he means that, in the case before him, the interest created is so annexed to the land that it vests in the lessee in the first instance.

I think it is impossible to apply that to the present case. I think I must treat covenants to renew as exceptions to the general rule—exceptions for which it is very difficult to find a logical justification, but which have been probably recognized, because they were in existence long before the rule had been developed. I must hold, therefore, that there is nothing, in the attempts which have been made to logically justify that exception, that would bind me to apply it in the present case, even on the assumption that the covenant runs with the land. It appears to me that it is the very fact that the covenant runs with the land which makes it an interest in land, and an interest which is not vested in the lessees at the moment of the lease, but one which comes into existence only on the happening of a future event—namely, the exercise of the option and the payment of the purchase-money.

I must make a declaration that the two options to purchase are not valid and subsisting. Then, with that declaration, if the plaintiff desires it, the action will have to go to trial on the question whether the defendants are liable in damages or not.

With regard to Mr. Cave's contention that he is suing on the contract, and that the rule against perpetuities is not part of the law of contract, I had better say that I agree with him to this extent, that it may be (again I do not express any definite opinion about it) that he can sue the defendant on contract in the sense of recovering damages, but I am decidedly of opinion that he cannot enforce specific performance.

SYKES v. BARRACLOUGH. (a.)

Coal mines—Checkweigher—Acts of interference with workmen—Removal—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 13, sub-sections 3, 4.

By sub-section 3 of section 13 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, it is provided that a checkweigher shall not be authorized in any way to impede or interrupt the working of the mine, or to interfere with the weighing, or with any of the workmen or with the management of the mine, but shall be authorized only to take such account or determine the deductions as provided by the Act. Sub-section 4 provides that if the owner, agent, or manager of the mine desires the removal of a checkweigher on the ground that the checkweigher has impeded or interrupted the working of the mine, or interfered with the weighing or any of the workmen, or with the management of the mine, or has, at the mine, to the detriment of the owner, agent, or manager done anything beyond taking such account, determining such deductions, or giving such information as aforesaid, he may complain to a court of summary jurisdiction, who, if of opinion that the owner, agent, or manager shows sufficient primâ facie ground for the removal of the checkweigher, shall call on the checkweigher to show cause against his removal.

Held, that the expression "interfere with any of the workmen" in these sub-sections was not limited to interference by a checkweigher virtute officii, nor to acts of interference on the mine premises only.

Case stated by justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

A complaint was preferred by the respondent, who was the certified manager of the Ackton Hall Colliery, Featherstone, and of a certain mine, the Silkstone pit, of that colliery, under section 13 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, against the appellant, who was the checkweigher, on behalf of the persons employed at the mine, that the appellant did, on the 13th, 14th, 19th, 20th, and 21st of November, 1903, unlawfully impede and interrupt the working of the mine, and did unlawfully interfere with certain of the workmen employed at the mine, and did unlawfully interfere with the management of the mine.

The justices were of opinion that the respondent had shown sufficient primâ facie ground for the removal of the appellant as checkweigher, and the appellant was duly summoned to appear to show cause against his removal.

The material facts found by the justices on the hearing of the case were as follow: In addition to being the checkweigher of the mine, the appellant was also president of the local branch of the miners' association, and on the 19th of November, 1903, he presided over a meeting of the men which had been called to consider the question of working on play days. Play days were days on which the pits were not working for pulling coal, and the only work done on those days was work necessary for the safety of the pit roads, workings, roofs, and ventilation. On a play day, therefore, the appellant had no business at the pit. Four men had been previously stopped by the respondent for refusing to work on a play day for the opening of some blocked ventilation, and this meeting had been called to consider the matter. The appellant told the four men whose checks had been stopped not to go and see the respondent, but to be at a pit-gate meeting not later than 4.30, and he would see there were others to stop the men from going to work, and they would then have a meeting at 5.30. There was accordingly a pit meeting the next morning. The appellant spoke, and said the men were not to go into the pit, and he asked for a motion to stop play day working either by fair or foul means. A pit-gate meeting is a meeting at the entrance to the colliery yard as the men are going to work. The appellant told the men also that they were not to work on play days in future. Several men called as witnesses went on the 20th to work, but did not go to work, as they were told not to do so. The appellant also told the men at this meeting to go back and come in their holiday clothes next morning and watch those who went to work. The justices also found that on the 21st, which was a play day, and a day on which the appellant had no business at the pit, men had been interfered with by him and had gone to the colliery intending to work, but had been turned back.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended before the magistrates that section 13 of the Act specially referred to what a checkweighman might do in the discharge of his functions. He might not take advantage of his position to inflict injury upon his employers, but the statute did not interfere with his freedom of action when not discharging his ordinary functions unless he did unlawful acts. If in his capacity as president of the branch, and not while acting as checkweigher, the appellant simply advised the men not to go down, there was no offence.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that a checkweighman was in no sense in the service of the colliery company. They had no voice in the appointment, and so long as he kept to the Act they had no power to remove him. This made it all the more necessary that such a person should be careful not to exceed his duties. The offence constituted by the 13th section of the Act need not necessarily take place on the mine premises, but might be committed at any time and at any place.

The justices found that on the 19th, 20th, and 21st of November the appellant had unlawfully interfered with certain of the workmen employed at Ackton Hall Colliery, and they ordered the appellant to be removed as checkweigher.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether there was any evidence to support the finding of the justices.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15.—Lord ALVERSTONE L.C.J., said that he had read the judgments about to be delivered by Kennedy and Phillimore, JJ., and that he had nothing to add to them.

KENNEDY, J., read the following judgment: Whilst I concur in the conclusion at which my lord and my brother Phillimore have arrived, I wish to state shortly the reasons for my own judgment as the matter to be decided is one of general importance. The magistrates have found as a fact that on three out of the five days alleged the appellant, being at the time a checkweigher, did unlawfully interfere with the workmen, and upon this ground, under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, s. 13, sub-sections 3, 4, and 5, they made a summary order for his removal from the office of checkweigher. We were invited to reverse this decision, upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which the magistrates could hold that there had been interference on the part of the appellant. "Interference with workmen" is under these sections a specified legal ground of removal, and we can reverse that decision only if there was not in point of law any evidence to justify the magistrates' finding of fact. [His lordship read the findings of fact set out by the magistrates in the special case, and continuing said:] After careful consideration, I cannot say that what they have found as taking place on the 20th and 21st of November were matters which in point of law could not constitute an interference with the workmen within the proper meaning of the statute. It was urged that it could not be so regarded on two grounds—first, that the interference intended to be forbidden meant only interference by the checkweigher virtute officii, or conduct in the apparent or professed exercise of the checkweigher's powers as such, and that the acts found against the appellant were not acts done by him, or professed to be done by him, as checkweigher; but acts which he did as president of a local miners' federation. Now I desire to say that I should not be prepared to justify an order of the magistrates removing a checkweigher merely because he was an official of a miners' association, or because, as a private individual, a checkweigher took some part in the legitimate work of a miners' association, or on the ground that he was present or spoke or presided at meetings assembled to consider matters affecting the interests or actions of miners. It was quite true that such action might be intended to influence, and might, in fact, influence, the conduct of the workmen at a mine; but I should not be prepared to hold, nor must I be understood as holding here, that such action was necessarily interference within the meaning of this section. I do not believe that that was the purpose of the enactment in question; but I am equally convinced that the mere fact that the checkweigher was also an official of a local miners' association, and that the acts charged were acts done when purporting to act as such official, and not as checkweigher, does not necessarily constitute an answer to the charges made. As to what conduct amounts to interference which under the terms of the statute would constitute a ground for the removal of a checkweigher, it seems to me that that question must in each case turn upon the particular circumstances and the acts done. Interference is not a word of art, and it is not a word capable of precise definition, but there is nothing in the section which limits the interference to acts of the checkweigher done in connection with his duties in that office, nor is there—and I am now dealing with the second contention on behalf of the appellant—anything which limits the locality where the interference could take place.

With regard to the locality of the acts and to the further contention for the appellant that the section does, if it is properly construed, limit the objectionable interference to interference within the gates, or, to use the phrase which appears in a later part of the section, to interference "at the mine," I do not agree with this view as a matter of construction. The very fact that the section later on did limit the offence of acting to the detriment of the owner, agent, or manager to acts done "at the mine," and that the former sub-section contained no such words, was strongly against implying such a limitation in the former case. Nor would it be a reasonable construction to hold that such a limitation was imposed, because a safeguard against the abuse of the checkweigher's influence or power with the workmen was, it seems to me, quite as reasonably necessary with regard to interference with the workmen at the gate or outside, as in the mine itself.

Reference was made in the course of the argument to the case of Prentice v. Hall, 26 W. R. 237, which was quoted in support of the arguments on behalf of the appellant, but I think that the effect of the judgments in that case, as well as the change in the wording of the Act of 1887 from the wording of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, under which that case was decided, is opposed to the contention of the appellant upon both the points relied upon. I can find no suggestion in the case as reported that the locality where the act was done would make any difference, nor any suggestion that a distinction was to be made according as the act was done apparently in the performance of the checkweigher's duties as such and under colour of his authority as such, or otherwise.

For these reasons I am unable to say that the facts found by the magistrates, which we must accept as properly found, could not constitute interference within the meaning of the section and justify them in removing the checkweigher from his office. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, J., read a judgment in which he concurred, and, after referring to the facts of the case and the sections of the statute, said the Act of 1887 repealed the provisions of the earlier Act, which contained the words "otherwise misconduct himself," and substituted the words "done anything at the mine to the detriment of the owner, agent, or manager." The new Act, therefore, deals with three offences—interference with any workmen, interference with the management of the mine, and acting to the detriment of the owner, &c., at the mine.

[After reading the facts as found by the magistrate, his lordship said]: If it be necessary to constitute a cause of removal that the action of which complaint is made should be done at the mine, I do not think that what happened on the 19th could be said to be done at the mine. But I think that the justices might find that what was done on the 20th and 21st was interference with the workmen, because the acts, though not done by the appellant in his capacity of checkweigher, were acts of serious interference. It was suggested that the order could not be supported unless the justices were right in their findings as to all three days, but this was not a conviction for a misdemeanour to which the rule in O'Connell v. Reg., (1844) 11 Cl. & F. 155, would apply. In my opinion there was no local limitation for the doing of the act. Sub-section 3 defined certain acts which the checkweigher has no authority to do, and sub-section 4 provides that he may be removed for doing these acts, and added as an additional ground of removal "acting to the detriment of the owner at the mine." These are words of extension, not of limitation. It was therefore open to the justices to find that the act done by the appellant on the 19th of November (though it did not take place "at the mine," and though it was not as checkweigher, but as president of the miners' association that he spoke) was an unlawful interference with the workmen. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

SMITH v. GIDDY. (a.)

Nuisance — Trees overhanging neighbour's ground — Damage to neighbour's ground—Right of action.

The plaintiff was the owner of a fruit garden. The branches of ash trees growing on the defendant's land overhung into the defendant's garden and caused damage to the garden.

Held, that he had a right of action for the damage so caused.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Russell, sitting at the Chertsey County Court.

It appeared that the plaintiff was the occupier of a fruit garden, and that some forty ash trees, the property of the defendant, overhung the plaintiff's land, and, as the plaintiff alleged, damaged his land.

The county court judge nonsuited the plaintiff on the ground that no cause of action was created.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C., and Owen Thompson, for the appellant.—It is true that no action of this kind is to be found in the books, but the principle of Crowhurst v. Amersham Local Burial Board, 27 W. R. 95, 4 Exch. D. 5, is directly in point. In Lemmon v. Webb, (1894) 3 Ch. D. 1, Kay, L.J., after stating that allowing trees to overhang the boundary was a nuisance, added: "For any damage caused by this nuisance an action in the case would lie." It is true that was an obiter dictum, but the judgment was a considered one.

Drake, for the defendant.—Such an action as the present one is unprecedented. In the Crowhurst case the trees were poisonous, and that case is therefore distinguishable.

WILLS, J.—I have come with some reluctance to the conclusion that there must be a new trial in this case. It is true that no action of this kind is to be found in the books, but in the case of Crowhurst v. Amersham Local District Board, Kelly, C.B., after carefully considering the matter, decided that such an action would lie. In that case the local burial board grew yew trees on their own ground, and some of the branches overhung into the adjoining field and were eaten by the cattle pasturing in the field, and the cattle died from eating the poisonous leaves of the yew tree. The Exchequer Court held that the local board were liable for the damage so occasioned. They treated it as one of a class of cases where the maxim "sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas" applies, and of which Fletcher v. Rylands, is perhaps the best example. Now, what is the difference in principle between the Crowhurst case and the present case. I can see none. If the cuttings from the defendant's trees do in fact cause damage to the plaintiff's land I think that there is no doubt that he has a cause of action against the defendant. I am always reluctant to create new classes of actions, but it would be impossible for us to decide otherwise without ignoring the decision in Crowhurst v. Amersham Local Board, and though we are not bound by the dicta of Kay, L.J., in Lemmon v. Webb, they support the view which I have just expressed. It is said that the remedy to abate the nuisance by cutting the overhanging branches is open to the plaintiff. That may be so, but that, in my opinion, affords no answer to this action. The case must therefore go back to the county court judge.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree. The county court judge has nonsuited the plaintiff, and we must therefore assume that the plaintiff has suffered material damage to his garden by reason of the overhanging trees on the defendant's property. It is said that such an action is unknown. I agree; but I see on principle no reason why it should not lie. I think that the principle laid down in Fletcher v. Rylands—viz., that you have no right to use your land so as to inflict damage on your neighbour, applies to this case. It seems to me that this case is undistinguishable in principle from Crowhurst v. Amersham Local Board. As to the right to abate the nuisance, I see no reason why the plaintiff should be obliged to go the expense of cutting the overhanging branches.

JOHNSON v. THE KING. (a.)

Fraud — Interest given in court of law or equity—Ordinance of the 10th of November, 1881, of Sierra Leone—Crown abandoning charges of fraud—Costs where Crown is a litigant.

Money obtained by fraud and retained by fraud can be recovered with interest, whether proceedings be taken in a court of equity or in a court of common law, but where the Crown in a civil action intentionally and deliberately put aside all charges of fraud no interest was allowed.

In dealing with costs in cases between the Crown and a subject the rule of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council will be that the Crown neither pays nor receives costs unless the case is governed by some local statute, or there are exceptional circumstances justifying a departure from the ordinary rule.

Appeal from the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone.

The whole circumstances of the case are given at length in their lordships' judgment.

Muir Mackenzie, for the appellant.

Sutton, for respondent.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, and LINDLEY) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—Isaac Babington Johnson, a Government contractor in Sierra Leone, who was the defendant in the action, appeals against a judgment of the Acting Chief Justice of the colony ordering him to pay to his Majesty £428 13s. 3d.

The money in question represents interest on two sums which Johnson received from the army paymaster in excess of what was due, and which he retained in his own hands for over a year.

Under his contract with the Government Johnson was required to remove a quantity of granite stones from the Signal Hill to the Naval Coal Shed in Water-street, Freetown. For this service he was to be paid so much a ton. Between the 29th of November, 1900, and the 9th of January, 1901, he removed 298 tons and a fraction. His charge at the agreed rate ought to have been £448 1s. 7d. He presented a voucher for £2,474 18s. 6d., and received that sum from the army paymaster, thus obtaining £2,026 16s. 11d. beyond his due. Between the 31st of December, 1900, and the 24th of January, 1901, he removed in addition 138 tons and a fraction. His remuneration for that work ought to have been £207 8s. 5d. His claim was for the removal of 4,140 tons. He presented a voucher for £6,210, and actually received that sum from the army paymaster. The total amount overpaid was thus £8,029 8s. 6d.

On the 2nd of January, 1902, a writ was issued in the name of his Majesty against Johnson claiming return of the money overpaid. The claim was put in two ways—(1) return of money obtained by fraud; (2) in the alternative, return of money paid by mistake.

The statement of claim in the action was delivered on the 5th of February, 1902. It followed the lines on which the writ was framed. It dealt with the two cases of over-payment separately. In paragraphs 6, 8, and 9 it charged fraud, while in paragraphs 7 and 10 it presented the case as one of over-payment by mistake without alleging fraud. Then in paragraph 11 it was alleged that on the 5th of February, 1902 (that is the day on which the statement of claim purported to be delivered) the defendant was convicted of having obtained by means of false pretences from the army paymaster two several sums equal in the aggregate to the two sums actually overpaid. In paragraph 12 it was alleged that the plaintiff had "incurred great expense in prosecuting and obtaining the conviction of the said defendant for his said frauds," and had "suffered damage by the unlawful obtaining and detention of the said sums." The statement of claim concluded by claiming under paragraphs 6 and 7 and paragraphs 9 and 10 return of the two sums which amounted together to £8,029 8s. 6d. Under paragraph 11 it claimed £1,200 as damages.

By his statement of defence, which was delivered on the 14th of February, 1902, Johnson admitted over-payment of two sums amounting to the sum of £8,029 8s. 6d. and tendered repayment. He denied fraud, and accepting apparently the suggestion of the Crown indicated in paragraphs 7 and 10 of the statement of claim, he said the over-payments were due to mistakes which he attributed to certain officials or servants of the Crown. The said sum of £8,029 8s. 6d. was forthwith paid into court.

On the 18th of February, 1902, Johnson was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment.

By his reply, delivered on the 19th of February, 1902, the plaintiff said that he accepted the sum of £8,029 8s. 6d. paid into court by the defendant "in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim under paragraphs 7 and 10 of his said statement of claim"—the two paragraphs which treated the over-payment as due to mistake and not to fraud. At the same time he denied that the sum was sufficient to satisfy his claim arising under paragraphs 11 and 12 of his statement of claim.

The case went to trial. The Crown adduced no evidence except the statement of defence and Johnson's answers to interrogatories which came to nothing more than an admission of his conviction and the sentence thereon.

At the trial the claim put forward on behalf of the Crown to recover the expenses of the prosecution and conviction was rejected and abandoned. As regards the claim for interest, it does not appear that the learned counsel for the Crown attempted to rest it on fraud. The learned counsel for the defendant pointed out that fraud had not been proved in the action. But the learned judge held that it was unnecessary to go into that point as the defendant admitted "receiving the money by mistake or as over-payment." Consequently he thought the law would "imply a promise from defendant to pay back to the plaintiff the money paid in excess." He thought the allegation of special damage in the statement of claim sufficient, and gave "judgment for the plaintiff for £428 13s. 3d. damages by way of interest without costs."

Having regard to the law as settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co. v. South-Eastern Railway Co., [1893] A. C. 429, it is impossible to support the decision of the Acting Chief Justice on the ground upon which it was rested. Mr. Sutton, who argued on behalf of the Crown, admitted that the case was presented to this board in a very unsatisfactory manner. He pointed out, however, that the over-payments were so gross and indeed so monstrous in amount that it was impossible to believe in the absence of fraud. It would not be easy to resist that conclusion if their lordships had to draw inferences of fact from the materials placed before them. But the difficulty is that the Crown seems intentionally and deliberately to have put aside all question of fraud. In the reply on behalf of the Crown the money paid into court was accepted in terms as money paid by mistake, and no attempt was made to give any evidence of the fraudulent pretences which had been proved to the satisfaction of the criminal court. Possibly, as was suggested, no evidence of fraud was given in the civil action because everybody concerned must have known all the facts of the case. This board, however, has nothing before it but the evidence presented in the record. Having regard to the dates of the conviction, the payment into court and the sentence, in connection with the reply delivered on behalf of the Crown, and considering that the punishment awarded does not seem to have erred on the score of severity, it is at least conceivable that there may have been some understanding or some expectation or hope held out that the question of fraud would not be further pressed. However that may be, the miscarriage, if miscarriage there be, is due entirely to the action of the Crown and the way in which the Crown has conducted the case. If the Crown intended to rely on fraud as giving a right to interest, the case ought to have been stated plainly and proved clearly.

In order to guard against any possible misapprehension of their lordships' views they desire to say that in their opinion there is no doubt whatever that money obtained by fraud and retained by fraud can be recovered with interest, whether the proceedings be taken in a court of equity or in a court of law or in a court which has a jurisdiction both equitable and legal, as the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone possesses under the Ordinance of the 10th of November, 1881.

In order to support the decree it was suggested that Johnson, who was a trader, must have made a profit by the use of money which was in his hands for a year. That is very probable, but there is no proof of it. It was also suggested that Johnson as a "casual accountant" to the Crown was bound to account for the money with interest. But no authority was given in support of this proposition, and it appears that the records of the old Court of Exchequer which might have thrown some light upon this point are not readily accessible.

In the result, therefore, their lordships are of opinion that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

Their lordships having reserved the question of costs for further consideration, the following addendum to their lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord Macnaghten on the 19th of July, 1904:

As regards costs, their lordships have heard a separate argument, and they desire to say that they are much obliged to the learned counsel on both sides for the industry and care which they have bestowed upon the question. It will be enough to state the conclusions at which their lordships have arrived.

It cannot be disputed that over and over again before this tribunal the Crown has been treated in the matter of costs just like a private litigant. It appears, however, that no case can be found in which the point was argued.

All the cases seem to fall under one or other of the following three heads:

1. Cases where the Crown has been treated as an ordinary litigant, under the authority of local statutes, as is generally the case in the self-governing colonies.

2. Cases where the question arose under a petition of right or some proceeding analogous to a petition of right.

3. Exceptional cases where justice seemed to require that the Crown should pay costs or where the Crown was not unwilling to be treated as an ordinary litigant.

The present case cannot be brought under any of of these heads. There is no Ordinance in Sierra Leone authorizing the court to treat the Crown as an ordinary litigant, and the appellant has succeeded in spite of demerits.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie relied on section 19 of the Ordinance of the 10th of November, 1881, which declares that statutes of general application which were in force in England on the 1st of January, 1880, should be in force in Sierra Leone from the date of the Ordinance coming into effect. He contended that that section imported into the colony the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90. Their lordships, however, are of opinion that that Act is not a statute of general application within the meaning of section 19 of the Ordinance in question. It only deals with proceedings in the United Kingdom.

In the result, therefore, their lordships are of opinion that, in dealing with costs in cases between the Crown and a subject, this board ought to adhere to the practice of the House of Lords, and that in future the rule should be that the Crown neither pays nor receives costs unless the case is governed by some local statute, or there are exceptional circumstances justifying a departure from the ordinary rule.

In the present case their lordships think that the order appealed from should be reversed without costs, and that there should be no costs of the appeal.

In an action of detinue in a county court the plaintiff recovered judgment for the return of the chattel, and in default that a warrant of delivery should issue. The defendant did not return the chattel and a warrant of delivery in the usual form was issued. The defendant, nevertheless, did not deliver up the chattel, but the bailiff did not distrain his land and goods under the warrant. The plaintiff thereupon applied for an order of committal, and the county court judge, being satisfied that the defendant had wilfully disobeyed the order of the court, made an order of committal.

Held, that, as the High Court had, under ord. 42, rr. 6, 7, power to enforce a judgment for the recovery of a chattel by a writ of attachment or committal, the county court had, under section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and ord. 25, r. 57, of the County Court Rules, 1903, jurisdiction to enforce the judgment by committal; that the plaintiff was not precluded, by having obtained the warrant of delivery or by not having distrained thereunder, from applying for an order of committal; and that it was not a condition precedent to the making of an order for delivery up of a chattel that the value of the chattel should have been assessed.

Appeal by the defendant from an order of Judge Allen, sitting at the Mansfield County Court.

The plaintiff brought an action of detinue in the Mansfield County Court, alleging that the defendant had detained a certain running dog named "Floss," the property of the plaintiff, and claimed the return of the dog or £40, its value, and £10 for its detention.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff, and was drawn up in the following form: "Upon the trial of this action at this court, holden this day, it is adjudged that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant the following goods and chattels of the plaintiff wrongfully detained by the defendant—that is to say, the plaintiff's running dog, 'Floss,' and also costs to be taxed on scale B. And it is ordered that the defendant do return the said dog to the plaintiff within seven days from that date, and that in default of his so doing a warrant of delivery do issue."

The defendant failed to deliver up the dog within seven days, and a warrant of delivery in the usual form was issued, requiring the bailiff to seize the dog and deliver it up to the plaintiff, and if he should be unable to find the dog within the district of the court he was ordered "to distrain all the lands and chattels of the defendant, wheresoever they may be found within the district of this court, and them hold until the defendant shall deliver the said goods to you, and to make return of what you have done under this warrant immediately upon the execution thereof." This order was served on the defendant, who failed to deliver up the dog as required, but the bailiff did not distrain the defendant's goods.

An application was then made to the county court judge to commit the defendant for refusing to obey the order of the court to deliver up possession of the dog, and the county court judge, being satisfied that the defendant had been in a position to obey the order, and had wilfully refused to do so, made an order of committal, but directed the warrant to remain in court for seven days, and if in the meantime notice of appeal was given, and the dog was placed in neutral custody to the satisfaction of the registrar, the warrant was to be suspended during the appeal.

From this order the defendant appealed to the Divisional Court, on the ground that the judge had no jurisdiction to make the committal order, and that the plaintiff could only enforce his judgment by a warrant of delivery in accordance with the terms of the judgment; and that, as the warrant of delivery provided that in the event of the order being disobeyed the bailiff should distrain the defendant's lands and goods, the plaintiff was not entitled to apply for an order of committal until he had sought to enforce his judgment by the means provided by the warrant.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of considerable difficulty and great importance. I have come to the conclusion, though not without much hesitation, that we ought not to interfere with the order made by the learned county court judge. Section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, provides as follows: "Every inferior court which now has, or which may after the passing of this Act have, jurisdiction in equity, or at law and in equity, and in Admiralty respectively shall, as regards all causes of action within its jurisdiction for the time being, have power to grant, and shall grant, in any proceeding before such court, such relief, redress, or remedy, or combination of remedies, either absolute or conditional, and shall in every such proceeding give such and the like effect to every ground of defence or counterclaim, equitable or legal (subject to the provision next hereinafter contained), in as full and ample a manner as might and ought to be done in the like case by the High Court of Justice." I think it is clear that under that section a county court judge in such a case as this has, subject to the rules made for the county court, the same power to commit as a judge of the High Court. That view was taken in Martin v. Bannister, 28 W. R. 143, 4 Q B. D. 491, where it was held that a county court, under this section, has in actions within its jurisdiction power to grant an injunction against a nuisance and to enforce obedience to it by committal. I think, therefore, both statute and authority are in favour of the plaintiff. The great difficulty, however, which I feel in this case is whether the methods of enforcing the judgment provided by the warrant of delivery—namely, that if the dog were not delivered up the bailiff was to distrain the defendant's lands and goods and hold them until the defendant should deliver the dog—not having been exhausted, the county court judge had power to commit the defendant for neglecting to obey the judgment. It has been further contended by counsel for the defendant that the court has no power to make an order for delivery until proceedings have been taken to assess the value of the goods to be delivered. In my view, however, an order for delivery can be made without assessment. The order of the court was that the defendant was to deliver up the dog within seven days. The court has power not to give a defendant any option, but to order the specific chattel to be returned within a certain time, and the defendant in this case was given no alternative option. The warrant of delivery here is in the ordinary form, and is not a means of obtaining damages for the plaintiff, but of enforcing the judgment of the court. The question which arises is whether a warrant of delivery having been issued, that is the only remedy which can be put in execution in order to enforce the judgment of the court. I think it would be a very strong thing for us to hold that the fact that an order had been made by the court requiring the bailiff to distrain ties the hands of the court so as to prevent it from enforcing its judgment in any other manner. I think we must take it that the county court judge was satisfied that the defendant knew where the dog was and would not give it up, and that there was, therefore, a wilful refusal by the defendant to obey the original order of the court. That being so, I am very loth to hold that the defendant may not be committed for contempt in refusing to obey the order of the court merely because the warrant of delivery gave the bailiff authority to levy a distress. I am not prepared to limit the powers of the court merely because another remedy than commitment existed for the enforcement of its order. For these reasons I think that the decision of the county court judge was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I do not arrive at this conclusion without considerable hesitation. The court cannot be too careful in dealing with applications for committal at the instance of plaintiffs to punish defendants. There is no doubt we must take care that wilful disobedience be proved. In this case I should have felt easier if the county court judge had given his reasons for his decision. The difficulty arises in this way: The defendant in this action, in which the plaintiff got judgment, must be taken either to have put it out of his power to obey the order of the court, or, worse still, has hidden the dog and knows where she is. Is it wrong or illegal for the judge to say that disobedience to an order of the court entitles him to make an order of committal, though the original order said that unless delivery was made within seven days a warrant of delivery would follow, and a warrant was applied for and given to the bailiff who sought ineffectually to enforce it. It ought not to be said to be law that the court can be defied, and in the absence of authority to the contrary I think that where a defendant deliberately refuses to obey an order of the court, the court has power to order a committal. Because there may be a civil remedy by distress, is there any reason why the court should not be vindicated, and should not justly punish disrespect of its order duly made? The two things can perfectly well exist, though I have some doubt by reason of the absence of authority. I think, on the whole, that the county court judge was within his jurisdiction in making the order.

RIDLEY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. I only wish to add that I think the county court judge arrived at the conclusion that there had been on the part of the defendant a wilful disobedience of the order of the court, and that therefore he was acting within his jurisdiction in making the committal order.

The defendant, by leave, appealed.

Israel Davis for the defendant.

Etherington Smith, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court affirming an order of the county court judge for the committal of the defendant. The action was brought in the county court for the return of a running dog, named Floss, and judgment was obtained ordering the defendant to return the dog within seven days, there being no alternative given to pay its value instead of returning the dog. The defendant did not return the dog within seven days, and by not doing so he disobeyed the order of the court. A warrant of delivery was accordingly issued, but still the defendant did not give up the dog. Steps were then taken to give the defendent the opportunity of showing cause why he should not be committed for contempt, and evidence was given before the judge which abundantly justified him in coming to the conclusion that the defendant had wilfully refused to obey the order of the court. Thereupon the judge made a very moderate order of committal, suspending the operation of the order if within seven days an appeal was brought and the dog was placed with a neutral person to the satisfaction of the registrar. The defendant appealed, and the Divisional Court dismissed the appeal. The defendant now appeals here.

The first contention urged on his behalf is that the county court judge had no power to commit. It seems to me that the matter is fully provided for by the Judicature Act, 1873, and the County Court Rules. It is said that the power of committal is exclusively derived from the equitable jurisdiction of the county court, and that, as a court of equity would not have made an order of committal in such a case as the present, the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make the order of committal. The matter has been dealt with in section 89 of the Judicature Act, 1873, which provides that—"Every inferior court which now has, or which may after the passing of this Act have, jurisdiction in equity, or at law and in equity, and in Admiralty respectively, shall, as regards all causes of action within its jurisdiction for the time being, have power to grant, and shall grant, in any proceeding before such court such relief, redress, or remedy, or combination of remedies, either absolute or conditional, and shall in every such proceeding give such and the like effect to every ground of defence or counterclaim, equitable or legal (subject to the provision next hereinafter contained), in as full and ample a manner as might and ought to be done in the like case by the High Court of Justice." That is the enactment. Then by ord. 25, r. 57, of the County Court Rules, 1903, "Orders in the nature of an injunction, and all orders, interlocutory or otherwise, within the competence of the court, which, if the same were made in an action or matter pending in the High Court, could in such court be enforced by attachment of the person or committal may be enforced by order of the judge by warrant of attachment which shall be according to the form in the appendix." It seems to me to be perfectly clear that the High Court can now in a common law action of detinue order the defendant to deliver up the chattel specifically, and if he wilfully disobeys that order the court has power to commit him. The High Court, having jurisdiction to make that order, can enforce it by means of committal. The county court rule provides for the exercise of that jurisdiction by the county court judge. In these circumstances it is perfectly clear that the county court judge had jurisdiction to make the order of committal.

It is then said that by obtaining the warrant of delivery the plaintiff has lost his right to obtain an order of committal. The obtaining of the warrant of delivery did not, however, get rid of the defendant's obligation to hand over the dog. The judgment recovered against him was to deliver up the dog, and the issue of the warrant of delivery did not wipe out the obligation imposed upon him by that judgment. It is next said that it is a condition precedent to the making of an order for delivery of a chattel that the value of the chattel shall first be assessed. If that were ever so, it is now unnecessary under ord. 48, r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. The note in the Annual Practice under that rule correctly says that "the addition of the words 'if any' after 'value assessed' appears to make this rule applicable, whether the value of the property has been assessed or not." The case has been shortly stated by Ridley, J., in his judgment, where he says that the county court judge arrived at the conclusion that there had been on the part of the defendant a wilful disobedience of the order of the court, and therefore he was acting within his jurisdiction in making the committal order. Upon all grounds the appeal fails.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The case is governed by ord. 25, r. 57, of the County Court Rules, 1903. The first question we have to consider is whether the order of committal was within the competence of the county court judge. In my opinion it clearly was. Judgment was recovered against the defendant in an action of detinue for the delivery up of the dog within seven days. How was that judgment to be enforced? Rule 57 of order 25 says that if the order were made in an action in the High Court and could be enforced there by attachment or committal, it may be enforced in the county court by warrant of attachment. If this judgment were in the High Court, ord. 42, r. 6, provides that it could be enforced by writ of attachment. That rule provides that "a judgment for the recovery of any property other than land or money may be enforced (a) by writ for delivery of the property; (b) by writ of attachment; (c) by writ of sequestration"; and rule 7 provides that "a judgment requiring any person to do any act other than the payment of money, or to abstain from doing anything, may be enforced by writ of attachment or by committal." These two rules deal with the matter, both entitling the plaintiff to the remedy by attachment or committal. Therefore the county court judge had jurisdiction to make the order of committal. It is said that the remedies provided by ord. 42, r. 6 are not cumulative, but alternative, and that if the plaintiff first applies a warrant or writ of delivery, he cannot afterwards apply for a writ of attachment. I do not agree. The remedies are cumulative and not alternative.

Local government — Sewer — Drain — "Single private drain" — Houses belonging to different owners — Nuisance—Apportionment of expenses—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 41—Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 19.

A pipe, which was laid in private property, received the drainage of several houses belonging to different owners, and was then connected with a public sewer. A nuisance having arisen in the pipe, the local authority gave notice in writing to the owner of the premises where the nuisance existed to remedy the same, and, the owner having made default in complying with the notice, the local authority did the work and sued the owner to recover the expenses.

Held, first, that the pipe was a "single private drain" within section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, and that therefore the local authority were entitled to require the owner of the premises to abate the nuisance under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875; and, secondly, that as the nuisance existed on the premises of one owner only, no question of apportionment arose, and the owner was liable to pay the whole of the expenses.

THOMPSON v. MAYOR, &c., OF ECCLES

Appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Darling and Channell, JJ.) upon a case stated by justices (reported in [1904] 2 K. B. 1).

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Eccles a complaint was preferred by the corporation of the borough of Eccles under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, against Thomas Thompson, for that on the 16th of March, 1903, a notice was served upon him requiring him to abate a nuisance on certain premises situate at 428, Liverpool-road, in the said borough, and that he had made default in complying with the requisitions thereof. The notice required Thompson within fourteen days from the service to take up the existing defective yard and cellar drains and gullies and tops, and in lieu thereof to provide and lay down efficient drains constructed of glazed and socketed stoneware pipes, the joints to be properly made good with cement, the cellar drain to be embedded in concrete to a thickness of six inches all round the pipes, and to provide efficient wash-out gullies with lipped tops.

The facts were as follows: Thompson was the owner of a block of seven houses, numbered 426 to 438, Liverpool-road, of which the house the subject of the complaint was one. The houses were built in 1875 in accordance with plans deposited with the then sanitary authority, the predecessors of the corporation, and approved by them on the 4th of March, 1875. Adjacent to the said block on the same side of Liverpool-road, and only separated therefrom by a private passage giving access to the backs of the said houses, were twelve houses belonging to one Johnson, divided into two blocks of six houses each by a private passage giving access to the backs of the said houses. On the 6th of March, 1903, a complaint was made that a certain drain or sewer belonging to 428, Liverpool-road was a nuisance and injurious to health. On examination the drain or sewer was found to be in bad condition and to require alteration or amendment, and the corporation served upon Thompson the notice of the 16th of March, 1903, requiring him to execute the works above set out. The works specified therein were necessary for the purpose of abating the nuisance. The notice was not complied with.

The said drain or sewer was part of a nine-inch drain or sewer running through and under the cellars of the said seven houses belonging to Thompson, and receiving the drainage of each house before falling into the corporation's main sewer in Hampson-street. This nine-inch drain or sewer was a continuation of and received the drainage from a six-inch drain or sewer passing through and under the cellars of the said two blocks of houses belonging to Johnson, and receiving the drainage from each of the said twelve houses before reaching the nine-inch drain or sewer. The whole of the six-inch and nine-inch drain was laid through private property until it reached the public sewer in Hampson-street. It was admitted by the corporation that the notice required Thompson to make structural alterations in the drain or sewer.

It was contended for Thompson that as the drain received the drainage of more than one building, not within the same curtilage, belonging to the same owner, it became a sewer under the provisions of sections 4 and 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and was vested in the corporation, whose duty it was to repair, cleanse, and keep it so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and that the said drain was not a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890.

It was contended for the corporation that the drain or sewer at the place where the nuisance occurred was a single private drain to which section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, applied.

The justices found that the drain was used by two or more houses belonging to different owners, and that the drain was a single private drain within the meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1890, and they made an order upon Thompson to abate the nuisance and to do the necessary works within twenty-eight days.

Thompson appealed, and the Divisional Court reversed the decision of the justices, and held that the drain was not a single private drain within section 19 of the Act of 1890, but was a sewer.

HÆDICKE v. FRIERN BARNET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

Appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., at the trial of an action without a jury (reported in [1904] 2 K. B. 807)

The action was brought by the plaintiff, a married woman, to recover from the defendants £73, money expended by her at their request in repairing a sewage pipe at the rear of the houses Nos. 3, 5, 7, and 9, Friern Barnet-road, New Southgate. The defendants pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from them the sum claimed or any part thereof on the ground that the expenses were incurred by the plaintiff in abating a nuisance arising from a defective drain on the plaintiff's premises for the repair of which the plaintiff was liable.

The following statement of facts is taken from the written judgment of Channell, J., in the court below: The plaintiff was the owner of the four houses in question, which were built many years ago. The houses were drained by ordinary house drains into a nine-inch pipe, which was laid through the back gardens of these and other houses, about sixteen in number. The nine-inch pipe, when first laid, communicated with a similar pipe behind other houses, between thirty and forty in number, and both parts of the pipe were entirely on private ground, and the outfall was into a ditch or cesspool—it did not clearly appear which. In 1888 the defendants or their predecessors constructed a sewer in the roadway, and they then made a communication from the nine-inch pipe into that sewer, so diverting the drainage of the sixteen houses through the nine-inch pipe into the sewer. The nine-inch pipe in the neighbourhood of one of the plaintiff's houses about January, 1903, became obstructed, and a nuisance was caused, of which the occupier complained to the defendant council, and after some correspondence and the service of two notices, which need not be further referred to, the district council served on the plaintiff a notice dated on the 24th of February, 1903, stating that the council were satisfied of the existence of a nuisance at 5, 7, and 9, Friern Barnet-road (being three of the four houses owned by the plaintiff), and requiring her in three days to abate the same, and for that purpose to relay the drains in the rear of the houses in a certain way. The notice was the ordinary notice for abatement of a nuisance. The plaintiff's husband, who managed her property, replied by a letter of the 25th of February, stating that the notice related to a drain, "which is a combined drain or sewer." The clerk to the council replied by letter of the 27th of February that "the drains in question are repairable by the owner and not by the local authority, and that the notice should be complied with without further delay." The plaintiff's husband replied by a letter dated the 28th of February, in which he said that he would "in self-defence do the repairs to the drainage, and enforce payment in a court of law." The plaintiff proceeded to do all the work which required to be done to the satisfaction of the district council, and then brought this action.

At the trial Channell, J., was of opinion—notwithstanding the decision of the Divisional Court, of which he was a member, in the above case of Thompson v. Mayor, &c., of Eccles—that the case was governed by the decision in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, 45 W. R. 31, [1896], 2 Q. B. 205, and that therefore the drain now in question was "a single private drain" within section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, so as to entitle the local authority to serve notice upon the owners of the houses under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to do the necessary works to remedy a nuisance existing therein. He held, however, that the apportionment by the surveyor of the expenses of abating the nuisance among the different owners was a condition precedent to the liability of the plaintiff to repay any portion of these expenses, and that not having served notices on all the owners and not having apportioned the expenses, the defendants had failed to comply with the requirements of section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 19 of the Act of 1890. He held, therefore, that no portion of the expenses was payable by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was entitled in this action to recover from the defendants the amount of the expenses.

COLLINS, M.R.—These are appeals in two cases, and substantially the same point is raised in each, though a further point is raised in the second case. With reference to the first appeal, it raises the question as to the effect of section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, and how far it extends in altering the former state of the law. By sub-section 1 of that section, "Where two or more houses belonging to different owners are connected with a public sewer by a single private drain, an application may be made under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875 (relating to complaints as to nuisances from drains), and the local authority may recover any expenses incurred by them in executing any works under the powers conferred on them by that section from the owners of the houses in such shares and proportions as shall be settled by their surveyor or (in case of dispute) by a court of summary jurisdiction." By sub-section 3, "For the purposes of this section the expression 'drain' includes a drain used for the drainage of more than one building." Up to that time a pipe used for the drainage of more than one building was a sewer and not a drain. But by sub-section 3, for the purposes of that section only, the expression drain is to include a drain used for the drainage of more than one building. That new definition of drain being introduced, the section applies section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides that "on the written application of any person to a local authority stating that any drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool, on or belonging to any premises within their district is a nuisance or injurious to health (but not otherwise) the local authority may, by writing, empower their surveyor or inspector of nuisances, after twenty-four hours' written notice to the occupier of such premises, or in case of emergency without notice, to enter such premises, with or without assistants, and cause the ground to be opened, and examine such drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool. If the drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool on examination is found to be in proper condition, he shall cause the ground to be closed. . . . If the drain, water-closet, earth-closet, privy, ashpit, or cesspool on examination appear to be in bad condition, or to require alteration or amendment, the local authority shall forthwith cause notice in writing to be given to the owner or occupier of the premises, requiring him forthwith or within a reasonable time therein specified to do the necessary works; and if such notice is not complied with, the person to whom it is given shall be liable to a penalty . . . and the local authority may, if they think fit, execute such works, and may recover in a summary manner from the owner the expenses incurred by them in so doing . . ." The word "drain" in that section means a drain in the old sense as one used for the drainage of one building only. In the present case the head-note of the report in the Divisional Court (1904, 2 K. B. 1) is, so far as material, as follows: "Where two or more houses are drained by a single pipe, neither the fact that the pipe is wholly situate on private land nor the fact that the houses belong to different owners will suffice to make the pipe a 'single private drain' within the meaning of section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, so as to entitle the local authority, in the event of the pipe becoming a nuisance, to require the owner or occupier of the premises to amend it under section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875." The drain in question in the present case is used for the drainage of two or more houses belonging to different owners, and is indistinguishable in its character from the drain in many of the cases referred to in the course of the argument, and notably in the case of Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne. The question as to the true meaning of section 19 of the Act of 1890, and especially the meaning of the words "single private drain" has been the subject of discussion in several cases. Upon examining those cases there seems to be a clear balance of authority in favour of the appellant corporation. It is not necessary to travel through all those cases again, because I cannot improve upon the reasons so fully given by the late Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, J., in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne. That decision has been followed more than once. It lays down a reasonable and intelligible interpretation of the section. The first case which it is necessary to mention is Self v. Hove Commissioners, which was a decision of Wills and Wright, JJ., in 1895, and the interpretation of the section which was there laid down was subsequently adopted in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne. In my opinion, upon the facts in the present case, the pipe here is not distinguishable from what was held in that case to be a "single private drain" within section 19 of the Act of 1890. There is another later case in 1895—Hill v. Hair, where Cave and Lawrance, JJ., took a view that was contrary to that taken in Self v. Hove Commissioners. In Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, decided a year later, Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., and Wills, J., in very elaborate judgments, adopted the view taken in Self v. Hove Commissioners in preference to the view taken in Hill v. Hair, and held that a pipe which was indistinguishable from the pipe in the present case was a single private drain within section 19 of the Act of 1890, the result being that the combined effect of section 41 of the Act of 1875 and section 19 of the Act of 1890 imposed the obligation upon the owners of the houses, at the instance of the local authority, to repair the pipe so as to do away with a nuisance arising therefrom. The same question came again before a Divisional Court, consisting of Cave and Ridley, JJ., in Seal v. Merthyr Tydfil Urban District Council, and the court followed Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, Cave, J., receding from his earlier opinion. Such was the state of the law when the present case of Thompson v. Mayor, &c., of Eccles came before the Divisional Court. Upon the argument there Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne was cited, but it was not referred to in detail, and we have the authority of Channell, J., for saying that that case was not fully considered when judgment was given in the present case. In the subsequent case of Hœdicke v. Friern Barnet Urban District Council Channell, J., having carefully considered the Eastbourne case, followed it. The balance of authority is therefore entirely in favour of the view taken by the Divisional Court in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, as to the combined effect of section 41 of the Act of 1875 and section 19 of the Act of 1890, and as we have had a full opportunity of considering the arguments and reasoning in that case, it would be a waste of time if I were to state over again that reasoning and why I agree with it. For the reasons there given the appeal in the first case must succeed.

With reference to the second case, Hœdicke v. Friern Barnet Urban District Council, the drain is indistinguishable from the drain with which I have been dealing in the first case. There is, however, a further point taken in this case, which might have been, but was not taken in the first case. The plaintiff was called upon by the local authority to abate a nuisance existing in a drain within the definition in section 19 of the Act of 1890. The plaintiff did the work, and brought this action to recover the amount so expended by her from the local authority upon the ground that she had been compelled to do work which they were legally compellable to do, the plaintiff contending that the drain where the nuisance existed was a sewer. The answer of the local authority was that, though before the Act of 1890 the pipe would have been a sewer repairable by the local authority, and though it might still be for other purposes a sewer, by section 19 it is now a single private drain, and by the combined effect of section 41 of the Act of 1875 and section 19 of the Act of 1890 the plaintiff must do the work. Upon the question whether the pipe comes within section 19, the case, as I have said, is governed by the decision in the first of these two appeals. Conceding that, the further contention, however, is put forward that, assuming that the pipe is a single private drain within the section as between her and the local authority, the latter have not taken the proper steps to render her liable, and as they cannot localize the cause of the mischief as arising entirely on her premises, they cannot say that she, and she alone, is liable under the sections to make good the defect; and that, as they have not apportioned the expense among the other owners, they have not taken the necessary steps for insisting upon her liability, and that therefore the burden of repairing the defect remains still upon the local authority. The answer to that contention is simple. Broadly speaking, the Legislature has thrown back upon the private owner what had been placed upon the local authority—namely, the remedying of a nuisance existing in a single private drain as specified in section 19 of the Act of 1890. That being so, the obligation of making good the defect in the drain is upon the plaintiff, and she is debarred from saying that any work done by her has been done in relief of the local authority. The Legislature has laid the burden on her and not on the local authority, and therefore she cannot say that the burden is on the local authority by reason of their not having taken steps to place that burden on her. It is then said that section 19 of the Act of 1890, which introduces machinery applicable to a drain, cannot be applied to what was done upon something which is not within the control of one particular owner—namely, a sewer which is on the premises of several owners. It is said that the nuisance must be taken as arising out of all the premises. But the facts here show that the nuisance was ascertained by the local authority as arising on the plaintiff's premises, who is the owner of more than one of the houses. It was proved that the nuisance was abated by her without travelling out of her own premises. Therefore upon the facts here the plaintiff cannot say that the nuisance was not upon her property. The nuisance was one which could be and was reached by the procedure of the two sections. No question of apportionment, therefore, arises, even if it be ad rem at all, as the whole obligation was on the plaintiff. The appeal in this case must also be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is a difficult one—namely, what is the meaning of "single private drain" in section 19 of the Act of 1890. That question was considered by the Divisional Court in 1896 in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, and the interpretation of those words was laid down in most admirable judgments, and that decision has been followed from that time until the decision of the Divisional Court in the present case. I have carefully considered the reasons given by Channell, J., in his judgment in the second case under appeal, where that learned judge, though he followed the decision in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, states his own personal opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court in the first case under appeal is to be preferred. I do not think that those reasons are of such weight that they ought to induce us to depart from the decision in Bradford v. Mayor, &c., of Eastbourne, and in my opinion that decision should be followed in the first case under appeal.

With reference to the second case, the decision in the first case applies to it as well. But there is another question raised, which is also a question as to the construction of section 19 of the Act of 1890. In terms that section does not say how the application is to be dealt with. It is suggested that the meaning of the two portions of sub-section 1 of that section is that, in every case upon an application being made under the Act as therein provided, the local authority may execute the necessary works and, if they do so, they can only recover the expenses from the owners of the houses in such proportions as may be settled by their surveyor. I do not think that that is the true meaning of the section. In my opinion the true meaning is that, upon such an application being made, the procedure of section 41 of the Public Health Act, 1875, is to be followed, and there are given to the local authority by section 19 additional powers of recovering the expenses in apportioned parts from the several owners of the houses. The procedure under section 41 of the Act of 1875 is as follows: The local authority, upon a complaint being made to them, after giving notice to the occupier of the premises, may empower their officer to enter upon the premises and open up the ground and examine the drain for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of the nuisance. If the drain is found to be in good condition, the ground is to be closed up. If it is found to be in bad condition, the local authority are to give notice to the owner or occupier to do the necessary works. If the notice is not complied with, the person served is made liable to a penalty, and the local authority may execute the works, and recover the expenses thereof from the owner in a summary manner. That is the procedure under section 41. That section applies only to a drain used for the drainage of one house only. Section 19 of the Act of 1890 extends it to a drain used for the drainage of more than one building, where the houses belong to different owners. What is the proper course for the local authority to adopt in such a case? It seems to me that when an application is made to them under the section, their duty is to go upon the premises and make the necessary examination. Upon making such examination they may discover that the nuisance does not exist solely, or at all, upon those premises, and they may trace it to other premises. In that case the local authority will have to pursue their inquiries further, and give notice to the owner of those other premises. It may, however, turn out upon examination that only one owner is affected, and that works confined to the property of that particular owner will remedy the nuisance. In this latter case I do not think that sections 41 and 19 of the Acts impose upon the local authority any duty of serving notices upon the owners of all the premises. It is enough if the owner of the premises where the defect was found is served. If that be so, the contention that the local authority have not observed the proper procedure in the second case falls to the ground. If the defect exists on the premises of more than one owner it may be necessary to serve more than one. But if the defect exists on the premises of only one, then only one need be served, and the whole of the expenses of remedying that defect may be recovered from the owner of those premises, and it becomes unnecessary to invoke the last clause of section 19, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1890. In the present case the defect existed only on the premises of the plaintiff, and therefore the ground upon which Channell, J., decided in her favour cannot be supported.

In re OLIVER'S SETTLEMENT.
EVERED v. LEIGH. (a.)

Will—Appointment—Power—Perpetuity—Election.

Where the limitations in a will are illegal and void for perpetuity they cannot be used to raise a case of election. The fact that the limitations also exceed the limits of the power is immaterial. The court is bound on finding illegality to refuse to assist in carrying it out.

In re Bradshaw, [1902] 1 Ch. 436, 50 W. R. Dig. 138, not followed.

Originating summons.

This was an originating summons by Charles Evered, the sole trustee of a settlement dated the 24th of May, 1831, made on the marriage of John Oliver and Sarah Oliver, and also one of the trustees of the will of John Oliver, dated the 10th of September, 1886, for the determination of the following amongst other questions: Whether the appointments made by a deed-poll of the 12th of February, 1880, executed by John Oliver and Sarah Oliver, of property subject to the trusts of the said settlement were revoked by the will of John Oliver, and if the appointments made by the deed-poll were wholly or partially revoked by the said will, whether the appointments made by the will of the said property are valid, and whether any case of election arises under the said will?

John Oliver survived his wife and by his will appointed shares of the settled property to his three daughters for life with remainder to their children, and gave property of his own to the same daughters.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The testator in this case has exercised a limited power of appointment vested in him in such a way as to contravene the rule against perpetuities, and has by the same instrument given to the persons entitled in default of appointment benefits out of his own property. The question for my determination is—Does this raise a case of election? I reserved my judgment because there is a conflict of authorities on the subject by reason of Kekewich, J.'s, recent decision in In re Bradshaw, [1902] 1 Ch. 436, 50 W. R. Dig. 138. I propose first to consider the question on principle and then to examine the authorities. The rule against perpetuities is a comparatively modern development of the ancient rule of English law that one of the inseparable incidents of property is the right of alienation by appropriate assurances. The rule is one of public policy, and it has always been considered to be the duty of all the courts to uphold it, not to assist in evading it, and accordingly the maxim "Quodcunque prohibetur fieri ex directo, prohibetur et per obliquum" has on many occasions been applied so as to give full effect to it. It is sufficient to refer to the well-known case of Spencer v. Duke of Marlborough, 1 Ed. 404, 3 Bro. P. C. 232, where Lord Loughborough, and the judges who advised the House of Lords, and the Lords were unanimous in applying it. The testator in that case attempted to evade the rule by creating an estate tail with powers in trustees to revoke the uses from time to time as tenants in tail were born, and resettle so as to make such tenants in tail tenants for life with remainders in tail, and a bill was filed for the execution of the trusts of the will; it was unsuccessfully argued that, though estates could not be directly limited to the extent desired, yet that the Court of Chancery, "which professes to regard the intent of testators, would allow it to be done arte vel ingenio et per obliquum."

The doctrine of election is a rule of equity by virtue of which the court of equity compels a recipient of the testator's bounty to conform to all the legal provisions of the will. It is somewhat startling that this court should be asked to extend it to illegal provisions, and to apply its doctrines for the purpose of enabling a testator to evade a rule of law founded on public policy. Lord Northington, in 1 Ed., at p. 417, puts it somewhat strongly. After referring to the various attempts that had been made at law to evade the rule against perpetuity, he says: "It seems to me most surprising, after these puerile attempts had been made upon the narrow, fettered, and technical reasonings of courts of law, and been rejected by them and exploded with contempt and derision, that it could ever have entered into the head of man to think that he could subvert the fundamental principles of property by the aid of this court." And the Master of the Rolls, in Mainwaring v. Baxter, 5 Ves. 458, where another attempt at evading the rule against perpetuities was made, said that he adopted Lord Northington's words. Kekewich, J., has said, and it is the basis of his judgment, that it is immaterial whether the appointment fails because it offends some rule of law, or because it offends the construction of the power. With all deference to him, the difference appears to me to be vital. In the one case the testator openly and avowedly breaks the general law, and asks the Court of Equity to participate in his illegal act by giving effect to it; in the other he merely attempts to exceed the limits set to his power by the donor thereof in the particular case, limits which the donor might have extended without any breach of general law. Thus, limitations which infringe the rule against perpetuity are void on the face of the will, but a devise of Blackacre by a testator who has no interest therein is not illegal nor is it void on the face of the will, but depends on an inquiry into the testator's title. In considering a will this court has first to construe the words and then to apply to them such rules of general law (e.g., the rule against perpetuity or the Thellusson Act) as may be appropriate: Pearks v. Mosely, 29 W. R. 1, 5 A. C. 714. If it thereupon appears that there is any infringement of such rules, the court is bound to refuse to allow its process to be used to carry out such illegality, and that, too, whether any of the parties to the litigation raise the objection or not: Evans v. Richardson, 3 Mer. 469. How is this compatible with the order that I am asked to make here, by which I should first declare the appointment illegal and void for perpetuity and then give practical effect to it by putting in force the equitable doctrine of election? There is certainly no novelty in the statement that this court will refuse to aid a testator to commit any breach of the law. Lord Hardwicke explains the refusal of the court to marshal assets in favour of a charity by saying that he "was not warranted to set up a rule of equity contrary to the common rules of the court merely to support a bequest which was contrary to law": Mogg v. Hodges, 2 Ves. sen. 52. Other instances will be found referred to in Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.), p. 1114. I have gone into this more fully than I should have otherwise thought necessary out of deference to Kekewich, J.'s, judgment, the whole foundation of which is that it is immaterial whether the appointment fails for illegality or merely on a point of construction, and I can only say that on principle I am wholly unable to agree with him.

But when I come to the authorities on the particular point before me, it appears to me that there is an overwhelming concurrence of judicial opinion against Kekewich, J.'s, view. The first case is Wollaston v. King, 8 Eq. 165, before James, V.C. It is said that the Vice-Chancellor's statement is only a dictum. I doubt if it is so; it seems to me to be one of several reasons for his judgment. He says: "It is also material that the reason why the gift fails is that there was an attempt to create a power in violation of the rules of law. I apprehend that it is not for this court to aid such an attempt either by the application of the doctrine of election or otherwise." But if it be a dictum only, it comes from a great judge, and I desire to adopt it as in my opinion a correct statement. The next case is In re Warren, 32 W. R. 641, 26 Ch. D. 208, which is an express decision of Pearson, J., exactly in point. It is said that it was not argued, but I cannot regard the decision as of less weight, because the judge obviously thought the point unarguable, and I am not aware that the decision has ever before been doubted. But the case does not rest there, for the point has recently been before a strong Court of Appeal in Ireland in In re Handcock, 23 L. R. Ir. 34, and they unanimously approved In re Warren and Wollaston v. King. Their decision is not, of course, binding on the English courts, but I cannot help feeling more confidence in the decision at which I have arrived when I find it shared by Lord Ashbourne and Fitzgibbon, Naish, and Barry, L.JJ., and similar reasons given. These reasons may be summarized from pages 47 and 48 of the report thus—that the court refused to infringe on the rule against perpetuity, a rule introduced on grounds of public policy, or to aid in tying up trust property for a period beyond legal limits. They would not allow the court to be the medium of carrying out an appointment of the settled fund in violation of the rule against perpetuity.

I therefore decline to follow In re Bradshaw, and I declare the limitations in this will, being illegal and void for perpetuity, cannot be used to raise any case of election in this court. It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to add that the fact that the limitations also exceed the limits of the power is immaterial. The court is bound on finding illegality to refuse to assist in carrying it out.

In re BEALE'S SETTLEMENT. (a.)

Will—Appointment under power—Perpetuity—Doctrine of election.

The doctrine of election, that a person cannot take property against an instrument and at the same time claim other property under the instrument, does not apply to a case where the claimant takes property in default of an appointment in consequence of the appointment actually made being void for transgressing the rule against perpetuities; and in such a case the claimant can take not only that property but also other property given to him by the instrument purporting to make the appointment, without making compensation.

(a.) Reported by NEVILLE TEBBUTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Originating summons.

This was an application by the trustees of a marriage settlement for the determination (among others) of the question whether persons who took part of the settled fund in consequence of an appointment made by will under the settlement being void for perpetuity were put to their election as to taking other property under the same will.

By a settlement made upon the marriage of John Beales and Frances Beales (then Frances Day) in 1833 certain funds were settled upon such trusts (after life estates to husband and wife) for the children of the marriage, and their issue, born in the lifetime of John Beales and Frances Beales or the survivor of them, as the survivor of them should by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment, for the children of the marriage in equal shares at twenty-one as to sons, and twenty-one or marriage as to daughters. There was no hotchpot clause.

There were three children of the marriage, all of whom attained twenty-one—John Day Beales, Frances Elizabeth Beales, who married Mr. Youngs, and Gertrude Lloyd Beales, who married Mr. Cummings.

Mrs. Beales survived her husband, John Beales, and died in 1880.

By her will, dated the 8th of May, 1869, Mrs. Beales exercised the power of appointment given by the settlement by appointing the fund to her trustees upon trusts for conversion, and she at the same time bequeathed her own estates to the trustees upon the same trusts for conversion. She directed her trustees to stand possessed of the produce of the conversion upon trust to divide the same into three equal parts, as to one part for John Day Beales, as to one for Mrs. Youngs for her life, and after her death for her children attaining twenty-one or (if daughters) marrying, and as to the remaining part upon similar trusts for Mrs. Cummings and her children.

It was admitted that as to the children of the daughters, the appointment, not being limited to such as were born in the lifetime of Mrs. Beales, was void as offending against the rule as to perpetuities. Mrs. Young had several children, all of whom were born in the lifetime of Mrs. Beales, their grandmother. Mrs. Cummings also had children.

The trustees of the settlement had paid to John Day Beales his share of the trust fund, and had retained the shares of Mrs. Youngs and Mrs. Cummings.

Mrs. Youngs died in August, 1904. J. H. D. Beales, the executor of the executrix of John Day Beales, who had died, claimed that, as the trust for appointment could not take effect, he was entitled to one third of the share of Mrs. Youngs of the settled fund under the trust in the settlement in default of her appointment, and that he could at the same time retain the share of John Day Beales of the free disposable property of his mother, Mrs. Beales, bequeathed to them by her in the same will which contained the void appointment, without making any compensation to the objects of that appointment.

The trustees of the settlement took out this summons for the determination of that question (among others), both as regards his share and also that of his sisters.

Rolt, for the trustees of the settlement.

Blakesley, for the children of Mrs. Youngs.—I admit that the appointment upon the death of Mrs. Youngs to her children is void, and that the fund goes to the children of Mrs. Beales in default of appointment, but I submit they cannot take any part of the fund without making compensation to the children of Mrs. Youngs, in whose favour the void appointment was made, out of the free disposable property bequeathed to them by Mrs. Beales. A case of election arises, and they cannot take at once against and under the will. It is true there is a conflict of authority upon the question, but I rely on the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Bradshaw, [1902] 1 Ch. 436, as preferable to that of Farwell, J., in In re Oliver's Settlement, ante, p. 215. Moreover, in this case the appointment was made to persons some of whom might be outside the power altogether, which was limited to the children of Mrs. Youngs born in the lifetime of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Beales. It is therefore governed by In re Brooksbank, Beauclerk v. James, 35 W. R. 101, 34 Ch. D. 160, and is distinguishable from In re Oliver's Settlement. [WARRINGTON, J., referred to In re Handcock's Trusts, 23 L. R. Ir. 34.]

Colquhoun Dill, for the children of Mrs. Beales.—I rely on the decision of Farwell, J., in In re Oliver's Setttement, following Wollaston v. King, 17 W. R. 641, L. R. 8 Eq., 165, and In re Warren's Trusts, 32 W. R. 641, 26 Ch. D. 208.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 3.—WARRINGTON, J.—It is admitted that the trust for the children of Mrs. Youngs is too remote, and that her share goes, in default of appointment, in thirds between the legal personal representative of John Day Beales and Mrs. Youngs and the defendant Mrs. Cummings; but it is said that the legal personal representative of John Day Beales is put to election between his interests in default of appointment and his share in the testatrix's own estate. The case is covered by authority, but unfortunately the authorities are conflicting. In favour of the proposition that in a case where an appointment fails for remoteness, as distinguished from one in which it fails as being in favour of persons not objects of the power, a case of election is not raised, there are the following authorities: Wollaston v. King, In re Warren's Trusts, In re Handcock's Trusts, and In re Oliver's Settlement. In Wollaston v. King it is said the passage relied upon is a mere dictum (see p. 175); it is, however, contained in a considered judgment, and may be taken to express the deliberate opinion of the very learned judge, James, V.C. In re Warren's Trusts was a decision of Pearson, J., and In re Handcock was a decision of the Irish Court of Appeal. Finally, in In re Oliver's Settlement, Farwell, J., reviewed all those authorities and some earlier ones, and came to the conclusion that they should be followed rather than the decision of Kekewich, J., in In re Bradshaw. The latter case is the only authority on the other side, and it is undoubtedly a deliberate decision of that learned judge after consideration of the several authorities other than In re Oliver's Settlement. In this state of things, all I can do is to say that in my view the balance of authority is against raising a case of election, and I so hold accordingly.

An attempt was made to distinguish this case on the ground that the appointment fails as extending to persons not objects of the power. But to ascertain whether an appointment fails on this ground the court looks at the actual facts, and not, as in the case of the rule against perpetuities, to possible facts: Harvey v. Stracey, 1 Dr. 73, 117. In the present case, on the actual facts, no person not an object is included; therefore, the distinction does not exist. I declare that the share of Mrs. Youngs in the funds comprised in the settlement ought to be treated as unappointed, and that the three children can claim such share without making compensation out of their interests under the will.

BOW v. HART. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Trade-mark—Injunction to restrain infringement—Title to a franchise—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 56—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 75, 76, 90, 117—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), s. 18.

A county court has jurisdiction to try an action for infringement of a registered trade-mark, notwithstanding the fact that the validity of the trade-mark is in dispute. A trade-mark is not a "franchise" within the meaning of the proviso in section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a decision by Sir W. L. Selfe, judge of the Rochester County Court.

The question raised was whether the county court has jurisdiction to entertain an action for an alleged infringement of a registered trade-mark.

The plaintiff brought an action in respect of an alleged infringement by the defendant of his, the plaintiff's, trade-mark "Freedom," registered on the 4th of July, 1902, and he claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from infringing the trade-mark and also an account or damages.

The defendant gave notice that at the hearing he would object to the jurisdiction of the county court to try the plaintiff's claim, and also that he intended to contest the validity of the plaintiff's trade-mark and to apply to the High Court to have it expunged from the register of trade-marks.

At the hearing the objection as to jurisdiction was duly taken, but the learned judge decided to hear the evidence but declined to give any judgment and made the following order: "It appearing that the defence to this action puts in issue the question of the plaintiff's right to the exclusive use of his registered trade-mark and his right to have such trade-mark continued on the register, which is a question which this court has no jurisdiction to decide, I do not think fit to make any order in this action."

From this order the plaintiff now appealed.

Spokes, for the appellant.—By section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, jurisdiction is given to the county courts in all personal actions where the claim does not exceed £50, provided that "the court shall not have cognizance of any action of ejectment, or in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or to any toll, fair, market, or franchise, shall be in question, or for any libel or slander, or for seduction, or breach of promise of marriage." "Franchise" is the only exception in that proviso that could possibly apply to the present case; but a trade-mark is not a "franchise." Lord Esher, M.R., in Reg. v. Halifax County Court Judge, [1891] 2 Q. B. 263, says: "The term 'franchise' in the County Courts Act, 1888, includes a privilege granted by the Crown in respect of its prerogative." A trade-mark cannot be so defined. Section 56 clearly shows that the county court judge had jurisdiction to grant the injunction the plaintiff asked for.

Beddall, for the respondent.—A trade-mark is a "franchise" within the meaning of section 56, and therefore the county court judge has no jurisdiction to entertain the action. In principle there is no difference between a trade-mark and letters patent, except that the former is granted by the Legislature and the latter by the Crown. Reg. v. Halifax County Court Judge decided that the grant of letters patent is a franchise within the meaning of the proviso in section 56. "Court" in section 117 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, means the High Court equally whether the subject of dispute is the title to a trade-mark or to a patent.

Spokes replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The point raised in this case is one of considerable importance and difficulty, and I am anxious that the conclusion at which I have arrived—namely, that the county court has jurisdiction, should be reviewed in the Court of Appeal. I think the decision of the county court judge was wrong, because it seems to me that if the statute gives him jurisdiction over this action the question raised by the defence cannot take it away.

This action was brought in respect of an alleged infringement of a registered trade-mark, and the defendant by way of defence gave notice that he intended to contest the validity of the plaintiff's trade-mark, and to apply to a judge of the High Court to have it expunged from the register. Under these circumstances the question which arises is whether the county court judge had jurisdiction. Section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, confers jurisdiction on the county court in "all personal actions where the debt, demand, or damage claimed is not more than fifty pounds," but it goes on to provide that the court shall not have cognizance of, inter alia, any action in which the title to any franchise shall be in question. During the argument I inquired whether there exists any authority upon the question whether a registered trade-mark is a "franchise" within the meaning of section 56, but counsel were unable to cite any such authority. I have never heard it contended that a trade-mark is a franchise, and, looking at the grounds of the decision in Reg v. Halifax County Court Judge, I think that case is certainly not an authority to that effect. The right to the exclusive use of a trade-mark is a right based upon property, and the right to the registration of that trade-mark is a right conferred by statute; it is not based upon any question of grant from the Crown, and therefore it is not analogous in its nature to a franchise. We cannot, therefore, hold that the jurisdiction of the county court is excluded on the ground that a trade-mark falls within the meaning of the term "franchise."

Then we come to the second point, which gives rise to considerable difficulty—namely, that it has been held in Reg. v. Halifax County Court Judge that actions for an infringement of a patent, where the validity of the patent was contested, could not be brought in a county court, because, as Lopes, L.J., in his judgment points out, the Patents Act, 1883, "provides special machinery for the trial of patent actions, only applicable to a trial in the High Court, and by section 117 interprets the expression court as used by the Act to mean the High Court." That, of course, is independent of the view the learned judges in that case took, that the grant of letters patent is a franchise within the meaning of the proviso in section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The difficulty that I experience arises from the wording of section 18 of the Patents Act, 1888, which is in terms the same as section 31 of the Patents Act, 1883, and is to be read with that Act.

Section 18 provides that "in an action for infringement of a registered trade-mark the court or a judge may certify that the right to the exclusive use of the trade-mark came in question, and if the court or a judge so certifies, then in any subsequent action for infringement the plaintiff in that action, on obtaining a final order or judgment in his favour, shall have his full costs, charges, and expenses as between solicitor and client, unless the court or judge trying the subsequent action certifies that he ought not to have the same." I confess I have had some doubt as to whether or not the language of this section is not almost enough to show that the special machinery for dealing with questions of infringement of trade-mark might exclude the jurisdiction of the county court, but on the whole I do not think the language is strong enough for me so to hold. I do not think we need attach much weight to the contention that section 18 is merely optional, and that the plaintiff could waive his right thereunder or not ask for it, because that would amount to giving jurisdiction by consent. I do, however, recognize the force of the objection that there might be a decision in the county court with reference to a trade-mark in favour of one of the parties and a decision in favour of the other party in proceedings taken in the High Court under section 90 of the Act of 1883 to expunge or vary the entry in the register, a power which is confined to the High Court. It has not been contended that the county court has any jurisdiction under that section to expunge or vary the entry, nor that the county court can give a certificate as to exclusive use under section 18 of the Patents Act of 1888.

In my opinion section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not exclude trade-mark actions from the jurisdiction of the county court. I do not think the arguments in Reg. v. Halifax County Court Judge apply in the case of a trade-mark except to the limited extent which I have indicated There is power in the High Court to remove from the county court a case in which such a defence is raised as we have here, a power which certainly ought to be exercised in the present case if the defendant so desire, because if he be successful in his defence effect can only be given to it by expunging the entry in the register, which, as I have already pointed out, can only be done by the High Court. On the whole I come to the conclusion that the county court judge had jurisdiction and ought to have entertained this case. This appeal must therefore be allowed, but as this case is one of considerable importance the defendant will have leave to appeal.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. In my judgment a trade-mark is not in any sense a franchise, and therefore primâ facie the county court judge had jurisdiction, and the plaintiff had a right to have the case heard and determined; but the defendant raised by his defence as to the validity of the trade-mark a matter over which the county court clearly had no jurisdiction, and he contended that the learned judge therefore had no jurisdiction over the action at all. I do not agree with that contention. Under section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, jurisdiction is given to a county court judge to hear all but certain excepted cases, and this action is not one of those excepted cases, although I quite see the difficulty of working out a defence such as is raised in the present case under the county county procedure. The defendant, however, can under section 126 of the County Courts Act, 1888, apply for the removal of the case into the High Court, and as the defendant can only obtain the relief he is seeking in the High Court, I think that such an application would be granted. I agree, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed; leave to appeal.

GWENDOLEN FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY v. WICKS. (a.)

Industrial society—Arrears and fines—County Court—Special remedy for debts due from members—Past Members—Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 39), s. 23, sub-section 1.

By section 23 of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, "All moneys payable by a member to a registered society shall be a debt due from such member to the society, and shall be recoverable as such either in the county court of the district in which the registered office of the society is situate or in that of the district in which such member resides, at the option of the society."

Held, that, under the above section, a society could sue in the county court a past member for a debt contracted while he was a member; and consequently that it was immaterial that the amount sued for was in excess of the ordinary jurisdiction of the county court.

Appeal from the Leicester County Court.

The action was brought by the Gwendolen Land Society, a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, to recover from the defendant, who had ceased to be a member, the sum of £136 for arrears and fines alleged to have become payable to the society from him during the time he was a member.

At the trial the county court judge entered judgment for the plaintiffs for £95.

The defendant appealed on the ground, inter alia, that having ceased to be a member of the society the action was not maintainable under section 23 (1) of the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, which provided for the recovery of money due from a member to a society as a debt that could be sued for in the county court. That having ceased to be a member of the society at the date of the issue of the plaint, the special provisions for the recovery of debts from members given by section 23 no longer applied, and the amount of the plaintiffs' claim being in excess of the ordinary jurisdiction of the county court, the action should have been brought in the High Court.

KENNEDY, J.—With regard to the point taken on behalf of the defendant upon section 23, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1893, the contention was that the right of the county court judge to adjudicate upon an alleged debt from a member to the society depended upon whether the plaint had been entered during the time the defendant was a member. But I do not agree with that contention, for I do not think that the jurisdiction is so limited. I think that the word "member" in the section must be read as including past members as well as present. Nor do I see how the fact that this defendant had ceased to be a member alters the case or affects the right of the society to sue him in the county court for moneys which became due from him whilst he was still a member of the society, and which the Act expressly says may be sued for in the county court.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (Appellants) v. ILLUMINATED ADVERTISEMENT CO. (Respondents). (a.)

Metropolis — Buildings — Illuminated advertisements affixed to buildings—Projection beyond building line—"Building or structure"—London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccxiii.), ss. 22, 200 (3).

The respondents erected upon the front walls of a building twelve advertisement cases constructed of sheet iron, supported by wrought iron supports, which were pinned through the front walls. The outer side of each case was covered with a wooden frame carrying canvas or linen lined with advertisements, and provision was made for illuminating the interior of the cases by electric light. The cases varied in width from two to five feet, and in height from five to seven feet. Each of the cases stood out ten inches in front of a front wall of the building beyond the general line of building, but each projection was less than the projection of the existing cornice over the shop, which was two feet from the face of the main building. The respondents had not obtained the consent of the London County Council to the erection of the cases.

Held (by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Kennedy, J., Wills, J., dissenting), that the cases were not structures within the meaning of section 22 of the London Building Act, 1894, which provides that "no building or structure shall, without the consent of the council, be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street."

Case stated by A. C. Plowden, Esq., metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at the Marlborough-street police-court.

On the 10th of October, 1903, an information was laid against the respondents by T. Chilvers, on behalf of the appellants, charging them that on the 26th of May, 1903, they did unlawfully erect certain structures beyond the general line of buildings at 48, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, in the City of Westminster, in the county of London, in contravention of the provisions of Part III. of the London Building Act, 1894, and without the consent in writing of the appellants, whereby they became liable to the penalty prescribed by section 200 (3) of the said Act, and the later Amendment Act of 1898.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:

In the months of April and May, 1903, the respondents erected upon the front walls of the building No. 48, Cranbourn-street, Leicester-square, twelve advertisement cases. The cases were constructed of sheet iron, supported by strong wrought-iron supports, securely cut and pinned through the front walls of the building. The outer side of each of the cases was covered with a wooden frame carrying canvas or linen lined with advertisements, and provision was made for illuminating the interiors of the cases by electric light. The cases varied in width from two feet to five feet, and in height from five feet to seven feet. Each of the cases stood out ten inches in front of a front wall of the building, but each projection was less than the projection of the existing cornice over the shop, which is two feet from the face of the main building. The front of the cases was about ten inches beyond the general line of buildings as determined by a certificate dated the 23rd of December, 1903, of the superintending architect of metropolitan buildings. It would be possible to move the whole of the cases (with the exception of the iron supports) in a single day without injury to the building.

The respondents had not obtained the consent of the appellants to the erection of the cases.

The appellants contended that the cases so fixed and supported as aforesaid were structures within the meaning of sections 22 and 200 (3) of the London Building Act, 1894.

The respondents contended that the cases were not structures within the meaning of section 22 of the said Act.

The learned magistrate was of opinion that the cases in question were not structures within the meaning of the Act, that they were in their nature mere excrescences which could be removed at will without injury to the fabric, and that they could not be said, therefore, to be a "bringing forward" of the main building such as was contemplated by the statute, and he accordingly dismissed the summons.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the true construction of the sections above referred to, the respondents, on the facts above referred to, had erected a structure or structures beyond the general line of the buildings aforesaid.

The London Building Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 213), s. 22, provides as follows:

"No building or structure shall without consent in writing of the council be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street or part of a street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate in case the distance of such line of buildings from the highway does not exceed fifty feet or within fifty feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds fifty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway. Such general line of buildings shall be defined by the superintending architect."

By section 200 (3) a penalty is imposed on every person who "erects or brings forward any building or structure in contravention of any of the provisions of Part III. of this Act or of any conditions attached by the council to any consent given pursuant to such provisions."

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgments.

The following cases were referred to: Coburg Hotel Co. v. London County Council, 63 J. P. 105; Hull v. London County Council, 49 W. R. 396, [1901] 1 K. B. 580; Venner v. McDonnell, 45 W. KENNEDY, J.—In this case, speaking for myself, I am unable to adopt the view that the decision of the learned magistrate must be overruled. I do not think there is much more to be said than this, that it is a question of fact and a question of degree in each case. The magistrate has, no doubt, put it as a question of law—that is, "Whether upon the true construction of sections 22 and 200 (3) of the London Building Act, 1894," the respondents "erected a structure or structures beyond the general line of buildings aforesaid." It seems to me that if it be a question of fact and of degree in each case, it was for him to decide it; and he has decided "that the cases in question were not structures within the meaning of the Act." It is true he has added a rider "that they were in the nature of mere excrescences which could be removed at will without injury to the fabric, and that they could not be said therefore to be a 'bringing forward' of the main building such as was contemplated by the statute." With great respect to the learned magistrate, I do not see the force of the rider. We are told they are mere excrescences. I do not know what a mere excrescence is in that sense; but I cannot say that he is wrong in point of law in holding that this particular thing erected over the door of this shop is not a "structure or building" erected within the meaning of that section. It was a thing which was unquestionably, I should think, not necessarily intended to be permanent; indeed, I should think when this tenant contemplated leaving his shop he probably would remove it, or possibly change it next year. It is a form of advertisement. It is not, to my mind, like a bow window or anything of that kind, which is, from its nature, whether it is made of wood, tin, or iron, or of stone, intended to form part of a building or structure. I agree also that there may be a structure, such as a greenhouse, under certain conditions which would be within the section a structure or building, although in fact it might be physically removable without injury to the building; for it would be primâ facie a thing which would be intended to remain, and would be within the statute if it does go beyond the building line. Here there is something up aloft on the house equivalent to a projecting ledge—a large one, I agree—but still I cannot consider it a "structure or building" as a matter of law, nor that the magistrate who held that it is not, is wrong in law. Had the question arisen under section 73 (8), as to whether this was a projection, then unless we are hampered and prevented from so deciding by the previous decision of this court (Hull v. London County Council), I should have been inclined to say it was a projection. But, be that as it may, we are now only dealing with section 22, and I am not satisfied that the learned magistrate was wrong in point of law.

WILLS, J.—I have the misfortune to differ from my lord and brother Kennedy, and, therefore, I have now to express my own opinion. Questions of this kind must always be questions of mixed law and fact, and it is not very easy to say to what extent the law ought to prevail, and to what extent the consideration of facts ought to prevail. But I am quite sure the learned magistrate did not mean us to deal with the case which he stated, as if he had found, as a matter of fact, that this was not a structure; and, therefore, it seems to me to be open to us to consider whether from the natural construction of the words in the Act of Parliament it is or is not a structure. Of course, I take my stand upon the description of it given in the case stated—viz., "The said cases were constructed of sheet iron supported by strong wrought iron supports securely cut and pinned through the front walls of the said building." I need not go any further. It seems to me that it would be difficult to have any amount of annexation, short of that which would prevent the tenant from removing it during the term, that could go much further than what exists in this case; and I cannot help coming to the conclusion myself that, as long as it remains annexed to the building, it is a part of the building, although it may be a part that can be removed; and that, if it is not part of the building, certainly to my mind it is a structure. Put glass there instead of canvas and you would have a window. I think there would not be very much difficulty in saying, if that was the case, that then it was a structure. I do not think that anything is gained by considering other parts of the Act of Parliament. I cannot help experiencing this kind of feeling, though it ought not to influence one's decision, and it does not influence mine, that it is extremely unlikely that erections of this kind should be left untouched altogether by this legislation, because it is obvious that, so long as the character of the annexation remains the same—at least, it seems to me to be obvious—it cannot make any difference whether the breadth is ten inches or two or three or four feet. For these reasons I am compelled to differ, although, of course, I need not say I doubt my own judgment when I am differing from my lord and brother Kennedy; but I am bound to say that in my opinion the erection in question is a building or structure within section 22.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I agree with the greater part of what my brother Wills has said, but I am unable to arrive at the conclusion he arrives at on the reasons he has given. I agree with him entirely that we are not entitled to look at other parts of the Act for the mere purpose of construing particular words. I agree entirely with him that these words have to be construed in each of the sections, and each group of sections too, with regard to the purview of those particular sections and groups of sections; but I do think it is legitimate to consider whether or not a particular thing is dealt with in one part of the Act, or is dealt with in another; and to that extent, and to that extent only, do I think it material to consider other groups of sections and other enacting clauses in this Act. However, I must say my main ground of decision in this case is that I am unable to say that the learned magistrate has gone wrong as a matter of law. I do not think he meant to state the case so as to say that his finding was one of fact; but his conclusion is one of fact in one sense—when he says, "I was of opinoin that the cases in question were not structures within the meaning of the Act, that they were in the nature of mere excrescences which could be removed at will without injury to the fabric,"—and I am unable to say that in coming to that conclusion he has gone wrong on a matter of law. It must, of course, be taken on the finding that these advertisement cases could be removed by the tenant at the tenant's will—he finds so—and they are therefore not fixtures in the sense that a bow window would be, or that a structure of that character would be, for they can be removed without any injury whatever to the main structure. I think all these findings of fact must be taken as being found by him with reference to these particular structures, and the question we have to ask ourselves is, On those findings is he bound to hold as a matter of law that a structure so erected as that was, comes within section 22 (1) or section 200 (3)? I was much pressed with what my brother Wills has relied on —viz., the description of this "thing" in the case as stated, but it seems to me, as he has rather indicated, that you cannot deal with these sort of cases by simply dealing with the way in which the thing is constructed; because one can imagine many "things" —as he has properly called them—far less substantially built, which might be a much more clear infringement of section 22 (1) than these. Section 22 (1) was a part of the group of sections in Part III. of the Act dealing with "lines of building frontage," and primâ facie, I think it can scarcely be denied it relates to "buildings" or "structures in the nature of buildings." That, of course, does not solve the question, because parts of buildings and parts of structures would come in under those words. But if you look at section 23 as to setting back buildings when they are taken down, and at section 26 as to the conditions which the council may attach to their consent to the erection of a building beyond the general line of buildings, those sections seem to me to point to different considerations to those which ought to be borne in view when you are dealing with such a case as this. And I supplement that by pointing out that I do find in this Act of Parliament a number of sections dealing with what I think this structure undoubtedly was—namely, a projection from the building. Now, of course, I am hampered in coming to that conclusion, having regard to the decision of Bruce and Phillimore, JJ., in Hull v. London County Council. All I desire to say is that if, upon a proper statement of facts, the question does hereafter come up as to whether such a thing as this is or is not a projection under section 73 the effect of that decision will have to be reconsidered by this court or, if possible, in some way taken to the Court of Appeal. But I am unable to see in that, an argument for enlarging section 22 as my brother Wills suggested it should be enlarged. Section 22, and all the sections in Part III., sections 22-31, relate to a different subject-matter to projections which are dealt with under other sections of the Act. Looking at the facts I do not think the magistrate came to a wrong conclusion in law when he found that these excrescences or things were not structures or buildings within section 22. I am, therefore, of opinion this appeal should be dismissed.

Ex parte LE MARCHANT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Secured creditor—Amendment of proof by re-valuation of security—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), Schedule II., rr. 9-14.

A creditor may amend his proof by assessing his security at an increased value, even though the original under-valuation of his security caused the failure of a scheme to pay the unsecured creditors 7s. 6d. in the £.

Application by creditors for leave to amend their proof by re-valuing their security, which had increased in value since the admission of their proof.

The applicant creditors had lent the debtor the sum of £5,000 upon mortgage of an estate, which was subject, among other charges, to a jointure of £300 a year in favour of the debtor's wife in the event of her surviving her husband.

At the date of the receiving order, the 15th of March, 1895, there was due to the creditors £4,200 on account of principal and £1,008 on account of interest, making a total sum of £5,208. The debtor returned the creditors as fully secured, consequently no notice of the making of the receiving order was given to them, and they did not hear of it until the 28th of May.

On the 29th of May, Farrer & Co., solicitors for the creditors, wrote to Munns & Longden, solicitors for the debtor, stating that their clients did not consider that they were fully secured, and claimed to prove in the bankruptcy.

On the 30th of May the debtor proposed a scheme for the payment of 7s. 6d. in the £ to his unsecured creditors.

On the 3rd of July the applicant creditors presented a proof for £5,208, in which they valued their security at £2,604. The solicitors for the debtor protested at the presentation of this proof, as it entirely upset the proposed scheme of arrangement by adding £2,604 to the unsecured debts.

The creditors, however, insisted on presenting the proof, which was admitted by the trustee. The scheme of arrangement fell through, and the unsecured creditors only received 1s. in the £, the applicant creditors receiving £130.

In January, 1903, the bankrupt's wife predeceased her husband, and, the mortgaged estate being relieved of liability for her jointure, the applicant creditors' security rose in value.

On the 12th of May, 1904, they asked the trustee to allow them to amend their proof by valuing their security at the full amount of their debt, and they offered to return the sum of £130 which they had received in dividends.

The trustee refused his consent upon the 14th of May, whereupon notice of the present application was given.

Muir Mackenzie, for the applicants.—A creditor may amend at any time on showing to the satisfaction of the court that his security has increased in value, so long as he is prepared to repay any dividends he may have received owing to the under-valuation of his security: see rules 13 and 14 of Schedule II. of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Hansell, for the trustee.—In the first place the creditor ought not to be allowed to amend in this case because of his delay in waiting for fourteen months from the date when his security increased in value before making his application—from January, 1903, to May, 1904. Secondly, I contend that the court will not allow amendment where the parties have altered the position of things by their action. Here the scheme of arrangement was upset by these creditors insisting on their proof, and it is not fair now for them to deprive the other creditors of the only asset they can hope to get. See the remarks of Vaughan Williams, J., in In re Newton, Ex parte The National Provincial Bank, 45 W. R. 63, [1896] 2 Q. B., at p. 406: "The rule ought so to be construed as to give the creditor the right to amend unless by something which has happened the position of the trustee and the creditor has become so altered that the rights of the parties concerned may be considered to be fixed on the basis of the alteration."

He also cited Ex parte Norris, In re Sadler, 35 W. R. 19, 17 Q. B. D. 728, and In re Safety Explosives Co., 52 W. R. 470, [1904] 1 Ch. 226.

Muir Mackenzie, in reply.—The argument put forward on behalf of the trustee would deprive the creditor of all his rights under rules 13 and 14 of Schedule II. In re Newton is really a strong case in the applicants' favour, for there a creditor was allowed to revalue his security after he had been tendered the amount at which he had originally assessed it. [He was stopped by the court.]

BIGHAM, J.—The applicants in this case valued their security in 1895 at half the amount of their debt, and there is no reason to suppose that that was not an honest valuation. They had then the right which they seek to enforce now, of altering their valuation and amending their proof "at any time," on showing to the satisfaction of the court that their security has increased or decreased since its previous valuation. They have here satisfied me that it has increased.

It is urged that in equity they should not be allowed to exercise this right because they prevented the debtor from carrying through a composition owing to their proof standing as an unsecured claim for £2,604 This is set up as a reason why they should not be allowed to amend, and reliance is placed on an obiter dictum of Vaughan Williams, J., in the course of his judgment in In re Newton, where he speaks of possible cases where "the position of the creditor and the trustee has become so altered" by the action of the creditors, that amendment ought not to be allowed. That passage, however, cannot be construed so as to apply to this case because the trustee was not in existence when the applicants did what is complained of.

It seems to me that nothing which the secured creditors have done has taken away their right to amend. They made an honest valuation upon both occasions, and I am at a loss to see why the fact that the debtor failed to carry a composition, because the applicants did what they had a right to do, should stand in the way of their being allowed to amend their proof.

Application allowed.

Appeal by the debtor from a receiving order made against him in the county court at Wandsworth.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Bigham, J.:

On the 19th of April, 1904, the debtor executed a deed of assignment of all his property to a Mr. Baker for the benefit of his creditors. This was an act of bankruptcy. The next day the debtor's solicitors issued a circular convening a meetings of the creditors for the purpose of receiving and considering a statement of the debtor's affairs. A copy of this circular was sent to the respondents, Gover & Co., who were creditors for £75. The meeting was held on the 25th of April, Gover & Co. being represented thereat by a Mr. Corfield, an accountant. A statement of affairs was produced, showing assets £636, and liabilities, £1,771. Some of the creditors expressed their willingness to accept a composition of 10s. in the pound, but Corfield, representing Gover & Co., stated that he could not agree. The available funds were sufficient to pay 10s. in the pound and accordingly the debtor's solicitors issued a second circular. This circular invited each creditor to sign a form of assent to the deed of assignment, and it also stated that although the debtor could not pay ten shillings in the pound his friends were prepared to repurchase the estate for a sum sufficient to pay seven-and-sixpence in the pound. The respondents answered this circular on the 3rd of May by a letter in which they said that in their opinion the case was not one for a deed of assignment but for the bankruptcy court. On the next day Mr. Baker (the trustee under the deed) saw the respondents with the object of inducing them to assent to the scheme, but they refused, saying that they would file a petition "unless the debtor or his friends were prepared to make some better arrangement with them."

On the 5th of May, according to an affidavit of the debtor, he himself asked the respondents to execute the deed, and they answered that they would if the debtor promised to pay them the balance of their debt in full, but not otherwise. On the 7th of May the debtor, accompanied this time by his brother-in-law, Mr. Levy, again saw the respondents, who then said that they were prepared to accept a composition of seven-and-sixpence to be paid under the deed "provided they were given two bills for the balance of their debt with the names of the debtor and his father-in-law upon them, or they would take £60 cash down and sign the deed." The debtor's father-in-law was asked to lend his name in the way suggested, but he refused, and his refusal having been communicated to the respondents they wrote a letter of the 11th of May which is as follows: "Unless you call here to-morrow with £29 8s. 3d., that is seven-and-sixpence in the pound, together with two bills drawn one at twelve months for £25 14s. 6d. and the other at fifteen months for £25 14s. 6d., accepted by the debtor and endorsed by his father-in-law, we shall instruct our solicitor to file a petition in bankruptcy." It appears that later on the debtor offered to give his sole undertaking to pay the balance of the debt, but this offer the respondents declined, insisting, as before, that the father-in-law should make himself responsible, and adding that if not, they would present a petition in bankruptcy.

On the 27th of May an agreement was entered into between Baker and the debtor's relatives, whereby the latter undertook to buy the estate for a sum sufficient to pay 7s. 6d. in the £. This was the first and only agreement for the purchase of the estate.

On the 9th of June the respondents presented a petition against the debtor based on the execution of the deed of assignment.

The petition was heard, and the registrar made a receiving order.

The debtor appealed.

Aug. 9.—Reed, K.C., and Tindale Davis, for the appellant.—There was sufficient cause for refusing to make a receiving order within section 7, sub-section 3, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The creditors acquiesced in the deed of assignment, for they wrote letters to the trustee treating him as trustee. They delayed the presentation of their petition from the 25th of April to the 9th of June, though they knew administration was going on under the deed. They also threatened bankruptcy for the purpose of extorting better terms than the other creditors were to get, which was held "sufficient cause" for refusing a receiving order in In re Shaw, Ex parte Gill, 49 W. R. 264, 83 L. T. 754.

C. A. Russell, K.C., and F. C. Willis, for the respondents.—The creditors believed that the debtor could pay in full and was setting up a number of family creditors, whose debts were not bonâ fide. Under those circumstances there was no abuse of the powers of the court in what they did.

Reed, K.C., replied.

THE COURT reserved judgment.

Oct. 25.—BIGHAM, J.—The question in this case is whether the evidence discloses a "sufficient cause" within the meaning of sub-section 3 of section 7 of the Bankruptcy Acts, 1883, for dismissing the respondents' petition. [His lordship here stated the facts.] The debtor has appealed upon the ground that the circumstances disentitle the respondent to a receiving order. It is said that the attempt to obtain a secret advantage over the other creditors accompanied as it was by a threat that if the debtor did not concede it a bankruptcy petition would be presented, has had the effect of depriving the respondents of the right which they would otherwise have had of requiring a receiving order to be made on their petition. I am unable to follow this contention. It is of course well known that the Bankruptcy Court will not allow its process to be used for purposes of extortion; it will not allow a petition to be presented and then used not for the purpose of obtaining a receiving order, but for the purpose of extorting money from the debtor in consideration of consents to adjournment of the hearing.

But that is not this case. Here nothing was done after the petition was filed to which any objection could be taken, and all the requirements of the Act of Parliament existed which would entitle the respondents to their order. It is an unpleasant thing to be served with a writ in an action, and I can imagine an unconscionable creditor threatening his debtor with such process unless the debtor paid more than he owed, but I cannot imagine any court of law on that ground subsequently refusing to give the creditor judgment for the right amount of his debt. I do not for my own part think that section 7 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was ever intended to give the court the power of punishing a petitioning creditor for misconduct before the presentation of the petition, by refusing to make an order on the petition when presented.

But it is said that we are bound by the decision in In re Shaw, Ex parte Gill, 49 W. R. 264, 83 L. T. 754, and I agree that we are. The circumstances of that case cannot be distinguished in any material respect from the circumstances in the present case, and there the lords justices, overruling Wright and Phillimore, JJ., decided that there was "sufficient cause" for declining to make a receiving order. I must follow that decision. The appeal is therefore allowed with costs.

DARLING, J.—I agree in the conclusion at which my learned brother has arrived. The decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Shaw seems to me an authority—which I am glad to have—for holding that there is sufficient cause why the respondents should be held to have disentitled themselves to present the petition in question.

Appeal allowed.

MOUNT LYELL MINING AND RAILWAY CO. (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—"Marketable security"—"Given in substitution for a like security"—Debentures in different companies—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), Schedule, "Marketable Security," sub-head 4.

The debenture-holders in a company registered in England under the Companies Acts agreed to accept, in satisfaction of the liability of the company under the debentures, debentures for an equivalent amount in a company to be incorporated under the laws of an English colony for the purpose of taking over the assets and liabilities of the English company. The colonial company was duly incorporated, and the debenture-holders delivered up the debentures of the English company, and in lieu thereof received debentures of the colonial company.

Held, that, inasmuch as the parties were different, the debentures of the colonial company were not "given in substitution for a like security" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, Schedule, "Marketable Security," sub-head 4, and were therefore chargeable with stamp duty at the rate of 1s. for every £10.

Appeal by case stated from the decision of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.

On the 12th of October, 1903, an instrument was presented on behalf of the Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the appellant company) by Messrs. James White & Leonard, their solicitors, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable.

In 1898 the North Mount Lyell Copper Co. (Limited) (hereinafter called the North Co.), being a company registered under the Companies Act, 1862 to 1893, issued under the seal of the company a series of debentures of varying amounts, whereby they promised to pay to bearer, or, when registered, to the registered holder, the respective amounts thereof.

In order to secure such debentures a trust deed was on the 7th of December, 1898, executed between the North Co. of the one part, and General Sir Hugh Gough and William Jacks (as trustees for the debenture-holders) of the other part, containing the conditions usual in such trust deeds.

By an agreement dated the 22nd of May, 1903, made between a company called the Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Co. (Limited) (being a company registered under the laws of the State of Victoria) of the one part, and the North Co. of the other part, it was provided that a new company should be incorporated to take over the assets and liabilities of the companies parties thereto, including the liability of the North Co. to the debenture-holders, to whom debentures in the new company were to be given as therein provided.

By a subsidiary agreement dated the 18th of June, 1903, made between Daniel James Mackay (on behalf of all the holders of the outstanding debentures of the North Co.) of the one part, and the North Co. of the other part, it was (amongst other things) provided that every holder of debentures of the North Co. should deliver up the debentures held by him and accept in lieu thereof debentures of an equivalent amount in the new company to be formed as aforesaid; such debentures were to be framed and secured as therein mentioned, and by clause 5 the delivery of such substituted debentures was to be accepted in satisfaction of the liability of the North Co. to him under the said debenture trust deed and debentures.

By an agreement dated the 6th of August, 1903, and made between the aforesaid Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Co. (Limited), of the State of Victoria, of the first part, the North Co. of the second part, and Alfred Mellor, on behalf of a new company which it was contemplated should be formed under the laws of the State of Victoria, under the style of the Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Co. (Limited) (the appellant company), of the third part, it was agreed to sell the respective undertakings of the old companies to the appellant company when incorporated, and as to the assets of the said North Co. subject to the existing mortgage debentures to be satisfied by the issue of debentures of the appellant company as therein provided.

On the 11th of August, 1903, the appellant company was duly incorporated under the laws of the State of Victoria, in the Commonwealth of Australia, and by deed of that date it duly adopted under seal the last-mentioned agreement.

A holder of one of the above-mentioned debentures payable to bearer issued by the North Co. surrendered such debenture at the office of the appellant company in London, and in lieu thereof received the debenture payable to bearer under the seal of the appellant company which is the subject of adjudication.

In accepting such new debenture he acted under the agreement of the 18th of June, 1903, and he thereby released and gave up all right against the North Co. and all rights in respect of the first-mentioned debenture.

The appellant company contended that the instrument in question fell to be charged only with substituted security duty at the rate of 6d. for every £20 thereof.

The commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument in question was a marketable security, being a security transferable by delivery, and bearing date after the 6th of August, 1885, by reference to the heading "Marketable Security," sub-head 3 in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and that it was not within the fourth sub-head of that heading, assessed the duty at 1s. for every £10 and for every fractional part of £10 of the money thereby secured.

The appellants being aggrieved at the decision, the commissioners, at the request of the appellants, stated this case for the opinion of the court.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the assessment of the commissioners was correct. (2) If not, to what duty the said instrument was liable.

In the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, under the heading "Marketable Security," sub-head 3 is as follows: "Marketable security (except a colonial government security) being a security transferable by delivery and bearing date or signed or offered for subscription after the 6th of August, 1885—For every £10 and also for any fractional part of £10 of the money thereby secured—1s." Sub-head 4 is as follows: "Marketable security (except a colonial government security) being such security as last aforesaid given in substitution for a like security duly stamped in conformity with the law in force at the time when it became subject to duty—For every £20 and also for any fractional part of £20 of the money thereby secured—6d."

CHANNELL, J.—In this case I am not at all anxious to decide questions which I think I have not necessarily to decide. There are some portions of the Attorney-General's argument which, I confess, I am not prepared to accept without further consideration. They may be correct. It may be that I personally have formed an altogether erroneous view of what is meant by "substitution" in the Stamp Act. I gave my opinion in City of London Brewery Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, [1898] 1 Q. B. 408, 46 W. R. Dig. 76, 47 W. R. 216, [1899] 1 Q. B. 121, and my decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. I confess I do not understand fully the grounds of that decision on this point. Consequently I do not propose to decide or say anything one way or the other on the argument the Attorney-General has raised as to the alleged distinction between giving in substitution and taking in substitution. I think I have to look at the exact wording of this schedule, and it is "marketable security (except a colonial government security) being such security as last aforesaid given in substitution for a like security." It seems to me that the words "like security," occurring where they do in the schedule to this Stamp Act, mean a security which is like the one referred to for the purpose of stamping, and when you see that one of those is a debenture of an English company and the other of a colonial company, and that under section 82, although the amount of the stamp to which they are liable is the same, nevertheless the considerations under which they become liable to stamp duty are not the same, it seems to me that there is a difficulty in holding that the one security is a like security with the other for stamp purposes. On that ground I think that I must hold that this is not a substituted security. I say nothing about the other points one way or the other. I do not say they are wrong, but I do not give any decision upon them.

The Mount Lyell Mining and Railway Co. appealed.

Dec. 7.—W. F. Hamilton, K.C., and Edgar Elgood, for the appellants.—The debentures in the appellant company were given "in substitution for" a like security in the North Co. "In substitution for" means in place of or in exchange for, and "a like security" means a like instrument for the purposes of stamp duty. It is immaterial that the debtor is changed or that the property charged is different. The word "security" does not necessarily mean an instrument giving a charge. It means an instrument which is popularly called a security. The Stamp Act includes in the term "marketable security" instruments which do not give a charge as well as instruments which do. The words "in substitution for" occur in section 1, where they obviously mean "in place of"; and they bear the same meaning in this part of the schedule. This is a case of novation, where there is always a substitution of one debtor for another.

They referred to City of London Brewery Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 47 W. R. 216, [1899] 1 Q. B. 121; Alpe's Law of Stamp Duties (9th ed.), p. 157.

Sir Robert Finlay, A.G., and S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the Crown.—The words "in substitution for a like security" refer to a case where, the parties remaining the same, some property is substituted for some other property charged. They do not include a case where the debtors are changed, and there is probably also a change made in the property charged. In the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" in the schedule to the Act, sub-head 2, the words "substituted security" occur, and they clearly mean a change of the property charged and not a change of parties. Those words throw some light on the meaning of "in substitution for" in "Marketable Security," sub-head 4. Nor was the security a "like security." The judgment was therefore right.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., replied.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Channell, J., and the point lies in a small compass. It arises in this way: An English company had issued debentures payable to bearer. By an arrangement to which that company were parties, debentures issued by a colonial company were in a sense substituted for debentures in the English company, which had been stamped with the duty of 1s. for every £10 of the money secured thereby under sub-head 3 of "Marketable Security" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. There was thus an arrangement called a novation by which the debenture-holders in the English company accepted debentures in the colonial company in lieu of the debentures in the English company. It is said on behalf of the appellants that those new debentures came within sub-head 4 of "Marketable Security" as "being such security as last aforesaid given in substitution for a like security duly stamped in conformity with the law in force at the time when it became subject to duty," and are, therefore, only subject to the duty of 6d. for every £20 of the money secured thereby. The contention is that the new security was "given in substitution for a like security." That depends upon the question whether the debentures of the colonial company, being a security of a different debtor and probably charged upon different property, are a "like security" with one in which the debtor is an English company and in which the property covered by the security is probably not the same. It seems to me that the word "like" in that context imports that the debtor must be the same in each case. To substitute the obligation of a different person, and probably a charge upon different property, is not to give a security in "substitution for a like security" within the meaning of sub-head 4. Channell, J., has dealt more especially with the words "like security," and has pointed out that, in ascertaining the liability to stamp duty, different considerations apply to debentures in a colonial company and to debentures in an English company. Those considerations certainly cannot be ignored, because the use of the word "like" brings in all considerations. Just as the security of one debtor cannot be said to be like the security of another debtor, so the fact that a colonial security is fenced round with certain conditions specified in section 82, is a factor in determining whether such a security is to be treated as a "like security" with another within the meaning of sub-head 4 of "Marketable Security." No doubt, as has been pointed out on behalf of the appellants, the words "in substitution for" occur in section 1 of the Act as meaning "in place of." But in a part of the Act more nearly connected with the provision of the Act now in question—namely, under the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant," sub-head 2, in the schedule to the Act, the words "substituted security" occur, and those words, when read in connection with the context, imply the substitution of property on which the sum is charged, and do not cover the substitution of a different security between different persons. It is said that the word "security" under the heading "Marketable Security" includes a security in the popular sense which does not give a charge upon property, and that, therefore, no analogy can be drawn from the meaning of the word security in a part of the Act where it involves a charge upon property. I do not agree. The security included under the heading "Marketable Security" may, no doubt, be an instrument giving a mere personal security and not involving any charge. Still the security included under that heading may be one which gives a charge, and a security which gives a charge is not a "like security" with another when the charge given is different and the parties to it are different. All the facts of the case must be considered, and when it is found that the security is not between the same persons and that probably it is not charged upon the same property, it is not a "like security" within the meaning of the Act. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question, in my opinion, turns upon the meaning of the words given "in substitution for" a like security in sub-head 4 of the heading "Marketable Security" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. The appellants contend that those words mean "in place of" in the widest sense, and they refer to section 1 of the Act in support of that contention. On the other hand, the Crown contend that the words have a much less wide meaning when dealing with the question as to the liability of an instrument to stamp duty, and especial reference is made to the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" in the schedule to the Act, which, in sub-head 2, deals with a "substituted security." The type of "substituted security" under that heading appears to be one in which, the parties to the transaction remaining the same, one piece of property is removed from the original security and another piece of property is brought in which may be designated the substituted piece, and it seems to me that that throws light upon the words "given in substitution for" in sub-head 4 of the heading "Marketable Security" in the schedule. In the present case the transaction is one in which a new debtor comes upon the scene, and in my opinion this is not a case within sub-head 4 of a security given in substitution for a like security.

LAW v. LAW. (a.)

*Partnership — Sale to managing partner of another's share—Assets undisclosed—Uberrima fides—Action for purchase-money—Action for fraudulent misrepresentation—Settlement of actions—Further discovery of assets—Rescission—Election.*

In a transaction between co-partners for the sale by one to the other of a share in the business, the duty rests on the purchaser, who knows, and is aware that he knows, more about the partnership accounts than the vendor, to put the vendor in possession of all material facts with reference to the assets, and not to conceal what he alone knows; and unless such information has been furnished the sale may be set aside.

Maddeford v. Austwick, 1 Sim. 89, approved.

But if the vendor, having learnt from a third party that there are undisclosed assets, and suspecting there may be more, recognizes the sale by suing for an unpaid balance of the purchase-money—still more if he brings an action alleging fraud in the transaction and settles it by accepting even an inadequate sum in discharge of all his claims—then there is a binding election, and there is no further duty to disclose on the part of the purchaser which will preclude his relying on it as a defence to an action to rescind the sale.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Kekewich, J. (reported 20 Times L. R. 295), in an action for rescission of a sale by one partner to another of a share in a business.

After the death of John Law in 1873, the firm of J. Law & Sons, woollen manufacturers, of Greetland, Yorkshire, consisted of four partners, the brothers Samuel, Joseph, James, and William Law, who carried on business without any articles of partnership, and were entitled to the assets in equal shares. Samuel died in 1893, leaving his property in the business. Joseph died in 1899, leaving his property equally between his surviving brothers, who continued to carry on the business. Before Joseph's death he and James—and afterwards James alone—had the active conduct of the business, William living in London, where he only attended to matters arising there, and knowing nothing of the financial position of the firm. He received as his share of profits sums averaging about £600 a year.

On Joseph's death an account of the partnership assets, the only one seen by William for some years, was sent him, with a statement that it was for probate purposes only, and an account of Joseph's estate accompanied it. The former showed £33,814 14s. 9d. as the excess of assets over liabilities; the latter gave £19,027 9s. 4d. as the net value of the estate. In March, 1900, William was in want of money, and James proposed to purchase his share in the business for £10,000. William consulted a solicitor named Lacy, who went to Greetland armed with full powers to negotiate and complete a sale, and saw there James, his daughter Rachel, and James's solicitor, a Mr. Garsed. An agreement was arrived at for a sale at the price of £21,000, which was to include William's share both of the partnership assets and goodwill and of the estate of Joseph, and this was carried out by two deeds dated the 2nd of July, 1900, half of the purchase-money being then paid and the rest secured by a bond and payable six months later.

After the execution of the deeds William learnt that assets of the partnership consisting of mortgages for £10,550 were, and at the date of the sale had been, in existence, of which no mention had been made by James, and which were not included in the account referred to, and he commenced an action in the Queen's Bench Division on the 22nd of January, 1901, to recover half the value of such undisclosed assets as damages for fraudulent misrepresentation. This action was stayed by order dated the 25th of February, 1901, on the terms, agreed upon on the 15th of the same month, that all charges of fraud should be withdrawn and that £3,550 should be paid by James in full satisfaction of all William's claims whatsoever, and particularly of his claims in regard to the business of J. Law & Sons and the estate of Joseph.

Prior, however, to the said action William, who had assigned the bond to trustees, had joined with them in suing for the recovery of the second instalment of the purchase-money thereby secured, and this action was stayed on the 18th of January, 1901, on payment to the trustees of the sum claimed with interest and costs.

After the settlement of the action in February, 1901, William discovered that, as he had already had reason to suspect, there were further undisclosed assets, consisting of securities for £12,250 as well as others to a very large amount, which had also existed at the date of the sale of his share to James, and he accordingly commenced the present action against Rachel Law and L. H. Longbotham, the executors of James (who had died in August, 1901), and against the executor of Joseph, for a declaration that the indenture of the 2nd of July, 1900, the order of the 25th of February, 1901, and the agreement of the 15th of February, 1901, were not binding on him, and should be set aside, and for consequential accounts and inquiries. William died on the 18th of March, 1903, and the action was continued by his son and executor, John Law, the present plaintiff.

The statement of claim alleged that prior to the contract of sale James showed to Lacy the accounts above referred to, and assured him that there were no assets beyond those therein mentioned; that James in breach of duty omitted to inform William of the £10,550 mortgages, or of the securities for £12,250, and, in fact, concealed both from him; that their existence was not known to William or Lacy at the date of sale, nor (as to the £12,250 assets) had they any knowledge or notice of their existence at the date of the agreement of the 15th of February, 1901, or before or at the date of the order of the 25th of February, or of the payment of the £3,550.

For the defence it was denied that the accounts were shown to Lacy or any assurance given to him as alleged, but it was pleaded that the assurance, if given, was true. It was admitted that there were mortgages not included in the account, but that account was not the basis of the sale agreement. The mortgages did not belong to the partnership but were the property jointly of Joseph and James, and of the latter by survivorship. James owed no duty to disclose assets. If he did not give information he did not improperly conceal assets. The settlement of February, 1901, was made with knowledge that there were undisclosed assets as to which it might be a question of law whether they belonged to the partnership or not. The order of the 25th of February, 1901, was an estoppel to the whole relief claimed. The facts as to undisclosed assets known to William on the 22nd of January, 1901, were known to him on the 8th of that month, when he commenced the action on the bond, and the settlement of that action was, it was submitted, an election to affirm the sale, which precluded him and the present plaintiff from obtaining its rescission. The settlement of the later action in February had a similar result.

By the reply it was pleaded that if the settlement of February, 1901, was come to on the footing that there were assets as to which there might be a question of law, whether they belonged to the partnership or not, such assets were concealed by James, as were also the facts on which such question of law arose; that if William at that time knew of some of the undisclosed assets, there were others of which he was not then aware; and that if the mortgages were, as alleged, made by Joseph and James, they represented moneys drawn from the concern during William's partnership without his knowledge and consent and not appearing in any partnership accounts.

KEKEWICH, J., said the statement of claim contained what amounted to allegations of fraud, which had not been proved. The case was mainly rested on the ground of uberrima fides, but it was unnecessary to go into that question, because both technically and from a common-sense point of view (which he preferred as the ground of his decision) the agreement of the 15th of February put an end to any duty which might have been incumbent on James Law to make disclosures to William. The latter's action in the Queen's Bench Division for misrepresentation was brought with full knowledge that the claim involved going thoroughly into the partnership accounts and the value of the assets, in order to ascertain the value of his share in July, yet he had thought it wise to settle the action for £3,550. Having done so, he could not go into the question of further assets, and his claim failed. His lordship dismissed the action, and the plaintiff appealed.

Neville, K.C., and F. Thompson, for the plaintiff.—This purchase is analogous to one by a trustee from his cestui que trust after the determination of the trust; it is the duty of the trustee to fairly and honestly disclose all necessary particulars, and not attempt a furtive advantage to himself by means of private information: Lewin on Trusts (11th ed.), p. 566. Where a confirmation of such a sale is relied on, it must be by a solemn and deliberate act, and the court will watch it with the utmost suspicion, especially where the original transaction was infected with fraud: Ibid., p. 576. It is immaterial how many steps there are in an arrangement between trustee and cestui que trust, and if a subsequent transaction is set up as confirming the sale, it is a condition of that confirmation that the cestui que trust must be honestly made acquainted with all the material circumstances of the case: Ibid., p. 577. In Lindley on Partnership (6th ed.), p. 314, it is stated that "if one partner knows more about the state of the partnership accounts than another, and, concealing what he knows, enters into an agreement with that other relative to some matter as to which a knowledge of the state of the accounts is material, such agreement will not be allowed to stand." Especial good faith is required in such a case: Ibid., p. 316. A partner cannot buy from a co-partner without first putting him in a position to deal on equal terms, and he cannot do this without disclosing all he has become cognizant of in the course of the business: Maddeford v. Austwick, 1 Sim. 89. The language of Jessel, M.R., in Dunne v. English, L. R. 18 Eq. 524, 534, with regard to underhand dealings of an agent with his principal is also applicable. The analogy with the case of a trustee buying from a cestui que trust is not complete, but a partner is so far a trustee that he cannot deal with a co-partner without full disclosure. Besides, there was here a case of actual trusteeship by reason of the mortgages having been taken in the names of two of the partners only. The reasons given for the judgment were good enough if the parties were strangers, but not where a fiduciary relation existed. That raised the obligation (in the case of the one receiving the benefit) referred to by Lord Thurlow in Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Wh. & T. (7th ed.), p. 717. By section 28 of the Partnership Act, 1890, partners are bound to render true accounts and give full information of all things affecting the partnership to any partner or his legal representatives. There was a distinct representation here as to the value of the assets and of William's share; but our case does not rest on misrepresentation, but on James's duty to disclose. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—"Concealing" in Lindley on Partnership means "not disclosing, knowing that the other man is ignorant." ROMER, L.J.—But what if the selling partner knows of the existence of some assets beyond those disclosed ?] If by his own efforts he has discovered something, that is not sufficient to put the purchasing partner in the position of having made disclosure. The onus is on a trustee to prove that there has been full disclosure, and if he relies on information obtained elsewhere by the cestui que trust he must take care that it has placed the latter in the same position as if the trustee had performed his duty. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I want to define the information which the partner is bound to give.] All the information he possesses relevant to the subject-matter of the transaction. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—That is a little too wide. Is he bound to give it if he knows the other knew it?] There can be no harm in ascertaining the amount of the other's knowledge. [ROMER, L.J.—If he has information which he has reason to believe the other has not, it is his duty to give it.] The settlement was a mere agreement to stay proceedings. There was nothing in the nature of a judgment, which would have been an estoppel. A consent order has no more force than an agreement between the parties: Wilding v. Sanderson, 45 W. R. 675, (1897) 2 Ch. 534, 550, per Lindley, L.J. If one can be set aside so can the other.

P. Ogden Lawrence, K.C. (Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., and George Lawrence with him), for the executors of James Law.—The basis of the relation between partners is mutual confidence, and when this is destroyed all relation between them in the way of trustee and cestui que trust is at an end. In this case mutual confidence was destroyed when William made independent investigations as to matters appearing in connection with Joseph's probate. William regarded himself as a sleeping partner; he had been receiving £600 a year, and was content with such a sum as would produce that income, and both he and Lacy persistently refused investigation of the partnership books. If one partner says in effect to another "Whatever my share is worth, I am willing to take so much for it," the bargain is always supported. It is otherwise with a bargain between solicitor and client, or between trustee and cestui que trust. The latter cannot waive investigation, but in the case of partners you have only to see that mutual confidence is not abused: Knight v. Marjoribanks, 2 Mac. & G. 10. Assuming, however, that there was suppression of facts, the result would be a voidable bargain, and William confirmed it. Maddeford v. Austwick does not apply, for the duty to disclose has been waived. The party who can avoid must elect once for all, and if he confirms after discovering part of the misrepresentations, he cannot, after further discoveries, rescind, though he may get damages: Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, L. R. 7 App. Cas. 345; Campbell v. Fleming, 1 A. & E. 40; Elsey v. Adams, 12 W. R. 586, 2 De G. J. & S. 147; Clough v. London and North-Western Railway, 20 W. R. 189, L. R. 7 Ex. 26, 34. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to Calisher v. Bischoffsheim, 18 W. R. 1137, L. R. 5 Q. B. 449, and Ex parte Banner, 17 Ch. D. 480, 29 W. R. Dig. 24.] He can rescind as long as no election is made and the position of the parties not altered. [COZENS-HARDY, L.J., referred to Miles v. New Zealand Co., 34 W. R. 669, 32 Ch. D. 266.] Counsel read from Ex parte Banner, at p. 490, and cited In re Hawkins, 43 W. R. 306, [1895] 1 Q. B. 404. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—If a man is suing for £1,000, and the parties agree to settle for £500, both knowing it to be much less than was owing, and the defendant practically says, "I know I owe you a great deal more than £500, but I won't tell you how much," then there is no consideration for the settlement, for an agreement to take less than is due is no consideration.] Here both parties were perfectly aware of the circumstances, and were bound by the compromise, and the transaction cannot be re-opened.

Younger, K.C. (Warmington, K.C., and Austen Cartmell with him), for the executor of Joseph Law.—The evidence shows that Lacy, at the Greetland interview, knew of at least some of the undisclosed assets, but concealed his knowledge. As to the election, it was made long before the order of the 25th of February. The effect of the action on the bond, to which William was a party, was to confirm the sale, the "unequivocal act" referred to by Lord Blackburn in Scarf v. Jardine, L. R. 7 App. Cas., at p. 360, being the issue of the writ on the 8th of January, or at all events the second writ dated the 22nd of January, which is the latest date that can be fixed for the election. The basis of action was that the relation of partners had ceased and that the relation constituted by the contract had been substituted. The parties were then absolutely at arm's length, and no fiduciary relation remained. It was admitted that nothing could be said against the contract if made between ordinary parties. There could be no damages unless the contract stood.

Dec. 5.—COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the judgment of the court as follows: This is an appeal from the judgment of Kekewich, J., who dismissed with costs an action seeking to set aside a sale by William Law to James Law of his interest in a partnership business carried on between William and James. The vendor and purchaser are both dead, but their representatives are before the court. Now, it is clear law that, in a transaction between co-partners for the sale by one to the other of a share in the partnership business, there is a duty resting upon the purchaser, who knows, and is aware that he knows, more about the partnership accounts than the vendor, to put the vendor in possession of all material facts with reference to the partnership assets, and not to conceal what he alone knows, and that, unless such information has been furnished, the sale is voidable and may be set aside: see Maddeford v. Austwick, 1 Sim. 89. The original sale on the 2nd of July, 1900, by William to James was for £21,000, payable half in cash and half at six months secured by a bond. Now we will assume that this sale could have been set aside by William on the ground that James had not disclosed the existence of partnership assets represented by mortgages and other securities to a very large amount standing in the names of James and his late brother Joseph, who had also been a partner. But shortly after the completion of the sale William undoubtedly ascertained the existence of some of what we will call "the suppressed assets." He thereupon consulted counsel, and his case then was, not merely that there had been no proper disclosure by James of the assets in question, but that the sale had been brought about by an actual representation by James that there were no partnership assets beyond those appearing in certain probate valuations, which certainly did not disclose the assets in question. We may here observe that the appellants do not raise any case of misrepresentation before us. They base their case solely on the ground of nondisclosure, giving rise to a right in equity to a rescission of the contract of sale. The counsel who was consulted advised that an action should be brought for damages for misrepresentation, the measure of damages being one-half of the value of the omitted assets, and counsel added that, as there was some doubt whether all the assets had even then been discovered, it would be well to ask that an account be taken of all further assets belonging to the partnership, and to claim half of their value also. Following this advice, which was given on the 8th of November, 1900, William, on the 22nd of January, 1901, issued a writ in the Queen's Bench Division. This action was settled by an agreement dated the 15th of February, 1901, which was embodied in a consent order on the 25th of February, 1901, staying the action. All charges of fraud or fraudulent representations being withdrawn, the sum of £3,550 was paid by James to William in discharge of every claim relating to any matter whatsoever between the plaintiff and defendant and in full discharge thereof. Before this settlement was arrived at William had ascertained that there were still further partnership assets not disclosed by James, and he surmised and believed that there might be others, though he was not aware of their particulars or amount. Under these circumstances it was, of course, open to William, if he chose, not to insist on his full rights, and in particular not to obtain full disclosure of what the assets consisted, and to come to a settlement or compromise with James on that footing. And this is what he did. What his reasons were for so doing concerned him alone, and it would be idle now to speculate whether he was influenced by fraternal affection, or by an idea that his partnership drawings may have been greater than those of James, or by some other reason. But after the settlement so come to, in our opinion it was not possible for William to reopen the transaction. He deliberately made his election, and by that election he is bound: see Clough v. London and North-Western Railway, L. R. 7 Ex. 34. It cannot be sufficient to allege and prove that, if the action had been fought out, the plaintiff would have recovered damages greatly in excess of £3,550. No separate and independent fraud is even alleged in bringing about the settlement of February, 1901. William may have been induced to settle largely by reason of representations made by the daughter of James as to her father's health, but these representations were not untrue. He was not induced by any statement or assurance on the part of James or his advisers that there were no other suppressed assets. But the case against the appellant's claim now to rescind does not even rest solely on what we have just stated. We have purposely passed over two facts of great importance. William Law, after he had been advised by counsel, assigned the bond to secure the second instalment of £10,500 to trustees, and subsequently, on the 8th of January, 1901, William joined with the trustees in an action on the bond to recover this instalment. Proceedings in this action were stayed on the 18th of January on payment by James to the trustees of £10,532 1s. 8d., being the balance of all principal moneys and interest, with costs amounting to £3 5s. This was four days before the writ in the action for damages was issued. In point of fact William, with knowledge that the sale might be upset or that damages might be recovered, deliberately postponed proceedings with that view until after he had obtained payment of the balance of the purchase-money, to which he had no title except on the footing that the sale was not to be set aside. It is now too late for William to repudiate the contract of which he has thus deliberately secured the benefits. It has been strenuously argued that the duty resting on the purchasing partner continued in full force and effect up to and after the settlement of the action, so that James could not rely upon a binding election by William unless and until full disclosure had been made. We know of no authority which supports this proposition, and it seems to us to be contrary to principle. It seems impossible to hold that under such circumstances as existed here William could not, if he chose, come to a binding settlement or compromise or make a binding election not to rescind without full disclosure by James. In our opinion Kekewich, J., was right in the view which he took as to the effect of what was done in January and February, 1901, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KISTLER v. TETTMAR. (a.)

Practice—Attachment—Disobedience of order—Personal service—Knowledge of order—Evasion of service.

On an application for a writ of attachment for disobedience of an order of the court, if it appears that the person against whom the attachment is sought knew of the existence of the order and evaded service of it, he cannot avail himself of the objection that personal service has not been effected upon him.

Appeal from an order of Phillimore, J., for the issue of a writ of attachment against the defendant, Mrs. Tettmar.

On the 3rd of June, 1904, judgment in the action was obtained against the defendant in default of appearance for £87.

On the 15th of July the judgment creditor obtained an order directing that the judgment debtor should attend before a master on the 23rd of July for the purpose of being orally examined as to what debts were owing to her and whether she had any means of satisfying the judgment. The memorandum required by ord. 41, r. 5, was indorsed on the order.

On the 18th of July an attempt was made to serve the order on the defendant at the house where she was living with her husband at Eastbourne. According to the affidavit of the clerk who was instructed to serve the order, he went to the house and the door was opened by the defendant's husband, who informed him that the defendant was within but could not see him; that he explained to the husband the nature of his business; that the husband then went in to inform the defendant, and on returning to the door informed him that the defendant could not see him, and would not make any appointment to see him; that he then handed to the husband a copy of the order and £1 for conduct money, and requested him to hand them to the defendant; and that on the husband's refusing to take them he left them on the door-mat.

The defendant did not attend before the master on the 23rd of July, and the examination was adjourned to the 26th of July, the master directing that notice of the adjourned appointment should be sent to the defendant by letter to her address. A letter to that effect was sent, and came into the hands of the defendant's husband, who instructed a solicitor to attend the adjourned appointment.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 26th of July a clerk of the solicitor attended before the master and stated that the defendant was too ill to attend. The master thereupon adjourned the examination to the 2nd of August, to enable an affidavit of a medical man to be produced.

On the 28th of July the solicitor who was instructed by the defendant's husband wrote a letter to the plaintiff's solicitors saying that he had discovered that the service of the order for examination was effected by leaving a copy of it with a man at the house, which was no service on the defendant, and the letter also stated that the defendant was ill and incapable of travelling to London, and suggested that she might be examined at her house at Eastbourne.

The defendant did not attend on the 2nd of August, nor was any affidavit from a medical man produced.

On the 3rd of August the plaintiff took out a summons for a writ of attachment against the defendant for non-compliance with the order of the 15th of July.

At the hearing of the summons on the 9th of August, Phillimore, J. ordered that a writ of attachment should issue, the writ to lie in the office for seven days, and not to be executed if the defendant attended an appointment before the master before the vacation.

On the 12th of August an application was made to Phillimore, J., on behalf of the defendant to vary his order of the 9th of August. In support of the application an affidavit of the defendant's medical attendant, sworn on the 11th of August, was produced, in which he stated that she was, owing to illness, unfit to make the journey to London or submit to the examination, and that he had forbidden her to leave the house, and had given instructions to her husband that business matters were not to be mentioned to her. An affidavit by her husband sworn on the same date was also produced, in which he stated that, when the clerk called on the 18th of July, he told him that it was impossible for him to see the defendant on account of her extreme ill-health and that she was then in bed; that upon the clerk producing a document and £1 and asking him to hand them to the defendant, he told him that he could not on any account comply with his request, as to mention or discuss matters of business with her in her then state of health would have serious results, and that the clerk then left the document and the £1 on the door-mat and went away. He denied that he at any time went within and mentioned the matter to the defendant, or that he returned and informed the clerk that the defendant could not see him and would make no appointment to see him, and he stated further that, having been instructed by the doctor who was attending the defendant to keep all matters of business away from her, he came to the conclusion that the only course to adopt was to forward the document and the £1 to his solicitor, which he did.

Phillimore, J., discharged his former order, and made an order that a writ of attachment should issue, and should lie in the office for seven days from the date of the order, and if by that time the sum of £25 was paid by the defendant to the plaintiff's solicitors, then until the seventh day of the next sittings, otherwise the writ to issue.

The sum of £25 was paid accordingly, and the judgment debtor appealed.

Frank Mellor, for the judgment debtor.—A writ of attachment cannot be allowed to issue for disobedience to an order, unless the order has been personally served on the person against whom the writ is sought: see ord. 41, r. 5; In re Cunningham, 55 L. T. 766; In re Holt, 27 W. R. 485, 11 Ch. D. 168.

Llewelyn Davies, for the judgment creditor.—Where the person against whom the attachment is sought knows of the existence of the order and is evading service, the court will dispense with the necessity for personal service.

STIRLING, L.J.—As I understand this case, the learned judge in making the order for the writ of attachment to issue proceeded on this ground, that the judgment debtor knew of the order for her examination and was evading service of it, and that in those circumstances the objection that personal service of it has not been effected ought not to avail her. In my opinion the learned judge was right in the view which he took. The latest case which I can discover on the subject is Hyde v. Hyde, 36 W. R. 708, 13 P. D. 166. That was a case of sequestration against the property of a married woman for not complying with an order for the delivery of her children to her husband, and the same objection was taken, viz., that there had been no personal service of the order. There Cotton, L.J., said: "It is true that as a general rule no order will be made for sequestration or attachment unless it can be shown that there has been personal service of the order disobeyed, but there are exceptions to that rule. If it were proved, for instance, that the person was actually in court at the time the order was made, service would be unnecessary in order to obtain process for contempt, and personal service is also dispensed with if it is shown that the reason why there has been no personal service is that the person to be served has evaded service." Although that was a case of sequestration, I have no doubt that Cotton, L.J., was accurate in stating that the same rule applied to attachment, for it has always been held that a person cannot be in a position to obtain a writ of sequestration unless he is in a position in which he could obtain a writ of attachment. Then was the judgment debtor evading service? It may be that it would have been a better course if, instead of the clerk leaving the copy of the order with the husband, an application had been made for an order for substituted service under ord. 67, r. 6. But the question is whether the case comes within the rule laid down by Cotton, L.J. On considering the facts of the case, I am of opinion that the judgment debtor was evading service. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It was argued that the rule requiring personal service of an order, before a writ of attachment for disobedience to it could be issued, admitted of no exception, and that therefore a writ of attachment could not be issued in this case, although the judgment debtor knew of the order for examination, and was evading service of it. But the object of the rule is to make sure that the person against whom the order has been made has knowledge of the order, and in my opinion the authority referred to by Stirling, L.J., shows that the rule has an obvious and necessary exception where the knowledge which personal service is designed to give is obtained in another way, and where personal service is being evaded.

Appeal dismissed.

SEDDON AND LONDON SALT CO. (LIMITED) v. NORTH-EASTERN SALT CO. (LIMITED) AND OTHERS. (a.)

Company — Misrepresentation — Purchase of shares — Contract completed—Rescission.

Rescission will not, in the absence of fraud, be decreed of a contract for the purchase of shares in a company after the contract has been completely carried out by transfer and registration. The rule being the same in the case of choses in action in this respect as in the case of a conveyance of land Repudiation of a purchase of shares in a company on the ground of misrepresentation must be made at the earliest possible moment. Mere silence will not amount to misrepresentation.

Action.

The plaintiff Seddon was a salt manufacturer and merchant at Middlewich, and sold salt on the London market.

The defendants, the North-Eastern Salt Co. (Limited), traded at Middlesbrough, and their business was to sell salt, and in particular to sell on the London market and elsewhere the salt made by the defendants, the Cleveland Salt Co. (Limited), the Tees Salt Co. (Limited), Sir Christopher Furness, the Owners of the Middlesbrough Estate (Limited), and the Salt Union (Limited) (hereinafter called the salt manufacturing firms), who were the holders or owners or beneficially entitled to substantially the whole of the shares of the North-Eastern Salt Co. The last defendant was G. Hewett, who was formerly the managing director of the London Salt Co., who were the other plaintiffs in this action.

The business of the London Salt Co. originally belonged to a firm of salt dealers of the name of Burford, who became bankrupt, and it was sold on the 8th of November, 1902, for £3,250 to one Watson, a director of one of the defendant companies.

On the 11th of February, 1903, the London Salt Co. was formed, with a capital of £5,000 in shares of £1 each, and 3,320 shares were held by the salt manufacturing firms other than the Salt Union and their nominees, and 1,680 shares by the defendant Hewett, the managing director of the company. The company traded in London in salt and drysalt goods (among other things), and part of their business was the disposal in the London market of salt consigned by the defendants, the North-Eastern Salt Co. and the salt manufacturing firms.

In September, 1903, the plaintiff Seddon entered into negotiations for the acquisition of the business of the London Salt Co. by the purchase of all the shares in that company.

The negotiations were carried on with Grigg, the manager of the North-Eastern Salt Co., Storr, who was a director of the Cleveland Salt Co. and chairman of the London Salt Co., and the defendant Hewett.

On the 23rd of September Seddon had an interview with Hewett and Storr, when he alleged that they represented and warranted to him that up to the 30th of September, 1903, the company had made a trading loss of only £200 or not more than £250, and that on the faith of such representation and warranty, which he alleged were made on behalf of the defendants the salt manufacturing firms and by Hewett on his own behalf, he purchased the 1,680 shares of the defendant Hewett, on which 17s. 6d. had been paid, for £1,670, and the remaining 3,320 shares for £2,905.

On the other hand, Storr said he told the plaintiff that the only information he had as to the losses of the company was from the weekly profit and loss sheets, which showed that the loss was something about £200 and not more than £250, and that Hewett said nothing as to the losses.

As part of the arrangement Hewett resigned his position of managing director.

The plaintiff Seddon also agreed with the salt manufacturing firms as part of the transaction to take from the North-Eastern Salt Co. all the supplies of coarse salt required by the London Salt Co. for a period of seven years.

The transfers of the shares were dated between the 9th and 13th of October, but the registration did not take place till the 6th of November.

The plaintiff Seddon took over the business of the London Salt Co. on the 9th of October, 1903, and at once made an investigation of the books as to the position of the company, and discovered that the said representation and warranty on the faith of which he had acquired the shares in the company and paid the purchase-money was untrue. The plaintiff alleged that the loss which the company had made up to the 30th of September, 1903, as shown by the company's accounts as afterwards audited, instead of being from £200 to £250, was not less than £1,200 without writing off depreciation for casks and vans; and that the total trading loss of the company if the accounts were properly and fully taken was not less than £2,400.

The plaintiff further discovered that there were numerous debts of the London Salt Co. remaining due and unpaid, including one of £1,000 to the North-Eastern Salt Co., the existence of which had not been disclosed by Storr and Hewett.

On the 12th of October he wrote to Storr: "I must say that, whilst I was prepared for something pretty startling, the position disclosed by the books exceeds all anticipation. I understood from Mr. Grigg that whilst no profit was made no loss has been experienced. Mr. Hewett said in your presence that he estimated the loss at the outside £250. As a matter of fact the period ending the 30th of September will more probably show a loss of anything between one and two thousand."

Storr replied, on the 13th, that he was very much surprised. The position so far as they knew it by Hewett's reports and the weekly approximated profit and loss sheets showed a balance of loss of £208, and that beyond those figures they knew nothing, and suggesting that it would be better to refrain from further comment until the audit by Peat & Co. was concluded.

The balance-sheet as audited by Peat & Co. showing a loss of over £1,200 up to the 30th of September, was received on the 19th of December. On the 12th of January, 1904, plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendants setting out the representation that the loss would be about £200 but not more than £250, whereas it appeared that the loss actually sustained was about £2,500, and that they were instructed to take proceedings for return of the money overpaid and for an injunction, they alleging that the defendants had been doing business with former customers of the London Salt Co.

The writ in this action was issued on the 20th of January, 1904, and the plaintiff claimed against all defendants except the Salt Union (Limited), a declaration that the purchases of the shares of the London Salt Co. should be rescinded, and the repayment of the purchase-money, and in the alternative for damages, and also an injunction against all the defendants except Hewett to restrain them from selling salt to former customers of the London Salt Co.

There was no allegation of fraud.

There was a very lengthy examination of accounts, the defendants alleging that the balance-sheet of Peat & Co. was drawn up on a wrong basis.

The case against the Salt Union (Limited) was dismissed after the opening of the case for the plaintiffs.

F. Gore-Browne, K.C., and Muir Mackenzie, for the plaintiffs.—The contract for the purchase by the plaintiff Seddon of the shares in the company was induced by an untrue representation as to the amount of the trading losses of the company. There was such a material misrepresentation as that the plaintiff is entitled, provided he can restore matters to their former footing, to have the purchase contract rescinded and to have back his money. A contract can be set aside even after completion for a material misrepresentation.

Younger, K.C., and A. M. Talbot, for the North-Eastern Salt Co.—There is no case against these defendants, who have only purchased salt from the salt manufacturers and sold it to the London Salt Co., and have done nothing else. The plaintiff does not allege that any representation was made by Grigg, the manager of this company, on which he relied; and, further, if Grigg made any representations he was not authorized by the North-Eastern Co. to make them, so that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief against these defendants under the first part of his claim. There is also no evidence on which the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction against these defendants. The plaintiff did not acquire any part of the business of the North-Eastern Salt Co., he only agreed with the salt manufacturers to take all the coarse salt required by the London Salt Co. for seven years from the North-Eastern Salt Co. This does not prevent the North-Eastern Salt Co., who were not parties to it, from selling salt on the London market.

Hughes, K.C., and H. E. Wright, for the Salt Union (Limited).

Montague Lush, K.C., and C. H. Sarjant, for the salt manufacturing firms.—The case made against these defendants is that on the 23rd of September Hewett, in the presence of Storr, made a statement with regard to the trading losses of the company, and it is said that because Storr said nothing upon that occasion, on which he was not making any contract, that he acquiesced. The case against them must fail for the following reasons: (1) The only misrepresentation alleged is on the 23rd of September, which is prior to any negotiation for any sale of the shares by Hewett. (2) Storr had on that date no authority to bind anyone. (3) Silence cannot in the absence of fraud give rise to any action for rescission, because the basis of a rescission on an innocent misrepresentation is that something is said which the speaker honestly believes, but is mistaken about: Smith v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 1059, L. R. 6 Q. B. 597. (4) The plaintiff, upon his own evidence, did not rely upon this representation; it did not induce the contract, and it is always essential to prove that in order to get rescission. (5) The plaintiff, with the knowledge or belief that the loss exceeded £250, affirmed the contract by registering the shares and managing the business. He did not disclaim at the earliest possible moment. (6) On the 12th of January, 1904, the plaintiff, by his solicitor's letter, elected to affirm the contract and sue for damages and an injunction, and that election is final, and he cannot now claim to rescind the contract: Scarf v. Jardine, 30 W. R., at p. 897, 7 App. Cas., at p. 360. (7) There cannot be rescission after conveyance, and it is immaterial whether it is land or shares or anything else. The rescission of a contract is only applicable where there is something still to be done under it. There is no continuing contract subsisting between the plaintiff and the defendants: Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 925. When a contract has been completed and there has been a conveyance a court of equity will not give relief unless fraud is proved. (8) There is no evidence that these alleged misrepresentations were incorrect.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., and T. A. Nash, for the defendant G. Hewett.—There is no case against him. The only representation made by Storr and to which Hewett assented was that the trading loss of the company as shown by the weekly profit and loss sheets was something about £200, and not more than £250, and Seddon did not rely on this representation; and further that before the contract was completed Hewett had said he would not guarantee the figures as to the loss. Repudiation must be prompt, especially in the case of a purchase of shares by someone who practically becomes the owner of the company and has every opportunity of discovering what the true state of affairs is: Brownlie v. Campbell and Sharpley v. Louth and East Coast Railway Co, 2 Ch. D. 685. In the case of innocent misrepresentation where the contract has been completed there can be no rescission: Soper v. Arnold, 36 W. R. 207, 37 Ch. D. 96. Rescission can never be obtained unless the parties can be restored to their original position before the contract was entered into. Hewett resigned his managing directorship as part of the bargain. Seddon cannot restore him to that position if the contract is rescinded.

F. Gore-Browne, K.C., in reply.—The necessity for immediately repudiating a contract has been modified since the decision in the House of Lords in Foster v. Mutual Reserve Co., 20 T. L. R. 715, where a delay of two years was held, under the circumstances of that case, not to deprive the plaintiff of the relief he sought. The defendants have not cited a single case saying that choses in action cannot be retransferred where there has been a misrepresentation of fact, although an innocent one. The cases with regard to choses in action show that after the whole thing has been carried out you can have an order putting the parties back in the same position that they were in before. As examples see Attorney-General v. Ray, 22 W. R. 498, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 397, relating to a grant of an annuity; Newbigging v. Adam, 35 W. R. 597, 34 Ch. D. 582, 37 W. R. 97, 13 App. Cas. 308, and Rawlins v. Wickham, 7 W. R. 145, 3 De G. & J. 304, cases as to partnership. These cases dispose of the distinction between executory and executed contracts. In all the real property cases the principle caveat emptor applies, but I submit that that doctrine does not apply to the purchase of shares where the representation is as to the merits of a business of which the price is ascertained. The partnership cases and grant of annuity cases are much nearer the present case than the real property cases: Lagunas Nitrate Co. v. Lagunas Syndicate (Limited), 48 W. R. 74, [1899] 2 Ch. 392, where Lindley, L.J., said: "That a contract can be set aside in equity on proof that one party induced the other to enter into it by misrepresentations of material facts, although such misrepresentations may not have been fraudulent." This was after the completion of the contract. The reason why a man who takes shares in a company must act promptly and repudiate his position at once is because other shareholders have taken shares or other persons have given credit to the company relying on the fact that he has become a shareholder. In Tennent v. City of Glasgow Bank, 27 W. R. 649, 4 App. Cas. 615, it is put that after the rights of creditors have intervened rescission is altogether impossible. But in the present case the rights of third parties do not arise. The objection to the representation that Storr made is not that it does not state the truth so far as it goes, but that it conceals most material facts with which the plaintiff ought to have been made acquainted. The very concealment of it gives to the truth which was told the character of falsehood: see dictum of Lord Chelmsford in Oakes v. Turquand, 15 W. R. 1201, L. R. 2 H. L., at p. 342. It is immaterial that Storr did not mean to do wrong. If a man having knowledge makes an untrue statement, he must be treated in the same way as if he had made it with an evil intent. Seddon waited until he had received Peat's report before deciding as to keeping the business. On receiving it he consulted his solicitor. The delay after receiving the report was only a reasonable delay.

JOYCE, J.—The litigation in this case arises out of an arrangement for the acquisition by the plaintiff Seddon of the property of the London Salt Co., by the purchase of the shares of that company from the persons who really owned those shares. The claim made by the statement of claim is of a two-fold nature. In the first place it asks for a rescission of the arrangements and for restitution on the ground of misrepresentation. The second part of the claim put forward is for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling on the London market to persons who were customers of the London Salt Co. prior to the said date, salt made or consigned by the salt manufacturing concerns. On the second part of the case, it is a little difficult to say on what theory it is founded, but certainly no evidence has been adduced before me in support of the second part of the claim, and I need not say anything more about it.

Now, then, as to the misrepresentation; a claim is founded upon an alleged misrepresentation, and it appears to me, as it has done all through, that the plaintiff's path to succeed in his claim is beset with difficulties. In the first place, there is no allegation of fraud, and, in point of fact, the imputation of fraud upon the defendants has been expressly disclaimed, and properly so. Therefore it is a claim to rescind or set aside, for an innocent misrepresentation, a contract for the sale of property, not executory but executed, and under which nothing whatever still remains to be done.

Lord Campbell lays down the law in reference to this principle, or rather, I should say, states what is the rule on the question, in Wilde v. Gibson, 1 H. L. C., p. 632. He says: "After the very attentive and anxious consideration which this case has received, I have come to the clear conclusion that the decree appealed against ought to be reversed; and I must say that in the court below the distinction between a bill for carrying into execution an executory contract and a bill to set aside a conveyance that has been executed has not been very distinctly borne in mind. With regard to the first, if there be, in any way whatever, misrepresentation or concealment which is material to the purchaser, a court of equity will not compel him to complete the purchase, but where the conveyance has been executed I apprehend, that a court of equity will set aside the conveyance only on the ground of actual fraud." And Lord Selborne, in the case of Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 925, 29 W. R. Dig. 232, says, at p. 936, after explaining the circumstances of that particular case: "The contract is ultimately entered into upon those terms. Passing from the stage of correspondence and negotiation to the stage of written agreement, the purchaser takes upon himself the risk of errors. I assume them to be errors unconnected with fraud in the particulars, and when the conveyance takes place it is not, as far as I know, in either country," that means in Scotland and England, "the principle of equity that relief should afterwards be given against that conveyance, unless there be a case of fraud or a case of misrepresentation amounting to fraud by which the purchaser may have been deceived."

Now I do not entertain the slightest doubt about that being the correct statement of the law. It has been acted upon by Cotton, L.J., in Soper v. Arnold, 36 W. R. 207, 37 Ch. D. 96, and still more recently by Farwell, J. This rule is not only a rule of equity, but it is also a rule of law. In Kennedy v. The Panama and Royal Mail Co., 15 W. R. 1039, L. R. 2 Q. B. 580, Lord Blackburn, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "There is, however, a very important difference between cases where a contract may be rescinded on account of fraud and those in which it may be rescinded on the ground that there is a difference in substance between the thing bargained for and that obtained. It is enough to show that there was a fraudulent representation as to any part of that which induced the party to enter into the contract which he seeks to rescind; but where there has been an innocent misrepresentation or misapprehension it does not authorize a rescission unless it is such as to show that there is a complete difference in substance between what was supposed to be and what was taken, so as to constitute a failure of consideration. For example, where a horse is bought under a belief that it is sound, if the purchaser was induced to buy by a fraudulent representation as to the horse's soundness, the contract may be rescinded. If it was induced by an honest misrepresentation as to its soundness, though it may be clear that both vendor and purchaser thought that they were dealing about a sound horse, and were in error, yet the purchaser must pay the whole price unless there was a warranty; and even if there was a warranty, he cannot return the horse and claim back the whole price unless there was a condition to that effect in the contract."

In my opinion there can be no successful claim after completion for damages in respect of misrepresentation unless that misrepresentation was fraudulent. It appeared to me from the first that the absence of fraud and the absence of any allegation of fraud in this case was a fatal objection to the action, and I should be perfectly justified in disposing of it on those grounds, and those grounds alone, and saying no more about the facts of the case, but I will add just a few words about the facts, as they have been gone into so fully. If the plaintiff be right the contract in question of course is not a void contract, but a voidable contract, and it was the duty of the plaintiff, bearing in mind the peculiar nature of the property, to repudiate the contract at the very earliest possible moment when he found out that any misrepresentation had been made, if, in fact, any misrepresentation was made. In my opinion, the plaintiff did not do this, but taking possession, he went on treating the property as his own in many ways for several months, and continued to do so long after the time when he had the information which would lead him, and ought to have led him at once to the conclusion that he had been misinformed, if in fact he had been misinformed. Of course, I do not forget there is the letter of the 13th of October from Storr, but when you read that letter in connection with the context it is quite plain to my mind that that letter, taken with the preceding letter, or taken with any other letters you like, does not amount to an arrangement that the plaintiff is to be entitled to go on dealing with the property as his own without prejudice to the question of whether he is to be entitled to rescind the contract and repudiate the property or not. As far as I can see, there never has been a suggestion about repudiating this contract, or repudiating the property and rescinding the contract, until the commencement of this action. In the solicitor's letter of the 12th of January, which precedes the commencement of the action, there is not even a suggestion of repudiating the property and rescinding, but all that he says is, "I am going to commence an action and claim against you compensation in damages." I think I ought to add also that upon the whole evidence I am not satisfied that there was any misrepresentation that induced the plaintiff, Seddon, to enter into the contract. I very much doubt whether there was any misrepresentation at all. Seddon's account is that in answer to his question Hewett made some answer and Storr said nothing. In the argument, I was referred to a passage in Lord Campbell's judgment in Walters v. Moryan, 3 De G. F. & J., at p. 724, where he says: "A single word or, I may add, a nod or a wink or a shake of the head or a smile from the purchaser, intended to induce the vendor to believe the existence of a non-existing fact which might influence the price of the subject to be sold, would be sufficient ground for a court of equity to refuse a decree for a specific performance of the agreement." But as far as I know it has never been held that silence amounted to misrepresentation. Of course there may be peculiar circumstances. A statement may have been made to somebody who remained silent, but, as far as I know, silence has never yet been held to amount to misrepresentation. However, Storr and Hewett were both called, and they gave quite a different account of the matter as to what happened, and I think there is no reason to question the veracity of either of them. I think, upon the whole, comparing all the evidence, that practically the only representation that was made, if any, was in effect, that the weekly balance-sheets do not show a loss of more than or as much as £250, and that was a statement which, in my opinion, was not untrue or substantially inaccurate. Further, I am not satisfied that the representation made had the effect of causing Seddon to enter into the contract now sought to be rescinded. It had no effect upon him at all. I think he wanted the business and that he intended to take all the risk, whatever it was. Under these circumstances, of course, that portion of the action founded on misrepresentation fails as well as the other, and it must be dismissed with the usual consequences.

TRENCHARD v. TRENCHARD. (a.)

Will—Construction—Annuity—Charge on land—Estate duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 9, 14.

By his will T. gave to his wife an annuity of £500, and made it a first charge on specific freeholds, of which there was no specific devise.

Held, on the true construction of the will, that this was a mere personal annuity, not payable primarily out of the specific freeholds, but payable out of the personalty.

The statement in Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), at p. 442, discussed and explained.

By his will T. gave to his wife an annuity of £500, so long as she should remain his widow, and made this annuity a first charge on all his freehold properties at Greenwich. After giving various legacies, he devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate otherwise undisposed of upon trust for sale and conversion, and to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies out of the proceeds, and to hold the residuary trust moneys upon certain trusts.

There was no specific devise of the Greenwich property. The residuary legatees contended that the gift to the wife was not an annuity but a rent-charge, and ought to bear its own share of the estate duty payable in respect of the testator's estate.

Rowden, K.C., and Bradford, for the widow.

H. Terrell, K.C., and Clayton, for the trustees and residuary legatees.

WARRINGTON, J.—In this case a question is raised as to the incidence of estate duty. The principal question is whether any part of the estate duty payable in respect of the testator's estate ought to fall upon an annuity given to his widow.

In support of the case for the residuary legatees, who seek to throw a portion of the estate duty on the annuity, it is contended that the annuity in this case is a part of the real estate—that is to say, it is to be treated as a legal rent-charge, payable exclusively or primarily out of the real estate; and that it stands on the same footing as if there had been a specific devise of part of the real estate; and that the case comes within In re Jolly, 48 W. R. 657, [1900] 1 Ch. 292, in which it was decided that the estate duty payable in respect of specifically devised real estate must fall upon that estate.

The material parts of the will are contained in paragraphs 5 and 7.

"5. I give unto my said wife so long as she shall remain my widow an annuity of £500 . . . and I declare that the said annuity shall be a first charge on all my freehold properties situate at Greenwich, in the county of Kent."

"7. I devise and bequeath all my real and personal estate not hereby otherwise disposed of unto my trustees, upon trust . . . to sell, call in, and convert into money the same, or such part thereof as shall not consist of money, and out of the moneys produced by such sale, calling in, and conversion, and with and out of my ready money, to pay my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and the legacies bequeathed by this my will or any codicil thereto, and to stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys and the investments for the time being representing the same (hereinafter called "my residuary estate") upon and subject to the trusts, powers, directions, and conditions hereinafter contained."

At first sight there seems to be little to be said on the words of the will for the contention that the annuity is really part of the real estate. It is an annuity given in the usual form for describing a personal annuity. It is true that it is declared to be a charge on specific real estate, but that again looks at first sight like nothing more than a security for payment of the annuity. According to the general rule, an annuity is included amongst legacies, and I should have thought that that rule would have extended to this annuity, especially as the estate at Greenwich is not specifically devised, but is included amongst the items devised by clause 7.

But I am referred to certain authorities and to Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 442. It is there stated: "A gift of an annuity followed by a direction that it is to be a charge on certain land makes it a charge on that land only, and the personalty is not liable." If that is correct, it is obviously applicable to the will here, and I should be bound to hold that the annuity was a legal rent-charge. But is it correct? I was referred to all the cases which the learned author cites in support of his statement, except Lomax v. Lomax, 12 B. 285, which both parties agree does not support the proposition. But all these cases depend upon the construction of the particular will in each case.

In Shipperdson v. Tower, 1 Y. & C. C. 441, the testator directed his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid, and bequeathed several annuities and pecuniary legacies, and declared that the former should be charged upon his real estate. That was not a charge on specific real estate, but on all his real estate. By a subsequent clause he charged all his real estate with the payment of all his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies, or of such part thereof as his personal estate not specifically bequeathed should be insufficient to pay and satisfy. The annuities were charged on the real estate, and the will expressly gave powers of distress and entry to the annuitants. It was held that the annuities were primarily, if not solely, charged upon the testator's real estate, and that under the term "legacies" the testator did not mean to include annuities. Shipperdson v. Tower therefore stands entirely alone and turns on a question of construction.

In Patching v. Barnett, 51 L. J. Ch. 74, 30 W. R. Dig. 54, the only point to which I need refer is this: The testator devised real estate to trustees upon certain trusts, and by a codicil gave an annuity to E. S. during her life, and charged the same on two specific real estates with usual powers of distress and entry in case the annuity should be in arrear. That is a gift which comes entirely by itself in a codicil, and deals with nothing else than the annuity. The Master of the Rolls dealt with it very much as I have indicated. That case again depended on the construction of the will. The Master of the Rolls thought the case ought to be decided according to the particular instrument, that the true intention of the testator expressed in the codicil was that E. S. should have a rent-charge charged on the estate, and not an annuity. He recognizes the authority of cases which say that "where there is a bequest payable out of personal estate, the mere addition of a charge on real estate does not exonerate the personalty."

That case undoubtedly comes nearest to supporting Mr. Theobald's proposition, but I do not think that it really does support it. In Buckley v. Buckley, 19 L. R. Ir. Ch. D. 544, the head-note is not quite accurate. It is necessary to look at the full statement of the will in the body of the report. The testator gave a great number of annuities or rent-charges. I will take one of them as an example. He says: "I give, devise, and bequeath unto my wife for and during the term of her natural life one annuity or yearly rent-charge of £150, the same to be a first charge on my property in High-street, Belfast, and to be payable on the days hereinafter mentioned." He gives another annuity or yearly rent-charge of £150 to his daughter, to be a second charge on his property in High-street, Belfast. This annuity he limits not only to his daughter, but to her children or other issue; and then he gives to his son Michael £100 a year during his life (not calling it an annuity), to be a third charge upon his property in High-street. Then follows another annuity or yearly rent-charge of £65 a year to another son, to be a fourth charge, and a similar annuity to a third son, to be a fifth charge on the property. Again, on the construction of this will, it seems obvious that what the testator was dealing with was this property, and that he was giving his wife and children charges on it. The Master of the Rolls decided that they were rent-charges and not payable out of the personal estate. He professes to follow Lomax v. Lomax, Shipperdson v. Tower, and Patching v. Barnett. Therefore Buckley v. Buckley also depended upon the construction of the particular will.

In re Thomas, Ir. Rep. [1896] 1 Ch. Div. 427, was an even more special case. The testator devised and bequeathed all his real and leasehold estate to his son L., and, after giving legacies to his daughters and others, directed that his daughters should reside with L., while they remained unmarried, and if any of them should not agree to this, "I direct that my son L. shall pay to them the annual sum of £200, said sum to be paid to them, or any of them, so long as they, or any of them, shall remain unmarried, and I charge all my real and freehold property with the said annual sum of £200, and in case all my said daughters shall marry, then the said annual sum shall cease." It was held that the annuity was charged only on the freeholds, and not on the leaseholds or other personalty. What was more natural than to find that the testator had charged that annuity on the real estate which he had given to his son? Moreover, the £200 is charged on freeholds only, and not on leaseholds. It is not an annuity at all; it is a charge on the freehold property. I conclude, therefore, that the statement in Theobald on Wills is not, as it stands, an accurate statement of the law. It is only accurate if it is read to be "a gift of an annuity, followed by a direction that it is to be a charge on certain land only, makes it a charge on that land only, and the personalty is not liable, if, according to the true construction of the instrument, that is the result."

Putting that aside, what is the position, when in the absence of anything else to lead to an opposite conclusion, a testator gives an annuity and charges it on real estate? For that purpose I will refer to Paget v. Huish, 11 W. R. 636, 1 H. & M. 663. Page-Wood, V.C., at p. 667, says: "The question on this special case is one which very frequently arises, whether certain annuities are given only out of particular property, or whether, though they be charged primarily on that, the personal estate of the testator is liable to make good any deficiency. There is also a further question whether the annuities are payable out of corpus, or only out of income. As to the first point, the authorities may be ranged under three heads. . . . The first class is where you have a simple gift of a legacy or annuity, with a mere charge upon real estate; and there the personal estate is not only not exonerated, but remains primarily liable, just as in the case of a charge of debts. Another class is where the legacy or annuity is a specific gift out of real estate which is assumed to be sufficient to cover the amount. There the personal estate is in no way liable, and if the specific fund fails the gift must fail with it. The third class is intermediate to these, when a legacy or annuity is, as it is termed, demonstrative, there being a clear general gift, but a particular fund pointed out as that which is to be primarily liable, on failure of which the general personal estate remains liable."

Under which class does this annuity fall? I think it comes within the first class. It is contended that there is something in this will which enables me to hold that this is a mere rent-charge. It is said that since the Conveyancing Act, 1882, every annuitant has the right of distress and entry as a security for his annuity; that I must presume that the testator knew that, and therefore omitted to insert express powers of distress and entry in the gift; and therefore that this case is on all fours with Patching v. Barnett. But I have to determine this case as a question of construction. It goes no further to show that the testator knew that the annuitant would have powers of distress and entry; because, even if this were a personal annuity, since the Conveyancing Act, if it was charged on land, the annuitant would have powers of distress and entry. I conclude that this is a mere personal annuity, not payable primarily out of the Greenwich estate, but payable, I will not say primarily, out of the personalty. This is a mixed fund and the annuity is payable in the same manner as the other legacies out of the mixed fund, but with a charge on the Greenwich property.

I may say (though I need not deal with the question) that I can see a great deal of difference between a direction to pay testamentary expenses out of personalty and a direction to pay them out of a mixed fund. I think an argument may well be founded on that distinction, but I need not decide anything of the kind now. I hold that this is simply a legacy, payable like the other legacies, and the incidence of the estate duty will follow from that.

ROUSE v. DIXON. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Request for arbitration—Answer by respondent—Abandonment of proceedings—Right to institute subsequent proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1 (2) (b).

The plaintiff, a workman, having in the course of his employment sustained personal injuries, gave notice thereof to the defendant, his employer, and made a formal request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The defendant filed an answer that the building on which the plaintiff was working at the time of the accident did not exceed thirty feet in height, and that consequently the Act did not apply. The plaintiff thereupon gave notice of abandonment of his claim for compensation under that Act, and the proceedings were abandoned, the defendant being paid the costs incurred by him in consequence thereof. Subsequently the plaintiff commenced an action claiming damages from the defendant in respect of the same injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the workman, by filing the request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and by abandoning his claim under that Act when he found that the Act did not apply, and having costs allowed against him, had not exercised his option under section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, so as to debar him from bringing his action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

Appeal of the plaintiff from a decision of his Honour Judge the Hon. A. Russell, sitting at Croydon County Court.

The question raised in this case was whether a workman who had made a claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and which claim he had abandoned after an answer had been filed by the employer to the workman's request for arbitration, was debarred from bringing an action for damages in respect of the same injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

The plaintiff, a workman in the employ of the defendant, on the 8th of September, 1903, sustained injuries through an accident arising in the course of his employment in certain building operations.

On the 30th of September, 1903, the plaintiff served a notice of the injury on the defendant, and on the 14th of October made a formal request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The defendant filed an answer to that request stating, inter alia, that the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation under that Act as the building on which the accident occurred was under thirty feet high.

The plaintiff thereupon gave notice of abandonment of his claim for compensation under that Act, and the matter, therefore, not being proceeded with, the defendant was awarded the costs which he had incurred in respect thereof.

On the 21st of January, 1904, the plaintiff commenced an action claiming damages from the defendant in respect of the same injuries under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

At the trial of the action on the 1st of March, 1904, the defendant took the preliminary objection that the plaintiff, having made a request for arbitration for the assessment of compensation in respect of the same injuries under the Workmen's Compensation Act, had exercised his option under section 1, sub-section 2 (b), of that Act, his action under the Employers' Liability Act was barred.

The learned county court judge upheld the defendant's contention, and gave judgment for the defendant without hearing the case on its merits.

From this decision the plaintiff now appealed.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), provides:

Section 1.—"(1) If in any employment to which this Act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as hereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule to this Act. (2) Provided that: . . . (b) When the injury was caused by personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, or of some person for whose act or default the employer is responsible, nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer, but in that case the workman may, at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act; but the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation for injury to a workman by accident arising out and in the course of the employment both independently of and also under this Act, and shall not be liable to any proceeding independently of this Act, except in case of such personal negligence or wilful act as aforesaid."

By section 7, sub-section 1, the Act does not apply to employment on, in, or about a building which does not exceed thirty feet in height.

Broxholm, for the plaintiff.—The learned county court judge was wrong. The object of section 1, sub-section 2 (b), is only to prevent the employer being made to pay twice over, and it does not enact that when once a workman has made a claim under the Act he is debarred from making any other claim at common law or under any other statute. There has been no decision upon the merits in respect of the first claim, which was abandoned as soon as it appeared that the building on which the plaintiff was working did not exceed thirty feet in height, and the plaintiff cannot therefore be said to have exercised an option which can be effective. Edwards v. Godfrey, 47 W. R. 551, [1899] 2 Q. B. 333, only decided that, if a workman desires to claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act after he has failed on a claim made independently of that Act, he can only do so in accordance with the procedure provided by section 1, sub-section 4, of that Act. The case of Beckley v. Scott & Co., [1902] 2 Ir. Rep. 504, decided by the Court of Appeal in Ireland (Holmes, L.J., dissenting), and affirming the judgment of the King's Bench Division, is an authority for the proposition that an abortive proceeding under the Act of 1897 can be no bar to bringing an action under the Employers' Liability Act. [He was stopped by the court].

Griffith Jones, for the defendant.—Although the Workmen's Compensation Act gives to a workman a new and additional remedy in the event of personal injury, it provides by section 1, sub-section 2 (b), that he must exercise his option as to which remedy he will pursue—whether he will proceed for compensation under that Act, or bring his action at common law, or under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. If he elects to proceed under the Workmen's Compensation Act he is debarred from bringing his action at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act. Edwards v. Godfrey decided that when once the option has been exercised no other proceedings can be taken, except as provided by section 1, sub-section 4. The decision of the majority of the court in Beckley v. Scott, it is true, is inconsistent with Edwards v. Godfrey, but the facts in the former case are identical with the present, and Holmes, L.J., there points out, at p. 534, that "when an option is given to a person to take either of two courses he is not to take both." The learned county court judge was therefore right in holding that the plaintiff had exercised his option, and that he was barred from claiming under the Employers' Liability Act.

Broxholm replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—After the differences of opinion which have been expressed by the judges in the Irish Courts upon this question, it is impossible not to see that the question raised is one of difficulty. But for those expressions of differences of opinion I should not, speaking for myself, have felt much difficulty in coming to the conclusion to which I have come, that the learned county court judge was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain this action. As I have often pointed out, this Workmen's Compensation Act is not an Act which pretends to deal in express terms with every particular case which may arise. A great many of its provisions are not framed in legal language at all, and that has to be borne in mind in construing the Act. There are various cases in which difficulties may arise in the application of the Act, and in such cases we have to bear in mind the main object of the Act.

In this case, the accident having happened on the 8th of September, the plaintiff commenced proceedings by filing a request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act. He was then met by the answer that the accident occurred at a building which did not exceed thirty feet in height. That being so, the workman abandoned his proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and subsequently began the present proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act. Now it is said that because the workman has in effect said, "I admit I was wrong and that I am not entitled to the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act," his rights independently of that Act are gone, and that he is barred from bringing an action under the Employers' Liability Act. I am only adopting the language of Fitzgibbon and Walker, L.JJ., in the case of Beckley v. Scott & Co., when I say that I cannot accept that contention unless I am driven to it by clear words in the statute.

Section 1 (2) (b) says that when the injury was caused by the personal negligence or wilful act of the employer, "nothing in this Act shall affect any civil liability of the employer"—and that indicates a civil liability in the employer, and the right was given to the workman, at his option, either to claim compensation under the Act, or to take the same proceedings as were open to him before the Act. Therefore that shows that the workman was entitled to compensation; but the section goes on to say that the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation both independently of and also under the Act. To my mind the language of that sub-section points plainly to one or other of these remedies—that is, under the Act, or at common law, or under the Employers' Liability Act—being pursued; and I think that the objection to the workman proceeding under the latter Act because he had already made a claim, which he was not entitled to pursue, ought not to prevail. Now, do the words "may at his option" include the mere sending in of a claim? It seems to me that the exercise of the option is not final until the case has been tried on its merits. There is nothing in this section to show that because a workman has withdrawn from a proceeding which he found he could not pursue successfully, and has paid costs, the employer is free from liability. The section was really intended to prevent the employer having to pay two compensations.

I now come to the authorities. The case of Edwards v. Godfrey, decided by the Court of Appeal, was a decision on sub-section 4 of this section. Now, section 1 (4) of the Act provides: "If, within the time hereinafter in this Act limited for taking proceedings, an action is brought to recover damages independently of this Act for injury caused by an accident, and it is determined in such action that the injury is one for which the employer is liable in such action, but that he would have been liable to pay compensation under the provisions of this Act, the action shall be dismissed; but the court in which the action is tried shall, if the plaintiffs shall so choose, proceed to assess such compensation, and shall be at liberty to deduct from such compensation all the costs which, in its judgment, have been caused by the plaintiff bringing the action instead of proceeding under this Act." Now that is manifestly a provision in favour of both parties, to the workman as giving him under this section a right to claim compensation, after he has failed in an action to recover damages, and to the employer, as he obtains the deduction of the costs of the action from the compensation to be paid to the workman. All that Edwards v. Godfrey decides is that, unless a workman who has failed in an action under the Employers' Liability Act, then and there, makes an application to the judge trying the action for assessment of compensation, he cannot at a subsequent date initiate proceedings for compensation under the Act. A. L. Smith, L.J., there says, after pointing out that a fresh action could not be brought: "The respondent"—the workman—"has availed himself of the right given him by that sub-section; he has exercised his option in favour of bringing a common law action, which has failed. Having been defeated in this action, there would, but for the provisions of section 1, sub-section 4, have been an end of any claim by the respondent against the appellant in respect of the injury. That sub-section, however, is in favour of the workman, and gives him a very great advantage where he has exercised his option, and finds too late that he has exercised it in the wrong way."

The Irish judges in the case of Beckley v. Scott & Co. very rightly criticize any attempt to extend the decision of Edwards v. Godfrey. To my mind the reasoning in that case is unanswerable. Mr. Griffith Jones has admitted that if the Irish case were an authority it would be against him. In my opinion the decision of Edwards v. Godfrey is not an authority in this case. No doubt questions of difficulty may arise under section 6; but in my opinion that section has nothing to do with the point here. Section 1 (2) (b) of the Act clearly recognizes the liability of an employer at common law, and under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, as still existing; it merely provides that he shall not have to pay twice. A workman is only debarred from taking alternative proceedings where he has exercised an effective option. Where the workman has acquiesced in a preliminary objection to proceedings which he has by mistake commenced and has been ordered to pay the costs of those proceedings, I do not think he is debarred from bringing an action to recover damages under the Employers' Liability Act. For these reasons, I think the learned county court judge ought to entertain this case on its merits.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. But for a certain expression used by A. L. Smith, L.J., in the case of Edwards v. Godfrey, I should have thought that the language of section 1 (2) (b) was quite clear. The question turns on what the Act means. The words are: "The workman may at his option." That must mean the exercise of an option by the workman when he has an option, and that it does not apply to a case where the workman has no real option and where there is no liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act—where, as in this case, the workman has filed a request for arbitration under the Act, and then, finding that the building in which the accident occurred is less than thirty feet in height, or some other fact depriving him of his claim, has withdrawn his request. In such a case no effective option is exercised. The workman can only exercise an option where an option really exists, and not where an alternative is adopted which according to the facts cannot exist. To my mind, the reasoning of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Ireland in the case of Beckley v. Scott & Co., is entirely satisfactory. The court in that case was dealing with a state of facts similar to those in this case, where the workman was never able to claim compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act at all.

As regards the case of Edwards v. Godfrey, there is one expression—and, I think, only one—in that case which can be relied upon as supporting the employer's contention that the workman had exercised an option which is irrevocable. A. L. Smith, L.J., said in that case: "Having been defeated in this action, there would, but for the provisions of section 1 (4), have been an end of any claim by the respondent against the appellant in respect of the injury." That does seem to me to mean that the mere bringing of an action was the exercise of an option which would have debarred the workman from bringing any further claim in respect of the injury, but for the provisions in section 1, sub-section 4. But that observation was quite unnecessary for the decision of the case. The real substance of the decision in Edwards v. Godfrey was, as my lord has said, that this special procedure having been provided in section 1 (4), if that remedy is not utilized as provided by the sub-section, any other must be barred by implication, and in such a case, therefore, the workman has no other remedy. And, if I may say so, that decision seems to me perfectly right. I think, therefore, the workman in this case is not barred from proceeding under the Employers' Liability Act.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree, and I am glad not to have to differ from the judgments of my lord and my brother, though I have felt more difficulty than they have felt, in coming to the decision at which I have now arrived, as I have been strongly impressed by the reasoning of the minority of the court in Beckley v. Scott & Co, and also—though not by the decision—by the trend of the reasoning in the judgment of A. L. Smith, L.J., in Edwards v. Godfrey. But it seems to me the expression quoted by my brother Wills from that judgment is rather an expression of opinion, and can only be treated with respect, and not as binding upon us. And, further, my difficulty, which I ought to state, having regard to the great importance of the question raised, arises upon what is the fair and natural interpretation to be put upon section 1 (2) (b) of the Act. The section distinctly lays down that the workman may at his option do certain things. What is it that he may do? It is not that he may either obtain compensation under this Act or damages at common law or under the Act of 1880. But he may, "at his option, either claim compensation under this Act, or take the same proceedings as were open to him before the commencement of this Act." It would have been very easy to say he may either obtain damages or compensation. In section 6 the word used is "proceed"—"the workman may at his option proceed," and the word "proceed" would seem to be satisfied by any formulated claim. For these reasons I have had a difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the decision of the learned county court judge was wrong in upholding the employer's contention that the workman had exercised his option.

I am not, however, prepared to differ from the judgments of the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Wills, and I am glad to take the view of the section that "option" here means and includes a right to take proceedings either at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act, after making a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act which the workman was not entitled to make and had not proceeded with. The Act may possibly be construed as imposing only a unilateral restriction, so as to show that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Edwards v. Godfrey may be right as well as our present decision; because, as that sub-section (sub-section 4) is one which enables, in a particular case, compensation to be assessed under the Act of 1897 in a proceeding taken under the earlier Act, so it is fair to say that if in that particular case that procedure is not followed, then the workman shall be barred. It is possible to construe the Act so as to say that "option" means a right to take proceedings either at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act after making a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act and not proceeding with it when it is found that the claim could not be maintained; and that the only limitation is in the converse case—namely, that if a claim is brought under the Employers' Liability Act and the action is fought out on the merits and dismissed, then in that case the workman must be taken to have exercised his option finally, and to be barred. We have to leave outside our present decision the question whether, if the workman having made a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act had gone on with that claim and fought it on the merits, he could then have brought this action under the Employers' Liability Act. In that case there might possibly be a defence of res judicata to subsequent proceedings under the Employers' Liability Act, as A. L. Smith, L.J., said in Edwards v. Godfrey, but I leave that question open. I confine myself to not dissenting from the judgments which have been delivered, though I must say that I cannot come to the same conclusion as my lord and my brother Wills with certainty.

MENDELSSOHN (Appellant) v. RATCLIFF AND ANOTHER (Respondents). (a.)

Stock Exchange—Broker—Bankruptcy—Completion by jobber with broker's customers—Right of jobber to sue broker—Stock Exchange creditor's right to petition in bankruptcy.

Where a broker on the London Stock Exchange was declared a defaulter, and there were due from him to a jobber £986 in respect of the purchase and sale of shares, and a further sum of £281 paid by the jobber to the official assignee under the Stock Exchange Rules in completing the broker's transactions, then the proceedings in the Stock Exchange liquidation are not a discharge of the broker, but an action is still maintainable against him by the jobber for both sums less the amount of dividend received.

The judgment in the action is sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against the defaulter.

Decisions of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 3, [1902] 2 K. B. 653, and [1903] 1 K. B. 216) affirmed.

These were two appeals. The first was from an order of the Court of Appeal (Collins, M.R., and Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ.) (51 W. R., 3, [1902] 2 K. B. 653), affirming judgment of Mathew, J (50 W. R. 106, [1901] 2 K. B. 844).

The respondents (the plaintiffs in the action) were jobbers on the London Stock Exchange, and at the mid-May settlement, the 15th of May, there became due from the appellant, who was then a broker on the Stock Exchange, the sum of £986 for differences in the purchase and sale of stocks. These contracts were carried over to the end of May settlement. On the 16th of May the appellant was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange, and all his contracts then open closed at the hammer prices under the rules of the Stock Exchange, and in the result a further sum of £281 became due from the appellant's principals, which the respondents received and handed over to the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, as they were required to do under the rules.

(a.) Reported by C. H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the liquidation of the appellant's estate on the Stock Exchange the respondents claimed and received a dividend of 2s. 6d. in the £ in respect of the two sums of £986 and £281. There were other assets out of which a further dividend would be paid, but the amount was doubtful. The respondents brought an action against the appellant to recover the debts due to them, and judgment was given in their favour for the two sums of £986 and £281, less the dividend received. The Court of Appeal affirmed this decision.

Rufus Isaacs, K.C. (H. Carrington with him), for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In following the argument in this case I have had some difficulty, I confess, in knowing what the new point was; so far as I am concerned I have not been able to find anything new. I entirely concur with the judgments which have been pronounced by the original judge and by the Court of Appeal, and it seems to me that they had no alternative but to pronounce the judgments which they did pronounce considering the previous judgments in your lordships' House and the two judgments in Ex parte Ward, 31 W. R. 112, 20 Ch. D. 386, 22 Ch. D. 132.

There is really nothing new in this case; the only suggestion which your lordships have heard from the learned counsel is this—that some very learned persons had not a particular point before their minds and did not give an express judgment upon it. I have been unable to follow that suggestion.

Here is undoubtedly a debt—I do not propose to go through the whole of the circumstances by which that debt was arrived at, nor is it very material—there is a debt, a vested cause of action, and you can only get rid of that debt in one way or another. As Mr. Muir Mackenzie has very justly said, the proceeding under the Stock Exchangle Rules is not a release—he does not suggest that it is a release—there is no express bargain on the subject; but he says, from the fact of its being practically a cessio bonorum you must infer an agreement not to sue. I am wholly unable to follow that. I think the answer which has already been given by Mr. Rufus Isaacs is a conclusive one. I can find no trace of any bargain which can be relied on to show that there is any impediment to a right to sue.

With reference to the other question, the £281, it seems to me that that depends on totally different grounds. It is under a different contract which has no reference to the question we are discussing here.

I am, as I said originally, unable to follow the subtlety which has invented a new point in this case. Upon the facts it appears to me that there is no answer to the plaintiffs' demand; and under these circumstances I move your lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I do not think that Mr. Muir Mackenzie has made out from the contract in this case either any implied satisfaction or any agreement not to sue.

Lord JAMES.—If this had been a case of first impression, I should have been disposed to give considerable weight to the able argument of Mr. Muir Mackenzie; but I think the weight of authority is so strong against the case of the appellant that it is impossible for your lordships not to say that this appeal must be dismissed.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion. The first point that was made by Mr. Muir Mackenzie and which deserved attention was based entirely upon the possibility of inferring from these rules an agreement not to sue. If that could be made out he would be right; but when the rules are looked at it appears to be absolutely impossible to arrive at any such inference. The inference is negatived completely by rule 54, to say nothing about the general view of the rules as a whole. In face of rule 54 to say that there is an agreement not to sue is to my mind absolutely impossible. With respect to the £281, it is a sum payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs under a special contract based upon the rules of the Stock Exchange. That is an obligation which creates a debt, and that obligation has never been discharged. I have no doubt that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

SECOND APPEAL.

A bankruptcy notice was served on the appellant and a bankruptcy petition was presented by the respondents against him, founded on the above judgment debt; on this petition a receiving order was made, which order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Muir Mackenzie said it would be useless to argue the second appeal.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I think so. I think it would be impossible for us after the judgment we have given to give judgment in your favour in the second appeal; it would be a contradiction.

Order of the Court of Appeal in each appeal affirmed, and appeals dismissed with costs.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (51 W. R. 308, [1903] 1 K. B. 652) affirmed.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams, Stirling, and Mathew, L JJ.) (51 W. R. 308, [1903] 1 K. B. 652), reversing a judgment of Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. (50 W. R. 155, [1901] 2 K. B. 753).

The facts are set out in the court below. Stirling, L.J., summarized them as follows:

On the 23rd of October, 1891, the railway company served on Lord Gerard, the owner in fee, under their special Acts, a notice to treat in respect of certain specified lands, the notice being in accordance with section 18 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, demanding from him particulars of his estate and interest in such lands and of the claims made by him in respect thereof, and stating that the railway company were willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to compensation to be made for damage that might be sustained by reason of the execution of the works.

On the 12th of January, 1892, Lord Gerard sent in his claim.

On the 14th of October, 1892, an agreement was made between Lord Gerard and the railway company as to the amount of the compensation, and on the 27th of February, 1894, a conveyance of the land by Lord Gerard to the railway company was executed.

On the 14th of June, 1892, before the abovementioned agreement was made or the conveyance executed, a lease was granted by Lord Gerard to the appellant of building land, not comprised in the notice to treat, on which the appellant proceeded to erect houses. It is to be taken that the appellant had no knowledge of the notice to treat having been served when the lease was granted, nor had the railway company any notice of the lease when this agreement with Lord Gerard was entered into or the conveyance executed. Subsequently to the date of the conveyance the railway company executed works which necessitated the lowering of a street on which appellant's land abutted, and thereby injuriously affected such land. The appellant, therefore, claimed from the railway company compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and the sum of £371 10s. was by the award of an arbitrator found as the amount of compensation. The question is whether appellant is entitled to this amount.

McCall, K.C., Horridge, K.C., and W. H. Loraine, for respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case I cannot entertain any doubt that the judgment of the Lords Justices of Appeal was right. The position of things which is here disclosed upon the facts is that at the time when the notice to treat was given Lord Gerard was the owner not only of the land intended to be taken under the powers of the Act, but of other land which might or might not be injuriously affected, without any communication being made by him to the railway company of the possibility of his letting that land for building purposes on a building speculation, and without any communication to the railway company that he had done so. The compensation was ascertained not by the ordinary course of an inquiry by an assessment jury, but by a bargain between the parties. Of course, inasmuch as we have nothing at all before us as to what passed when that amount of £24,000 was agreed upon between the parties, all that we have to do is to look at the situation of the parties and see what they were assessing at that time. What they were assessing at that time is to be ascertained by the notice to treat and the claim made in pursuance of that notice to treat by Lord Gerard. Looking at those documents, it is impossible to doubt that what it was competent to the claimant Lord Gerard to claim, and what, unless it had been withdrawn from the power of the assessment jury, it would have been competent to him to claim before the jury, was compensation in addition to the purchase-money of his land for all injurious affecting of his other land. For my own part I cannot entertain the least doubt that any compensation that he might have claimed he was bound to claim then and there, taking it upon the hypothesis that it was tried before a compensation tribunal. Whether it was tried in that form or not, the theory of the bargain between the parties must be that the amount which was settled is that which would have been settled by a compensation jury. Then what is the bargain? £24,000 is given for all that he could have claimed at that time, and all that he could have claimed at that time included the amount of compensation to which he would have been entitled for any injurious affecting of his lands. As, therefore, between the railway company on the one side and Lord Gerard on the other, it seems to me that that question is finally and absolutely determined by the bargain they agreed to instead of its being settled for them by the compensation tribunal. What happened between the parties to the building speculation and the claimant against the railway company does not affect the position of the railway company at all. That which they have agreed to, which was the foundation of their bargain, was everything that once and for all could have been obtained if they had gone before the compensation tribunal. No question is before us now, and no question can be before us, as to the relation that the settlement between the railway company and Lord Gerard bears to the relations between Lord Gerard and his lessee. I do not enter into the question as to whether he did or did not communicate the facts to the person to whom he was letting his land for 999 years on a building lease. It might be that he might be regarded as having, unknown to the lessee, done something in the nature of a breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment by having placed a disability on that part of the land which he had let for this long term, or it might be that in recovering that amount of money which he did recover he might be considered to be a trustee for so much of the compensation as was appropriate to the deterioration of the land which he had so let. That is another point of view from it might be regarded. I hesitate to make any suggestion because I do not think it would be to the advantage of these parties to encourage the idea of further litigation between them. The only matter with which we are concerned, the question between the railway company on the one side and Lord Gerard on the other, seems to me to be absolutely concluded according to the judgment of the Court of Appeal. That question, I think, has been finally and rightly determined between the parties. It would be a most monstrous thing to suppose, that after the railway company had given compensation, not only for the land that was taken, but for all injurious affecting of other land at the time that the notice to treat was served, without any notice to them of any further relation between the claimant against them and any one else they should be called upon to pay further and other compensation to some one else, although they had paid and satisfied the demand of the claimant, whose claim in the first instance was a claim including all this very compensation which it is now sought to recover against them. The suggestion that this compensation could be recovered again, and by a person to whom Lord Gerard has transmitted his rights of compensation without notice to the railway company certainly would introduce a confusion in the settlement of such matters which I should be very loth indeed to encourage. In these circumstances it appears to me that the judgment of Stirling, L.J., is absolutely right, and I move that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the question between the plaintiff and the railway company, I am unable to see any answer to the argument of Stirling, L.J. I am quite content with his judgment, and I am unable to add anything to it.

Lord LINDLEY.—This case is one of novelty and of great importance, not only to railway companies, but to landowners. I agree entirely in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and I can add really nothing to the judgment of Stirling, L.J. The broad principle appears to me to be that it is not competent for an owner of land who has received notice to treat, to deal with any of his land either taken or injuriously affected by the company so as to increase the burden of the company as regards the compensation to be made in respect of such land or any of it. In this case it would be most unjust to the company to depart from this principle, as the company settled with the owner without notice of his dealings with his land after the notice to treat was given and after his claim was sent in, and he insisted all along on his right to have the streets lowered: see section 13, clause 7, of the special Act, 1886.

From K. B. Div. (Collins, M.R., and Stirling, L.J.) — Dec. 21.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN FRERE AND STAVELEY TAYLOR & CO. AND THE NORTH SHORE MILL CO. (a.)

Practice—Appeal from chambers—"Practice and procedure"—Order to arbitrator to state case—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 19—Judicature Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 16), s. 1, sub-section 4.

Proceedings in an action were stayed under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, upon the ground that there was an agreement to refer the matter to arbitration, and the matter was accordingly referred. In the course of the reference questions of law arose, and one of the parties obtained an order, under section 19 of the Act, from the judge in chambers directing the arbitrator to state a special case for the opinion of the court.

Held, that this was not a matter of practice and procedure within section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894, and that therefore an appeal from the order directing the arbitrator to state a case did not lie direct to the Court of Appeal.

Appeal from an order of Jelf, J., in chambers.

An action was brought in the King's Bench Division by Frere and Staveley Taylor & Co. against the North Shore Mill Co. to recover damages for breach of a contract. The North Shore Mill Co. applied, under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to stay the proceedings in the action upon the ground that the contract contained a submission to arbitration of any dispute or difference arising thereunder.

An order was made staying the proceedings, and the matter was referred to arbitration. In the course of the reference questions of law arose, and Frere and Staveley Taylor & Co. took out a summons (which was headed in the matter of the arbitration and not in the action) under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for an order directing the arbitrator to state a special case for the opinion of the court. Jelf, J., in chambers, made the order.

The North Shore Mill Co. appealed.

Dec. 19.—Danckwerts, K.C. (F. E. Smith with him), for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that the appeal did not lie direct to the Court of Appeal. This is not a matter of practice and procedure within section 1, sub-section 4, of the Judicature Act, 1894. The practice and procedure mentioned in the section must be matters of practice and procedure in connection with a cause or matter in the High Court: Watson v. Petts, 47 W. R. 68, [1899] 1 Q. B. 54; Long v. Great Northern and City Railway Co., [1902] 1 K. B. 813. The present application is not in the action, but in the arbitration.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (G. D. Keogh with him), for the appellants.—The cases relied upon in support of the preliminary objection do not apply. In Watson v. Petts the application was for a prohibition to a county court judge. In Long v. Great Northern and City Railway Co. there was no cause or matter in the High Court, the application being by the railway company for an order to have a question of compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, tried in the High Court. The court treated the matter as being in the Sheriffs' Court. Here there is an action in the High Court which is still alive, though the proceedings in it have been stayed, and the court can at any time remove the stay. A summons to direct an arbitrator to state a case under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, relates to the consultative jurisdiction of the court, and is part of the practice and procedure of the court. In In re Portland Urban District Council v. Tilley & Co., [1896] 2 Q. B. 98, 44 W. R. Dig. 122, a Divisional Court held that an order of a judge at chambers giving leave to revoke a submission to arbitration was a matter of practice and procedure, and that an appeal lay direct to the Court of Appeal. That case is very similar to the present one. In Rasch & Co. v. Wulfert, 52 W. R. 145, [1904] 1 K. B. 118, this court heard an appeal from chambers in a somewhat similar case to the present. The appeal therefore lies to this court.

Danckwerts, K.C., replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—STIRLING, L.J.—In this case, which was heard before Collins, M.R., and myself, we reserved our decision upon the preliminary point raised, in order that we might consider whether the principle of the two cases of Watson v. Petts and Long v. Great Northern and City Railway Co. applied to the present case, where the facts are different. We have considered those cases, and have come to the conclusion that the principle of those cases applies and that the preliminary objection must prevail. The appeal will therefore be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CORPORATION OF OLDHAM v. BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Local government—Education—School board—Borough council—Acts of Parliament—Transfer of property—Vesting—Consols—Instrument of transfer—National Debt Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 71), s. 22—National Debt (Stockholders' Relief) Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 39), s. 4—Education Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 42), ss. 5, 25; Schedule II., clause 1.

On the appointed day on which the Education Act, 1902, comes into operation in any particular district the school board of that district is abolished by section 5 of the Act, and ceases to exist, and by virtue of clause 1 of Schedule II. of the Act the property of the school board is thereupon transferred to and becomes vested in the new education authority without the necessity of any instrument of transfer. This applies to stocks which, under the National Debt Act, 1870, could only be transferred by entry in books of transfer kept by the Bank of England, and the bank, consequently, cannot require such entry to be made or any further instrument of transfer to be executed even with regard to such stock.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J.

The action was brought by the Corporation of Oldham against the Bank of England to obtain possession of annuities which were standing in the books of the bank in the name of the Oldham School Board.

The mayor, alderman, and burgesses of the borough of Oldham, acting by their council as the council for the county borough of Oldham, were, under the Education Act, 1902, the local education authority for the district of the borough.

The Act came into operation in this district on the 1st of January, 1904, which was the day appointed by the Board of Education. On that day there stood in the books of the Bank of England, in the name of the Oldham School Board, the sum of £780 0s. 2d., 2½ per cent. Annuities, representing moneys set aside by the school board to meet liabilities in respect of loans raised for the erection of elementary schools within their district.

The plaintiffs alleged that on the "appointed day," i.e., the 1st of January, 1904, the school board ceased to exist by virtue of the provisions of the Act, that they had succeeded to, and had since exercised and were now exercising, the powers vested in the school board, and that the property of the school board, including the £780 0s. 2d. Annuities, had become vested in them and that no further transfer was necessary.

The bank, on the other hand, alleged that these annuities formed part of the National Debt, of which they had the management under the National Debt Act, 1870. Under that Act the person or corporation in whose name stock was standing in the books of the bank, or their attorneys, were alone entitled to transfer the stock, and any transfer must be signed by the stockholder or his attorney in the books kept by the bank. And it was enacted that, except as otherwise provided by Act of Parliament, no other mode of transferring stock should be good in law. The Education Act, 1902, did not vest the annuities in the plaintiffs so as to render any further transfer unnecessary, but they could only be transferred by entry in the books signed by the attorney of the board, and in no other manner.

The plaintiffs then brought the present action, claiming—(1) a declaration that they were entitled under the provisions of the Act to the £780 0s. 2d., and to the dividends due or to accrue due in respect thereof, and to all the rights of registered stockholders in respect of the annuities; and (2) an order on the defendants to pay to them the dividends now due or to accrue due in respect of the annuities, and to register the plaintiffs in the books of the bank as entitled to the annuities.

Farwell, J., held that the school board had not been dissolved for all purposes; that the annuities were not vested in the plaintiffs by the statute, but were still vested in the school board, so that a transfer was necessary; but that the equitable title to the annuities was vested in the plaintiffs, and that they could themselves execute a transfer under section 4 of the National Debt (Stockholders' Relief) Act, 1892.

The plaintiffs appealed.

By section 5 (1) of the Education Act, 1902: "The local education authority shall, throughout their area, have the powers and duties of a school board and school attendance committee under the Elementary Education Acts, 1870 to 1900, and any other Acts, including local Acts, and shall also be responsible for and have the control of all secular instruction in public elementary schools not provided by them; and school boards and school attendance committees shall be abolished."

By Schedule II., clause 1: "The property, powers, rights, and liabilities (including any property, powers, rights, and liabilities vested, conferred, or arising under any local Act or any trust deed) of any school board or any school attendance committee existing at the appointed day shall be transferred to the council exercising the powers of the school board."

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., and R. J. Parker, for the appellants.—The Education Act, 1902, in this case came into operation on the 1st of January, 1904, which was the appointed day fixed under section 27 (2). On that day the school board was "abolished" under section 5. That is to say, it ceased to exist, and there was henceforth no person who could transfer its property. On the school board thus ceasing to exist, its property was automatically transferred to and became vested in the council under clause 1 of Schedule II. That "transfer" in the Act means "vest in" is shown by sections 6, 7, 18 (1) (d), 20 (b). Hyde Corporation v. Bank of England, 21 Ch. D. 176, and Morton v. Bank of England, 52 W. R. 393, [1904] 1 Ch. 664, are in our favour.

Latham, K.C., Upjohn, K.C., and Howard Wright, for the bank.—The bank is bound by the National Debt Act, 1870, ss. 22 to 25, to allow transfers of stock by entries in its books alone. Stock can be vested by statute, but our contention is that the established practice of the bank will not be interfered with without express words, which are not found in this statute. The Act contemplates the necessity for further transfers, it does not rely on automatic vesting. In section 5 "abolished" means abolished for the purposes of that section, not that the school board shall cease to exist for all purposes whatsoever.

No reply was called for.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—The particular question that we have to decide in this case is whether the terms of the second schedule of the Education Act of 1902 are such that the property, powers, rights and liabilities of any school board or school attendance committee existing at the appointed day are transferred by virtue of or under the Act of Parliament to the council exercising the powers of the school board, or whether some additional instrument is necessary before such transfer can be affected.

The suggestion is that, whatever may be the case with regard to other property, at all events in respect of stock which the Bank of England has to deal with and with respect to which, generally speaking, the practice is, and for a long time has been, that upon a transfer there is an entry of the transfer in the transfer books of the Bank of England, there is, it is argued, no vesting of the property independently of the execution of some instrument.

Now, part of the argument that was addressed to us was based upon the words "shall be transferred," and I will say something about that presently; but really the argument addressed to us by Mr. Upjohn did not ultimately rely upon the effect of the words being "shall be transferred" instead of being "shall vest," or similar words. The final argument addressed to us on behalf of the bank was an argument which would have applied equally whether the words were "shall be transferred" or "shall vest."

I will deal first, and very shortly, with the question of the meaning of the words "shall be transferred." There is no doubt that sometimes one does find in Acts of Parliament somewhat cognate to the present Act of Parliament the words "shall vest" as distinguished from the words "shall be transferred." If one looks at the Local Government Act, 1894, s. 5, sub-section 2, clause (c), one finds these words used, "the legal interest in all property vested either in the overseers or in the churchwardens and overseers of a rural parish," &c., "shall if there is a parish council vest in that council." It is quite true to say that the words used in the Act of 1902 are not "shall vest" but "shall be transferred," but if one considers it there is very good reason for using the future words here, and a reason which is quite consistent with holding that the property on the happening of "the appointed day" was to vest and vest independently of any future or additional instrument. It must be remembered that the Act of Parliament when it passed was contemplating the happening of a future event—the occurrence of a future day—that is, "the appointed day"—and it seems to me that that was quite a sufficient reason for the draftsman employing the words in the future form that he has done here. They were employed in that form in order to make them fit and suitable for what the Legislature contemplated—a future event—the occurrence of a future day, "the appointed day."

Now, the 5th section of the Act of 1902 provides: [His lordship read the section, and continued:] I cannot conceive myself but that the word "abolished" there involves dissolution; it means that the school boards and school attendance committees shall be abolished, and it really is not denied that the effect of that section is that from the happening of "the appointed day" the school board and the committee would be incapable of doing anything. The corporation of the school board would, in fact, by virtue of section 5, be dissolved in the same sense that it would cease to have a legal existence, could not sue, could not be sued, could not hold property, and could not transfer property; therefore if we accede to the argument that has been addressed to us on behalf of the Bank of England—namely, that some additional instrument of transfer or conveyance is essential to the passing of the property notwithstanding the occurrence of "the appointed day," this much is perfectly certain, that that instrument could not be executed by the school board.

Then it is said, "But with reference to the Bank of England and its relation to certain stocks there is an Act of 1892," the National Debt (Stockholders' Relief) Act, c. 39, and reference is made to section 4. It is said that the result of that section is that although a transfer could not be executed by the defunct corporation, the school board, yet a transfer of these stocks might be executed by the new educational body as being a body in whom the right to the stock is vested by Act of Parliament.

Now, I will say something more as to this section presently; but I shall at once point out that it is obvious that that Act of Parliament, if it gets over at all the difficulty arising from the cessation of existence of the school board, can only do so in respect of a very limited subject-matter. It is not suggested that it does so as to all property; it is not suggested that it does so even as to all stocks. It was mentioned in argument by counsel on behalf of the Bank of England that there were certain Colonial Government Stocks, for instance, which would not be governed by that section. The result is that it is quite plain that there is this difficulty about the transfer of property, if you give to the word "abolished" in section 5 that which, it seems to me, is its plain and obvious meaning. Also, we have got the words here "shall be transferred" applied not only to property, but to powers, rights, and liabilities. With reference to property it is quite true that with regard to some sorts of property you require a deed, and it may be in some cases a written transfer; but it is not true of rights and liabilities—at all events it is not true as to liabilities—that any transfer is, according to the general law, either necessary or proper; indeed such a transfer would not, according to law, transfer the property at all. So that the outcome is that those who put forward the argument which has been put forward on behalf of the Bank of England cannot really make it good unless in one section of one Act of Parliament they ask us to give a different meaning to the words "shall be transferred" in the case of some of the subject-matters dealt with by the section from what one would be bound to do in the case of others. It really, to my mind, could not be maintained for one moment that with regard to liabilities or with regard to certain species of property any transfer or additional instrument of transfer was necessary for vesting.

Now I think that it is really unnecessary for me to go at greater length through the numerous matters that one finds in the Education Act of 1902 which go to show, first, that "abolition" is used in the 5th section in its natural sense; and, secondly, that the words "shall be transferred" are used to the intent that the moment that the future day arrives all property of the school board, ipso facto by virtue of and under the Act of Parliament, shall vest in the new educational body without the aid of any additional instrument of any sort or kind.

I said that I would say a word more as to the Act of 1892. I do not know that it is necessary for me to do so, because in the view that I take of this case the question as to the effect of that section is no longer really of any importance. Its only importance arose because Farwell, J., in his judgment relied upon it as showing that in the case of certain stocks, transfers of which are entered in the Bank of England transfer book, you could get over the difficulty of there being no possibility of a transfer by the defunct school board by saying that it might be right that the Bank of England should in accordance with their practice insist upon having a transfer, and that at all events in the case of some stocks—that is to say, the stocks to which the National Debt Act, 1870, applied—you could get a transfer by a transfer being executed by the new educational body as being a body in whom by virtue of an Act of Parliament the right to stock was vested, and as to whom it was said (section 4, sub-section 1), "He shall by virtue of the same provision be deemed to make a valid transfer of the stock and to receive and give a valid receipt for any accrued or accruing dividends." It was said that the Act of 1892 gave an equitable right to the new educational body, and that they might without any transfer being executed even by them to themselves give a valid receipt for any accrued or accruing dividends of stock, and might also execute, afterwards or before, as they thought fit, a transfer to themselves.

As I have not to decide what the construction of that section is, I do not wish to say more than this—that it is my opinion, as at present advised, without absolutely deciding the point, that these words "vested in any persons" in section 4 mean legally vested. That is my view of that section.

Now, having disposed of those matters, I wish to say a word or two upon the argument that was addressed to us, that even assuming that the effect of the Act of 1902 is to immediately vest the property of the school board in the new educational body, yet there is a necessity for an additional deed. It is said in the first instance that it is essential to the long and venerable practice of the Bank of England that there should be some such document. I do not think that that can affect the construction of an Act of Parliament. Then it was suggested that there was something in the nature of this stock which really prevented it from its very nature from being transferred without some instrument of transfer. All I can say in answer to that is, that in so far as that is true (and in a sense it is quite true) it is equally true of a number of other things; it is equally true of every chose in action that if there was not a transfer by the Act of Parliament there might be a necessity for some deed or written transfer in order to accomplish the passing of the particular piece of property. I think that disposes of the argument put forward—namely, that notwithstanding that the words "shall be transferred" must be construed as "shall vest" on the appointed day, we ought not to hold that this stock so vests that the Bank of England ought to act upon the statute without the production of any written instrument. I think they ought.

It was said by Mr. Upjohn that in consequence of the Local Government Act, 1894, in which undoubtedly property, including the property in stocks, did vest without a transfer, an Act was passed in 1895, and he says that the passing of that Act recognized the proposition that the Bank of England ought not to act upon a statutory vesting without the production of some instrument of transfer. I do not agree with that. The Act of 1895 does not seem to me to have done anything of the sort. It recognizes and is passed upon the basis that the effect of the Act of 1894 was that without more the property vests in the person denoted by the statute as being the person in whom the property shall vest; but although that is true, and it does vest, and the Bank of England, until the passing of the Act of 1895, recognized for all purposes the statutory vesting of the property, they, of course, had to assure themselves of the identity of the person; they had to assure themselves that the person who came and claimed to be the statutory appointee or donee of the stocks was in fact the person that he pretended to be. In the statute of 1895 they got that by a certificate of the clerk to the county council. All one can say is, that at present no equivalent Act of Parliament has passed with reference to the Act of 1902. If it is desirable from a business point of view that such an Act of Parliament should pass, I do not suppose the Legislature, when once satisfied of that, from the Bank of England representations, would make any difficulty in passing an Act. I know nothing about how far it is desirable and how far it is not. If it is desirable, then I have no doubt it will be done. But as things stand, in my view it is perfectly plain under this statute that the stocks do vest by virtue of the words in the first clause of the second schedule, and, as far as the Bank of England is concerned, it has an absolute indemnity by the very words of the Act of Parliament, and is not put in any danger or difficulty at all. I do not suppose the Bank of England was thinking principally of any danger to itself, but was really thinking that it would be a matter of public convenience that the same formalities should be gone through in respect of all transfers of stocks, and that it did not matter whether the transfer was a transfer by the terms of an Act of Parliament, or a transfer in any other way inter partes, or anything else. I daresay the bank think that it would be very much more convenient that all transfers should pass through the transfer book. If that is so, they will get legislation to that effect, but I offer no opinion about that.

I think that this appeal ought to be allowed.

ROMER, L.J. — The first clause of the second schedule to the Act of 1902, on which the question we have to decide turns, is certainly not happily framed; but on the construction of it, and having regard to the provisions of the Act as a whole, I come to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed. I cannot take the same view of the construction of that clause as was taken in the court below.

For brevity I will refer to the old educational authority—that is to say, the school board or school attendance committee, which was abolished by the Act on "the appointed day"—as "the old board," and I will refer to the new educational authority as "the council."

Now, one thing, to my mind, is clear about this Act, and that is, that on what is defined as "the appointed day" the old board under the very words of section 5 of the Act was abolished, and I cannot find throughout this Act any indication that when the Act says abolished it does not mean what it says. I cannot think for myself of any word stronger in the English language—whether it is the word usually used for this purpose or not does not seem to me to matter—and I cannot find any word in the English language which more thoroughly expresses the non-continuance for any purpose of the old board than the phrase used by the Act of Parliament, that on "the appointed day" it shall be abolished. As I have said, there is nothing in the Act from beginning to end to suggest that after the abolition it is, in the eyes of the law, for any purpose whatever, to be regarded as existing; and, indeed, section 5 is borne out by the provision in clause 10 of Schedule II. of the Act, for that carefully provides that existing members of the old board shall continue to "the appointed day"; the reason being obvious, that on the abolition of the old board its members would also, of course, have ceased to occupy the position of members of any body whatever.

On the appointed day, therefore, to my mind, under this Act it is clear that for all purposes the old board ceased to exist, and the new body—the council—only comes into existence as a new educational authority, with its rights and duties, and its rights to take property, again, on the appointed day.

That being the position of affairs, let me for a moment consider the wording of clause 1 of the second schedule. It says that the property, powers, rights, and liabilities of the old board existing at the appointed day shall be transferred to the council. The transfer contemplated, whatever that may be, is a transfer to take place at "the appointed day." It could not take place before the appointed day by reason of the council not being in a position to take any transfer before that day. It could not take place after that because, as I have pointed out, after "the appointed day" the old board is abolished; and it is noticeable that the property which has to be transferred is the property existing at the appointed day—not the property before or the property after, but the property at that precise moment. The word "transfer," as used in the section, is a general expression, covering not only property, but powers, rights, and liabilities. It could not mean that in respect of powers, rights, and liabilities anything in the nature of an instrument in writing should be executed. Nor can I really conceive that under this section with regard to the property any distinction is to be drawn between one kind of property, and another kind of property which only passes at law by an instrument in writing. What the section, to my mind, contemplates is an immediate passing from the old body—the board—to the council, of all properties, powers, and liabilities. To my mind, under this Act of Parliament no writing or deed or any further act was contemplated. I think the transfer mentioned in the clause was intended to mean a transfer effected by the Act of Parliament—effected instantaneously on "the appointed day"—not before and not after; and, to my mind, the effect of this sub-section is clearly, on the construction of the Act as a whole, that without more than the operation of the Act of Parliament all property, powers, rights, and liabilities passed by virtue of the Act to the new body—that is to say, vested in the legal sense in the new body, and I think that that view is borne out by other considerations. If you look at another part of the Act you will find that the word "transfer" is used with reference to the officers employed by the old board. Clause 16 of Schedule II. says that the officers of any authority whose property, rights, and liabilities are transferred under this Act to any council shall be transferred to and become the officers of the council. There the same word, "transferred," is used with regard to officers as is used with regard to duties, powers, liabilities, and property. And I find again that sections 85 to 88 of the Local Government Act of 1894 are incorporated, as it were, in the Act of 1902 in this way. By Schedule II., clause 8, it is provided that the sections I have mentioned of the Act of 1894 shall apply with respect to any transfer mentioned in this schedule—that is to say, with regard to the word "transfer" that was mentioned in the first clause of the schedule; and reading those sections as applying with respect to the transfer mentioned in clause 1, what do I see? In section 86, for example, I see it is provided: "Nothing in this Act shall prejudicially affect any securities granted before the passing of this Act on the credit of any rate or property transferred to a council or parish meeting by this Act"; and in sub-section 2 of section 86 of the Act of 1894 it is provided: "It shall be the duty of every authority whose powers, duties, and liabilities are transferred by this Act to liquidate so far as practicable before the appointed day all current debts and liabilities incurred by such authority"; and in section 88, sub-section 1, there is this: "If at the time when any powers, duties, liabilities, debts, or property are by this Act transferred to a council or parish meeting, any action or proceeding, or any cause of action or proceeding, is pending or existing by or against any authority in relation thereto, the same shall not be in and any wise prejudicially affected by the passing of this Act, but may be continued, prosecuted and enforced by or against the council or parish meeting as successors of the said authority in like manner as if this Act had not been passed."

Those sections strongly bear out, incorporated as they are to the extent and the manner I have indicated, the view which I think is forced upon this court as to the true construction of clause 1 of the second schedule.

I might also refer, without going though them in detail, to the other provisions in this Act for insuring the continuance, without a moment's break, of the rights, duties, work, and general position of the old educational authority to the new. To my mind it would be inconsistent with the general scope of that continuity, if we did not give to clause 1 of the second schedule the construction that I have indicated.

I can only say it is a pleasure also to think that our decision will very much enure for the benefit, as far as I can see ,of everybody concerned under this Act, and will afford the greatest protection to those who have to act upon it, and it certainly will be, as far as I can see, the very best indemnity to the Bank of England, for example, among others, which they could possibly have. It puts them in a far better position than they would be in under the interpretation adopted in the court below.

I think, for these reasons, the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I agree, and I have very little to add. Any other view than that which has been adopted by my lord and Romer, L.J., would, as it seems to me, make this Act of Parliament absolutely unworkable. The word "abolished" in section 5, as applied to school boards, is no doubt not a very happy word, and in this collocation is probably a novel word, but it seems to me that as applied to a corporation it must mean "dissolved." It must mean, as applied to the school board, that on the appointed day it ceases to exist. There is no provision in the Act of Parliament for the continuance of the school board, there is no possibility of any further election of members of the school board. There is nobody who could on the part of the school board do any of those acts which it was the duty of the school board to discharge before the appointed day.

The words in the schedule which have been so much discussed, "shall be transferred," seem to me must mean "shall vest," without more, on the appointed day. One interpretation must be given to all kinds of property and to everything which is covered by clause 1 of Schedule II. It cannot reasonably be suggested that it is to have a different meaning when applied to real property than that which it has when applied to stock.

To take the case which I ventured to put to counsel during the course of the argument, of schools with freehold property vested in the school boards. I failed to obtain any suggestion of how any further deed of transfer or conveyance to the new educational authority could be obtained after the appointed day, and I am certainly not prepared so to construe this section as to make an exception in favour of the Bank of England because they happen to have, under the Act of 1892, a section which may or may not enable the difficulty to be got over with reference to the particular stock with which that Act deals.

In my view, the conclusion at which we have arrived is very strongly borne out by section 88 of the Act of 1894, which is made applicable to this Act, and that is a section applying not merely to powers, duties, liabilities, and debts, but it speaks of "property" by this Act transferred. That makes it more easy to read the first clause of the second schedule in the way which I have suggested, that "shall be transferred" means "shall vest," without more, on the appointed day.

HOARE v. TASKER & SONS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Debenture—Issue as security for loan—Debentures returned to company with blank transfer on repayment—Registered owner—Subsequent transfer to purchaser for value—Priorities.

The company duly issued a series of debentures each of which was to rank pari passu with the others. Certain of these debentures were issued as security for loans, and on repayment were returned to the company with blank transfers, but they were not transferred to the company, nor was the company entered on the register as the owner of the debentures. Subsequently these debentures were transferred to other persons for value by completing the blank transfers.

Held, that the debentures so dealt with did not rank pari passu with the other debentures of the same series, and that the company acting as they did had made a new issue of debentures.

Further consideration on a debenture-holder's action.

The defendant company, on the 28th of February, 1896, executed a trust deed with a view of securing an issue of first mortgage debentures for £35,000 by which the defendant R. Ashby was appointed trustee of the property comprised in the deed on behalf of the first mortgage debenture-holders.

Article 47 of the articles of association provided that the directors may from time to time, at their discretion, raise or borrow any sum or sums of money for the purposes of the company, but so that the moneys so raised or borrowed at any one time owing shall not, without the sanction of a general meeting, exceed the nominal amount of the capital.

Article 48: "The directors may raise or secure the repayment of such moneys in such manner and upon such terms and conditions in all respects as they may think fit, whether by the issue of debenture or debenture stock of the company charged upon, or by charging or mortgaging in any manner whatsoever, all or any part of the property of the company (both present and future), including its uncalled capital for the time being."

Article 49: "Every debenture or other security created by the company may be so framed that the same shall be assignable, free from any equities between the company, and the original or any intermediate holders."

Article 112 (k): "The directors shall have power to borrow or raise any sum or sums of money on such security and upon such terms as to interest or otherwise as they may deem fit, and for the purpose of securing the same and interest, or for any other purpose, create, issue, make and give respectively, any perpetual or redeemable debentures or debenture stock, or any mortgage or charge on the undertaking, or the whole or any part of the property (present or future) or uncalled capital of the company, and any debentures or debenture stock may be issued to or deposited with any person lending money to the company by way of security, collateral or otherwise."

The debentures issued were subject to certain conditions, indorsed thereon, of which the following are material:

1. This debenture is one of a series of debentures of £20, £50, and £100 each, issued, or about to be issued, by the company for an aggregate amount of £35,000, and the said debentures are all intended to be in the same form.

2. The debentures of this series shall rank pari passu as a first charge upon the premises within charged without any preference or priority one over another, and shall until the moneys hereby secured shall become payable be a floating charge upon such premises, but so that the company is not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge thereon in priority to or pari passu with the said debentures.

4. A register of the debentures will be kept at the company's registered office wherein there will be entered the names, addresses, and descriptions of the registered holders, and particulars of the debentures held by them respectively.

5. The registered holder of this debenture will be regarded as exclusively entitled to the benefit thereof, and the company shall not be bound to enter in the register notice of any trust affecting this debenture or to recognize any right therein in any other person save as herein provided.

6. Every transfer of this debenture must be in writing under the hand of the registered holder hereof or his legal personal representative.

9. The principal moneys and interest hereby secured will be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original and any intermediate holder hereof, and the receipt of the registered holder for such principal moneys and interest shall be a good discharge to the company.

This action was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders for the appointment of a receiver and manager, and judgment was given on the 24th of July, 1903, appointing a receiver and manager and directing that the usual inquiries should be made. The master made his certificate on the 14th of July, 1904, in the first schedule of which he set forth a list of all the holders of mortgage debentures secured by the trust deed of the 28th of February, 1896. He also found that certain persons mentioned in the four parts of the second schedule claimed to be entitled as debenture-holders under the circumstances hereinafter set forth and left it for the consideration of the court to determine whether they were entitled or not to rank with the debenture-holders in the first schedule. The present summons was issued for the determination of this question.

In May, 1899, the company being pressed for money, borrowed £700 from one Allan Herbert, and issued to him debentures of the face value of £1,400 as security. The company also borrowed £1,000 from Robert Ashby, and issued to him debentures of the face value of £2,000 as security, and the arrangement was that on repayment by the company from time to time, Herbert and Ashby respectively should return to the company so many debentures as represented double the amount of the sum so repaid. Besides returning the debentures in accordance with the arrangement they executed forms of transfer in blank which were handed back to the company with the debentures.

The company, receiving applications for debentures after they had obtained the debentures back from Herbert and Ashby, issued the same debentures to the applicants and received the full face value of the debentures.

The company carried the matter through by filling in the transfers with the names of the applicants, the number and distinctive number of the debentures proposed to be issued, and on the execution of the transfer by the applicant registered the transfers, indorsed the debentures with a note of such transfer, and forwarded the debentures to the applicants.

In the first part of the second schedule are included the debentures issued to Allan Herbert and re-issued or transferred prior to the 31st of December, 1900.

In the second part are included the debentures issued to Robert Ashby and re-issued or transferred prior to the 31st of December, 1900.

In the third part are included debentures issued to Robert Ashby, and re-issued or transferred after the 31st of December, 1900.

In the fourth part are included debentures issued to R. Ashby to secure an advance, and after payment off of such advance deposited by the company as security for other loans by Allan Herbert and P. E. J. Talbot jointly, and also by Talbot alone. These sixteen debentures so deposited are in the name of Robert Ashby and no transfers of them have been registered although the advance by Ashby has been paid off and blank form of transfers signed by Ashby.

The total amount of debentures issued by the company did not exceed the limit of £35,000.

Ashton Cross, for the plaintiff.

W. R. Sheldon, for Messrs. E. & C. Paice, the holders of debentures in the first schedule for £4,700, who had obtained permission to intervene.—The debentures in the four parts of the second schedule are not entitled to rank pari passu with the first mortgage debentures. The issue of debentures to Herbert was a good issue, and on repayment of the loan he surrendered the debentures to the company. The debt was repaid by the company, not by the new holder. The company was in the position of a mortgagor entitled to a reconveyance, but the company could not keep the security alive for its own benefit to the prejudice of other mortgagees. If Miss Bingley paid money to the company on the faith of getting a transfer I could not dispute it, but there was an interval of two months between the surrendering of the debenture and the re-issue to her. If the company in fact redeemed them the other debenture-holders received the benefit. The company could not re-issue debentures under the guise of transferring them, because that would be ultra vires. There is practically no difference between this case and In re George Routledge (Limited), ante p. 44, where it was held that on the transfer of debentures to the company the debt was gone and the security had ceased to exist. The company could by article 47, as between the company and the shareholders, borrow further money, but not as against the debenture-holders. When the debentures issued as security were paid off, transfers were executed, therefore there was an intention of merger. Condition 2 on the debenture would prevent the new issue of a debenture paid off. Under condition 6 a deed was not necessary for a transfer, and condition 9 is not applicable to debenture-holders inter se. If the company wished to borrow it must do so on second debentures.

He also cited In re Regent's Canal Ironworks Co., 24 W. R. 687, 3 Ch. D. 43.

Petersen, for Miss Bingley, who held debentures in the first, second, and third parts of the second schedule, and Miss Whittaker, a debenture-holder in the third part of the second schedule.—In respect of one debenture Miss Bingley was a transferee, as she applied to the company for it before the company paid the money and received back the debenture. The company paid off Ashby as agent for Miss Bingley. The debentures are good in the hands of the present holders, who had no notice of any irregularity in the debentures. By the conditions indorsed on the debentures, which constitute a bargain between the company and all the holders of the debentures, they are equivalent to bearer debentures. The company was never the registered holder nor transferee of these debentures; this distinguishes the present case from In re George Routledge (Limited). It is not open to holders of debentures which are not impeached to impugn the debentures of Miss Bingley and Miss Whittaker on account of conditions 5 and 9, by which they are to be deemed to be exclusively entitled to the benefit of the debentures unaffected by any equities between the company and the original holders Herbert and Ashby. The restriction in the articles on the borrowing powers of the company is only binding on the shareholders. Even if the company acted ultrà vires, the registered holders are entitled to rank, relying on general principles.

Muir Mackenzie, for C. Hiscock and Mrs. White, holders of debentures in the first part of the second schedule, and for Allan Herbert and P. E. J. Talbot jointly, and Talbot alone, holders of debentures in the fourth part of the second schedule, adopted Petersen's argument. In Routledge's case the debentures were transferred to the company and registered, and therefore they were merged, and a subsequent issue could not be good; but in the present case the company intended to keep the debentures alive, and consequently there was no merger: Thorne v. Cann, [1895] App. Cas. 11. As regards Herbert and Talbot the company had power by article 112 (k) to deposit debentures as collateral security besides issuing them. The company merely had possession of the debentures returned to them with blank transfers, and the result is the same as if the parties had gone direct to Ashby for a transfer of the debentures. The debentures are good debentures entitled to rank pari passu in the first series.

E. Manson, for B. Gibbs, H. Cox, and E. A. Clark, holders of debentures in the first part of the second schedule, and A. Noyce and Miss Pledger, holders of debentures in the third part of the second schedule, adopted arguments of Petersen and Muir Mackenzie. The company never took a transfer, the legal title remained outstanding, therefore there could not be a merger. Conditions 5 and 9 come into operation and these are binding on all the other debenture-holders. There was no condition as to equities in Routledge's case.

Gatey, for the trustee of the debenture trust deed.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question in this case is one of some importance to those interested in the issue of debentures, and is completely new. I think it desirable to state what the whole question is, because some part of the arguments addressed to me have no direct bearing on the question for decision. I am not deciding any claim against the company. All the debentures specified in the second schedule of the certificate, parts 1, 2, 3, and 4, may be perfectly good as against the company, and yet on the point I have to decide my decision may be against these debenture-holders. The question which I have to decide is whether they are entitled to rank pari passu with the debentures specified in the first schedule. There is no question here of an improper issue of debentures. The articles of association conferred very large borrowing powers on the company, and expressly authorized an issue of debentures by depositing them as security for money advanced. I must take the master's certificate as it stands. The certificate, after finding that there were several debentures issued which rank against the assets of the company, sets out particulars of other claims which were for convenience divided into four different parts, but they all fall under one head and there is no distinction in substance between the four different classes.

What happened was this. The company issued debentures for £35,000 and from time to time paid off some of these debentures, and the debenture-holders who were paid off, at the request of the company, executed blank transfers. At a later date as part of an independent transaction, the company borrowed money from third persons, filled in the blank transfers with the name of the lenders, and registered them as the new holders of the debentures so transferred. Did that constitute a transfer of the original debentures, or was it an issue of new debentures belonging to a series different from the original debentures? I have assumed that there was such a series, and as a matter of fact there was no doubt about it. The first condition on the debenture before me states that it was part of an issue of £35,000, and the second condition expressly says that debentures of this series shall rank pari passu. Each holder of these debentures is told that as part of his contract, not only with the company, but also with the other holders, he is to have a debenture which is to rank pari passu with all the other debentures of this series, but that no other debentures are to be issued other than this series which shall rank pari passu.

I have to decide whether what has been done in the present case was an attempt to evade that condition and to make other debentures rank pari passu with those held under the first issue. There is no distinction between the different classes in the second schedule, in every case the transaction was the same in substance. The debt was paid off by the company, and there was a re-issue for advances, so that the same piece of paper was re-issued and a transfer executed in the manner mentioned before. Buckley, J., had before him recently Re George Routledge & Sons (Limited), a case, on the facts, quite different from this, but which throws some light upon it. There the company on the payment off of the debentures took a transfer to themselves and then re-issued them, and the learned judge held that was bad. He said: "The result, to my mind, is that the debt and the security were both gone." No doubt the argument of those who disputed the validity of the debentures in that case was that there was merger, but I do not find that the learned judge stated any principles or cited any cases on that branch of the law. What he did say was that both the debt and the security were absolutely gone, and although the doctrine of merger must have been present to his mind, he did not go upon any technical ground of that kind, but he went on the substance of the thing that the debt was paid off. This was shown more clearly by the assigment of the debentures to the company itself. To my mind, though we have not the same facts here, yet the principle is the same, and the same result must follow. Everything depends on the payment off. It was an acceleration, as the debt was not due by the terms of the debenture, but the company could at any time buy up its debentures and secure them, if the creditor was willing, so as to prevent any charge against the company. In that case the debt is gone, and, to my mind, the security is gone also. Of course, it was perfectly competent for the company to arrange for the transfer of the debentures to any creditors. Then the company became merely an intermediary between the person who desired to transfer and the person who wished to advance the money. If that were done in the present case nothing could be said against it; but the money was not paid at the time, being advanced at a subsequent period as part of a distinct transaction. I cannot see that there was any power in the company to do anything of the kind it has done here. I do not decide anything as to the rights of these debenture-holders against the company; it may be that as against the company the registered holders are right. I am trying whether as between the different debenture-holders they are entitled to rank in the first series. I think that when the debentures were repaid the debt was gone, and that when the company borrowed further money, whether secured by depositing the debentures as collateral security or by issuing them in the ordinary way, they issued new debentures. I do not think the facts as to the debenture issued to Miss Bingley after the letter of the 7th of February sufficient to enable me to say that in point of fact there was a transfer from Ashby to Miss Bingley. Therefore, I hold that the only persons entitled to rank as holders in the first series of debentures are those mentioned in the first schedule.

SOOTHILL UPPER URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WAKEFIELD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Local government — Contract — Validity — Pecuniary penalty—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 174, sub-section 2.

An urban authority contracted with a rural authority to supply the latter with water in bulk, water so taken to be paid for quarterly. It was provided that in case any such quarterly payment was in arrear for one month interest should become chargeable at the rate of five per cent.

Held, that the contract was not within section 174, sub-section 2, of the Public Health Act, 1875; but, semble, if it were, the payment of interest as aforesaid would be sufficient pecuniary penalty to satisfy the statute.

Action.

This was an action by the plaintiff council against the defendants on an agreement dated the 31st of January, 1895, and made between the plaintiff council and the Wakefield Rural District Council.

The said agreement was for the supply of water in bulk by the plaintiff council to the Wakefield Council.

In this action the plaintiff council claimed as against the Wakefield Council a declaration (inter alia) that the agreement of the 31st of January, 1895, was valid and binding on the Wakefield Council.

The defendants contended that the said agreement was bad under the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 174, sub-section 2, by reason of the absence of a penalty clause, as required by that section.

By a clause of the said agreement, after providing that the water taken was to be paid for by quarterly payments, it was agreed as follows: "If any such payment shall be in arrear and not paid for the space of one calendar month from the day when the purchasers have received from the vendors the account for water delivered under the provisions hereof, the purchasers shall pay interest to the vendors after the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the said quarterly day until payment, but this provision shall not be construed in any way to restrict the right of the vendors to require immediate payment thereof after the expiration of such month."

The plaintiff council maintained that the above provisions as to the payment of interest amounted to a pecuniary penalty within the meaning of section 174, sub-section 2, of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that consequently the agreement of the 31st of January, 1895, was good.

Eve, K.C., and Clayton, for the plaintiff council.—The provisions of section 174 of the Public Health Act, 1875, only apply to contracts which are necessary to carry that Act into execution: Attorney-General v. Gaskill, 31 W. R. 135, 22 Ch. D. 537. This contract is not such a one. But even if it be, as regards the part of the contract relating to the payment of money there is a penalty—viz., interest which becomes payable if such moneys are not paid punctually.

Micklem, K.C., Parker, and Toulmin, for the defendants.—The agreement is bad and is not binding on the defendants. There is no penalty as required by section 174 of the Public Health Act, 1875. That section is for the protection of an urban authority and the ratepayers, and unless such a contract as the present one complies with its provisions, it cannot be enforced.

Eve, K.C., replied.

SWINFEN EADY, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiffs in this action seek a declaration that the agreement of the 31st of January, 1895, is valid and binding, and they claim to recover the balance of certain moneys thereunder. The Wakefield Council deny that the agreement is valid on the ground that the agreement does not specify any pecuniary penalty pursuant to section 174, sub-section 2, of the Public Health Act, 1875. [His lordship after dealing with certain questions raised by the action, and not material for the purposes of this report, continued as follows:] I now come to the objection taken by the defendants to the validity of the agreement of 1895 on the ground of the absence of any pecuniary penalty as provided for in section 174, sub-section 2, of the said Act. Assuming that this sub-section is obligatory, and not merely directory (vide Young v. Mayor of Leamington, 31 W. R. 925, 8 A. C. 517, and British Insulated Wire Co. (Limited) v. Prescot Urban District Council, 44 W. R. 224, [1895] 2 Q. B. 463), it applies only to contracts made by an urban authority, and therefore it has to be considered how the plaintiffs, who are an urban authority, are affected by it. The provisions of section 174 are for the protection of an urban authority and of the ratepayers of their district. The penalty in sub-section 2 is a penalty to be made payable to, and in no case by, the urban authority, in case the terms of the contract are not duly performed—that is, not duly performed by the other party. The "price to be paid" is a price to be paid by the urban authority for the work, materials, matters, or things to be furnished, had, or done to or for the urban authority. Accordingly this sub-section can, from the nature and terms of it, only apply to cases where work, materials, matters, or things are to be furnished, had, or done to or for an urban authority, for a price in money to be paid by the urban authority. In such cases the contract is to specify the time within which the contract is to be performed, and shall specify some pecuniary penalty. The provisions of sub-sections 3 and 4 of section 174 also show that the section refers only to contracts where the money is to be paid by the urban authority, and do not include cases where the contract is to be carried out by the urban authority, and the consideration to be paid to it.

In the present case it is the urban authority, the plaintiffs, who are to supply water to another person for a price in money to be paid to the urban authority. Is the urban authority to stipulate that if they do not carry out the terms of the contract—that is, if they do not supply the water—they shall themselves pay a penalty? This is absurd. Are they, then, to stipulate that if the purchasers do not pay the price in money they shall pay some pecuniary penalty? Obviously not, for the penalty is to be paid in case the contract is not duly performed within the stipulated time, and not if the price is not paid. Here the urban authority has, in fact, stipulated that if the price is not punctually paid interest thereon at 5 per cent. shall be paid, and it might be contended that this is sufficient penalty within the meaning of the statute. But the real answer to the argument is that the present contract for the supply of water by an urban to a rural authority is not within the section at all.

The plaintiffs therefore, in my opinion, are entitled to succeed and to obtain judgment for the amount claimed.

In re CHAYTOR.
CHAYTOR v. HORN. (a.)

Will—Tenant for life and remainderman—Postponement of conversion—Unauthorized securities—Enjoyment in specie.

A testator devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert, with power to postpone conversion at their discretion, and to retain any investments subsisting at his death, whether authorized by his will or not, and to invest the proceeds and hold the investments upon trust to pay the income thereof to his wife for life. The trustees proposed to sell certain shares in a coal mining company, as being of a speculative, though not of a wasting, character. Pending sale they refused to pay the widow the full dividends on these shares.

Held, there is no difference for this purpose between unauthorized securities of a wasting and unauthorized securities not of a wasting character; and that the widow was only entitled to interest at 3 per cent. on the value of the shares in question at the testator's death.

Bulkeley v. Stephens, 3 New Rep. 105, 12 W. R. Dig. 3, not followed.

Summons.

The testator devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate not by his will otherwise disposed of to trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same, with power to postpone conversion at their discretion, and to retain any investments subsisting at his death, whether authorized by his will or not, and at their discretion to invest the residue (after payment of debts and legacies), and to stand possessed of the residuary trust moneys and the investments for the time being representing the same in trust to pay the income thereof to his wife for life.

The testator died possessed of preference and ordinary shares in a coal mining company. The trustees sold some of these on the ground that they were of a speculative, though not of a wasting, character. They decided to sell more when opportunity arose, and refused to pay the widow the full dividends on these retained shares.

The widow took out a summons in which she claimed the full dividends.

WARRINGTON, J.—The only question I have to decide is whether the tenant for life in this case is entitled in specie to the income of certain unauthorized securities, which the trustees are retaining at present until an opportunity of conversion arises, or whether under the trusts of the will she is only entitled to interest at a certain rate on the value of those securities.

I will get rid of one point at once. It is conceded that the preference shares come within the definition "preferred stock of any . . . public company" in clause 11 of the will. Therefore, they are authorized securities, and it is well settled that the interest on them is payable to the tenant for life.

As regards the unauthorized securities, there is no express gift of the income of the funds or items of property forming part of the testator's estate during postponement of conversion, but I am invited to find such a gift by construction. What is the general principle applicable to such a case as this, where there is an express trust for conversion, and a power to retain securities of every kind, authorized and unauthorized, and there is no express gift of the income pending conversion? It is that the tenant for life is entitled to the income of authorized securities, but not to that of unauthorized securities, but only to interest at 3 per cent. on their value at the testator's death. That was the rule adopted in In re Thomas, 40 W. R. 75, [1891] 3 Ch. 482. The rule is expressed to the same effect in Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), pp. 480-481, and in In re Woods, [1904] 2 Ch. 4, 52 W. R. Dig. 198, it is assumed to be the rule. The only point in which the last case is distinguishable from the present one is that in In re Woods the securities were wasting securities. Is there anything to take this case out of the general rule? Far from that, the words of this will are adverse to the contention of the tenant for life. The trustees are to sell and convert the real and personal estate. They may retain any investments subsisting at the testator's death as long as they think proper. The only trusts in favour of beneficiaries are trusts of the "residuary trust funds," which are defined as the "residuary trust moneys"—that is, the proceeds of conversion—"and the investments for the time being representing the same"—that is, representing the proceeds of conversion. I take that to mean that the tenant for life is entitled to the income of the trust moneys—that is, to the proceeds of conversion and the income of the investments made with those moneys (of course, including in that any authorized property which is retained, for that is the same as if the trustees had sold them and re-invested the proceeds of sale in the same securities), but not the income of investments, which do not represent trust property all, but are items of property retained by the trustees until they could realize them. In order that the tenant for life should not lose income altogether, the court steps in and says the value of these investments shall be taken as the proceeds of sale, if they had been sold at the testator's death.

(a.) Reported by PERCY H. WINFIELD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Then I am asked if I cannot find an express gift, to find an implied gift of this income to the tenant for life. That argument will not do. But whether I find a gift or not, it is argued that the rule to be applied distinguishes between unauthorized securities of a wasting nature and those which are not wasting. Many cases have been cited, but none support the distinction except Bulkeley v. Stephens, 3 New Rep 105, 12 W. R. Dig. 3.

In all the other cases, in one form or another, what was given was the income of the estate, and not, as here, the income of the residuary trust funds. It seems that the distinction is that the question in those cases was whether the doctrine of Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137, ought to be applied. Bulkeley v. Stephens, if properly reported, would seem to depart from the principle covering the point. The case is not satisfactorily reported. The will is not set out at length, and, according to the facts, the precise question was not raised. The question was only as to part of the income and for the first year after the testator's death. The case is not mentioned in any of the text-books, except Seton on Decrees (6th ed.), p. 1688. It is not cited in any of the recent authorities; certainly not in In re Thomas, 40 W. R. 75, [1891] 3 Ch. 482. It was decided before Brown v. Gellatly, L. R. 2 Ch. 751, 15 W. R. Dig. 105, but was not referred to in that case.

It seems to me, therefore, that I am not bound to treat it as a binding authority. It is not consistent with the result of the other authorities which is stated in Theobald on Wills (5th ed.), p. 480, and, in my view, correctly stated. He says: "Where a residue is given upon trust for sale and investment, and the income is then given to a tenant for life, the tenant for life is, in the absence of proper directions, only entitled to such income as the estate would produce when converted and invested in accordance with the directions of the will"; and, at p. 481: "Power conferred upon trustees to postpone a sale, or to retain securities unconverted will not alter the rights of tenant for life and remainderman." Bulkeley v. Stephens does not appear to be consistent with that statement. The question I have to determine is one of construction, but I decline to follow it.

It is settled by In re Woods that the widow must have interest at 3 per cent. out of the actual income received in respect of these unauthorized securities calculated according to their value at the testator's death.

The rest of the dividends will have to be invested as capital, and she will have the income of those investments as well as the actual dividends on the preference shares.

REX v. RECORDER OF BATH. (a.)

Licensing Law—Order by justices directing alterations in licensed premises—Appeal to recorder—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 27—Licensing Act, 1902 (2 Ed. 7, c. 28), s. 11 (4).

On an application by the owner and licensee of a fully-licensed house for the renewal of his licence, the licensing justices granted a renewal, but made an order under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, directing certain alterations on the premises.

Held (by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Wills, J., Kennedy, J., dissenting), that an appeal against such order may be made to the recorder of the city in which the licensed premises are situated.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

In this case a rule nisi calling upon the Recorder of Bath to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding him to hear and determine the appeal of the applicant, C. S. McCoombe, against an order of the licensing justices for the city of Bath.

McCoombe was the owner and licensee of a fully licensed public-house in the city of Bath, and on the 4th of February, 1904, he applied to the justices at the annual licensing sessions for the city for the renewal of his licence.

The justices required him to produce a plan of the premises under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, and adjourned the application to the 29th of February, on which date they granted the renewal of the licence, but made a separate order that a door at the back of the premises should be closed, and that the doorway and passage leading therefrom in the direction of the bar should not be used by customers.

McCoombe appealed against this order to the quarter sessions for the city of Bath, but the recorder refused to hear it on the ground that he had no jurisdiction, as an appeal from licensing justices lay only to the quarter sessions of the county. McCoombe thereupon applied for and obtained the above rule nisi.

Section 11 (4) of the Licensing Act, 1902, provides: "On any application for the renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors to be consumed on the premises, the licensing justices may require a plan of the premises to be produced before them and to be deposited with their clerk, and, on renewing any such licence they may by order direct that, within a time fixed by the order, such alterations as they think reasonably necessary to secure the proper conduct of the business shall be made in that part of the business premises where intoxicating liquor is sold or consumed, but any such order shall be subject to an appeal to a court of quarter sessions, as provided by the Alehouse Act, 1828. . . . If the licensed person makes default in complying with any such order, he shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which the default continues." By section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828: "Any person who shall think himself aggrieved by any act of any justice done in or concerning the execution of this Act may appeal against such act to the next general or quarter sessions of the peace holden for the county or place wherein the cause of such complaint shall have arisen. . . ."

J. A. Simon showed cause on behalf of the recorder.—An appeal against an order made under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, does not lie to the recorder, but only to the quarter sessions of the county. Section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, gives a right of appeal to any person aggrieved under that Act to quarter sessions. Section 105 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1855 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), provided that the recorder should not have power to grant any licence to any person to sell excisable liquors by retail: see Reg. v. Deane, 2 Q. B. 96, and Reg. v. Cockburn, 4 E. & B. 265. The provisions of that section are re-enacted in section 165 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50). By section 34, sub-section 1, of the Licensing Act, 1902, all the Licensing Acts from 1828 to 1902 are to be construed as one Act. Since the Licensing Act of 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), section 75 of which repealed section 27 of the Act of 1828, except as to the renewal or transfer of licences, appeals from licensing justices have not lain to the recorder; it cannot have been intended by section 11, sub-section 4, to renew the right of appeal in such cases to the recorder.

He referred to Bushell v. Hammond, 52 W. R. 453, [1904] 2 K. B. 563.

Foote, K.C. (Douglas Metcalfe with him), in support of the rule.—An appeal against an order under section 11, sub-section 4, of the Act of 1902, for alterations in licensed premises, lies to the recorder. That sub-section gives the licensing justices power to make an order as to structural alterations, non-compliance with which order is punishable on summary conviction with certain penalties, and against such order appeal lies to the recorder. The order is a substantive one, and not merely a condition of the renewal of the licence. The words "on renewing any such licence," in sub-section 4, merely point to the time and occasion on which an order for structural alterations may be made. Bushell v. Hammond has no bearing on the present case.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case I regret that I have the misfortune to differ from the conclusion at which my lord and my brother Wills have arrived, and so I will shortly state the reasons why I am unable to take the same view of the question that has been urged before us by counsel in support of the rule. Since the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, recorders have not had to deal with any questions of discretion which involve the granting or withholding of a licence. It was considered by the Legislature that it was expedient that recorders should not have that power, and in fact all such appeals with regard to matters of administration and discretion have been sent to the justices of the county assembled in quarter sessions. It is true that the recorder might still have to deal with cases which affected persons who use or keep licensed premises with regard to breaches of the law; but the matter with which we are now concerned is not an appeal with regard to a breach of the law, but is, in effect, an appeal with regard to a grant or renewal of a licence and nothing else. It has been pointed out that the grant of a certificate for a licence and the making of the order for closing the door in question are two distinct and separate orders, but I can see nothing in section 11, sub-section 4, of the Licensing Act, 1902, which can prevent the licensing justices from granting a renewal of a licence embodying in the order of renewal an order for certain alterations to be made on the premises. In such a case I do not hesitate to say that an appeal would lie to county quarter sessions and not to the recorder. The making of an order under this section is in the nature of an administrative act done by licensing justices. I do not think I am entitled to reverse, unless the section is clear upon the point, a practice that has been acted upon for more than sixty years, and to say that for the first time on a pure question of administration an appeal will lie to the recorder, namely a question as to that which the licensing justices might think fit to order and to be done on an application for the renewal of a licence. I do not think it can depend upon the circumstance that the justices in such cases make two orders instead of one. It is true that this is not an order made as a condition of granting a licence, but it is in effect the granting of a licence upon terms, and if the justices found that their order was not carried out they would doubtless refuse to renew the licence the following year. When there has been a long-established practice that an appeal against an administrative order should not lie to the recorder, and this sub-section does not compel it, it seems to me that the argument of counsel showing cause in this case ought to succeed, and I have therefore come to the conclusion that this rule ought not to be made absolute.

WILLS, J.—I regret that in this case I am unable to come to the same conclusion as my brother Kennedy. I think that the words "on any application for the renewal" in the Licensing Act, 1902, s. 11 (4), merely indicate the occasion on which the justices may make an order such as the one in this case. It seems to me that the justices' certificate for a licence, which is the preliminary thing, has never been treated or described as an "order," and it is a mistake to think that the two things may be treated as one. The question does not admit of very much argument. I have felt the force of much of what has been said by my brother Kennedy, but I cannot help thinking his argument has been addressed rather to the policy of the law than the language of the section. At the time of the passing of the Act of 1902 it was a common thing for justices to grant a licence on an undertaking which they had no right to ask for, but the procedure was effective as, unless the undertaking was carried out, they could refuse to renew the licence the following year. Sub-section 4 of section 11 of the Licensing Act, 1902, has substituted for that, a power to the justices to make an order when they granted a renewal and to impose a penalty for disobedience to such order. I think this legislation supersedes the prohibition in section 165 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. I think the order is quite distinct from the renewal of the licence, and that the Legislature has really said that the appeal from the order should lie to the recorder. This is not a case in which it can be said that success on appeal would in effect confer a jurisdiction on the recorder to grant, renew, or transfer a licence since the licence and the order are distinct from one another. If the order was not complied with the licence is not ipso facto revoked, and if a sale under such circumstances took place it cannot be contended it was a sale on unlicensed premises. In my opinion this rule should be made absolute.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I also regret to differ from my brother Kennedy. If I thought that section 11 (4) of the Licensing Act, 1902, provided for the renewal of a licence on terms or conditions I should have concurred in the judgment of my brother Kennedy. On looking at the previous section I think the words "on any application for the renewal of a licence" are merely an indication of the time and occasion of making the order, and do not make the order a condition of the renewal of the licence. It is agreed, I think, that the licensing justices had first issued the certificate for the licence, and if that is so, I think it is impossible to contend that by subsequently making the order the licence was granted conditionally. Section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, gives an appeal to quarter sessions apart from the recorder. The prohibition of an appeal going to the recorder extends only to matters involving the grant or renewal of a licence. The order in this case is to be appealed against as if it were an order referred to by section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, and can therefore go to quarter sessions or the recorder. In my opinion section 11 (4) of the Licensing Act, 1902, contemplates an order and not a renewal of a licence. If what is done under the section is a renewal of a licence on a condition, I agree that in that case the appeal would be against a renewal of a licence, and should go to quarter sessions.

I think the Legislature has taken it out of the category of a renewal, and has in terms created the power to make an order with penalties for disobedience to it, and the appeal against such order may be to the recorder.

I think, therefore, this rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

SMITH (Appellant) v. DAUNEY (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Inhabited house duty—Dwelling-house—Occupation—Furnished house not lived in during year of assessment—House Tax Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36), s. 1.

Where the owner of a dwelling-house keeps it furnished and ready for habitation as a dwelling-house he is chargeable to inhabited house duty in respect thereof under section 1 of the House Tax Act, 1851, notwithstanding the fact that during the year of assessment no person has actually lived, dwelt, or slept in such house.

Case stated by Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax and for executing the Acts relating to inhabited house duties for the division of the Isle of Wight.

The respondent appealed against an assessment to inhabited house duty made on the sum of £100 at 9d. in the £ for the year ended the 5th of April, 1901, upon the annual value of a certain dwelling-house belonging to him, situated at Luscombe-road, Shanklin, in the Isle of Wight.

It was admitted by the appellant on behalf of the Crown that the dwelling-house in question for the entire year ended the 5th of April, 1901, although furnished, had not been used for the purposes of residence, and that no one had dwelt therein or slept therein.

The premises in question, with a garden attached, are held by the respondent, under a lease for a term of 990 years from 1865 or thereabouts, at an annual ground-rent of £15.

The respondent furnished the house in 1877, and it was furnished during the year of assessment (1900-1), and still remains so furnished.

The premises were furnished by the respondent with the intention primarily of using them for occasional residence as a country residence for himself and his family, and up to the year 1895 he resided with his family in the house for a few weeks in most years.

In the year 1896 the respondent let the house as a furnished residence to a Mr. Wardlaw, whose tenancy expired in 1898.

In each year since the latter year, with the exception of the year of assessment (1900-1), the house has been let by the respondent as a furnished house for a few weeks, but the respondent or his family have only resided in the house for about a month in 1902.

At no time during the year of assessment (1900-1) was the house let or actually resided in by any person whomsoever, nor (except as hereinafter appears) was any caretaker employed to look after it. During the year of assessment the house was only used by the respondent for keeping his furniture in. The furniture was not packed away and the carpets were kept down, and the premises were ready for the use of the respondent or any person to whom he might let them as a furnished residence. The keys were kept by the respondent's agent at Shanklin. The windows and doors were occasionally opened by the agent to air the house. A gardener has always been employed by the respondent, and was so employed during the year of assessment once a week, or, if necessary, twice a week, for the purpose of attending to and keeping the garden referred to above in order, and occasionally some of the produce, such as a few apples and pears, was during the year of assessment and is now sent to the respondent.

For the year of assessment and for the previous and subsequent years the income tax Schedule A, land tax and poor rates, and other rates were paid by the respondent in respect of the house, the respondent being assessed as the occupier thereof, and inhabited house duty has also been paid in respect of the premises by the respondent for all the above years except the year of assessment (1900-1), the respondent being assessed as the occupier thereof.

The respondent claimed that the house was not chargeable with duty as an inhabited dwelling-house within the meaning of the House Tax Act, 1851, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, inasmuch as it was not inhabited, dwelt in, or slept in at any time during the period in question, and that there was no statutory enactment or legal decision which declares that an uninhabited house shall be deemed an inhabited dwelling-house if it has furniture in it. In support of his contention he referred to the case of Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. Div. 100.

The surveyor of taxes contended that the inhabited house duties are imposed by the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36 on inhabited dwelling-houses of the yearly annual value of £20 and upwards, and that that Act kept alive the various powers, provisions, rules, regulations, directions, exemptions, forfeitures and pains contained in the unrepealed sections of the Acts 43 Geo. 3, c. 161; 48 Geo. 3, c. 55; 57 Geo. 3, c. 25; 5 Geo. 4, c. 44; 6 Geo. 4, c. 7; 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 113; and 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 39, and made them applicable to the assessment and collection of the inhabited house duties as fully and effectually as if they were re-enacted therein; that every inhabited dwelling-house is required by law to be assessed, and that the house assessed in this case was undoubtedly a dwelling-house, and that it was not necessary that a dwelling-house should be slept in or dwelt in to render it liable to assessment; that in view of 6 Geo. 4, c. 7, ss. 2, 3, a house furnished as a dwelling-house, although not dwelt in for any particular year or portion of a year, could not be taken or deemed to be unoccupied and not liable to assessment, and that the case of Riley v. Read relied on by the respondent was not a case in point. The house referred to in that case was a building, the ground floor of which was occupied for the ordinary purposes of a club, and the upper floors as offices, and it had never been furnished as a dwelling-house or used as a residence.

In further support of his contention that it was not necessary that the house should be slept in to render it liable to assessment to the inhabited house duties, he referred to 57 Geo 4, c. 25, ss. 1, 2, and 5 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 4, by virtue of which it was necessary that, before exemption could be granted in respect of a dwelling-house used solely for trade or professional purposes, the person claiming exemption should prove residence in a taxable dwelling-house elsewhere, and that this proof was required until the Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 90, s. 25, abolished its necessity, some sixteen years after the present Inhabited House Duty Act, (14 & 15 Vict. c. 36).

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The commissioners were of opinion that the contention of the surveyor could not be sustained. The Acts of Parliament referred to impose a tax on inhabited dwelling-houses only, and the question for their consideration was whether this building was an inhabited house within the meaning of those Acts, though no person dwelt therein, inhabited it, or slept thereon. The statutes say that what is taxable is an "inhabited dwelling-house." If "Inhabitable dwelling-houses" were the thing mentioned no difficulty would have arisen, but as the Acts speak not of "inhabitable dwelling-houses," but of "inhabited dwelling-houses," they were of opinion they were bound to put a construction on the word "inhabited." Was this such a place, since no person resided on or dwelt therein? If there were any statute defining the expression and showing that the term "inhabited" was meant to apply to such a case as the present, or if there were any authority to show that the expression might apply to a mere constructive occupation—in other words, if there were an Act of Parliament or decision of a court of law which showed that a dwelling-house might be taxed as an inhabited dwelling-house in which no person slept, dwelt, or resided, though furnished—they would be bound by such Act or decision, but in the absence of that they felt they must put their interpretation on the words of the statute, and they were accordingly of the opinion that the interpretation of "inhabited" is "to dwell," "to live," "to hold as dweller," "to occupy for all purposes of life," or "occupied by inhabitants," and they were unable to interpret the expression in any other mode.

The commissioners therefore disallowed the assessment.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the appellant.—The house in question is an "inhabited dwelling-house" within the meaning of section 1 of the House Tax Act, 1851. That section provides that "there shall be assessed, raised, levied, collected, and paid . . . upon inhabited dwelling-houses in and throughout Great Britain the several duties set forth in the schedule to this Act annexed, payable according to the annual value of such dwelling-houses." The test to be applied in making the assessment is whether or not the house is "occupied," not whether it is "inhabited." This house having been furnished and ready for residence during the year of assessment was an "occupied" house: see per Lush, J., in Reg. v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee, 25 W. R. 827, 2 Q. B. D. 581. The tendency of the Legislature has been throughout to subject occupied property to rates and taxes. A house in the condition in which this house was during the year of assessment is assessable to inhabited house duty. There is no express decision on the point, but in Scotch cases there are several dicta which support the contention that occupation, as distinct from habitation, is sufficient to render a house liable to inhabited house duty: In re Glasgow Coal Exchange (Limited), 1 Tax. Cas. 211, 16 Sc. L. R. 457; In re Scottish Widows Fund Assurance Society, 1 Tax. Cas. 245, at p. 251, 17 Sc. L. R. 317; Corporation of Glasgow v. Inland Revenue, 18 Sc. L. R. 1, at p. 3.

A. T. Lawrence, K.C. (C. C. Scott with him), for the respondent.—The respondent is not liable to inhabited house duty in respect of this house for the year of assessment in question. The words "inhabited dwelling-houses" must be construed according to their common ordinary meaning. As no person lived in this house during the year it was not inhabited in the ordinary sense of the word. A house is not liable to the duty unless during the year of assessment it has been slept in, and even then it may not be liable in certain cases—for example, where the house is left in charge of a caretaker: see per Pollock, B., in The London Library v. Carter, 38 W. R. 478.

He cited Clifton College v. Thompson, 44 W. R. 410, [1896] 1 Q. B. 432; Riley v. Read, 27 W. R. 414, 4 Ex. D. 100; Lambton v. Kerr, 43 W. R. 541, [1895] 2 Q. B. 233; and Grant v. Langston, [1900] A. C. 383, 48 W. R. Dig. 75.

Rowlatt replied.

CHANNELL, J.—In this case there is a question of some nicety arising under a somewhat peculiar fact. There is a house which during the year of assessment was fully furnished and ready for occupation as a dwelling-house, but, in point of fact, during the year nobody slept in it or inhabited it in the ordinary sense of physically inhabiting it or living there. It was a house in the Isle of Wight that the owner had been in the habit of visiting from time to time with his family as a country residence, and also, in recent years at any rate, had been in the habit of letting furnished to other people to occupy in a similar way, but when he was not there in residence and had not let it he did not leave any servant or caretaker of any kind living in the house. There was a house agent close by who had the key of it, and he showed people over the house, if necessary, and he occasionally sent in someone to open the windows and air the place, and so on. But at no time during the actual year of assessment was the house lived in in the ordinary way. It was ready for use as a dwelling-house and ready for habitation, but it was not in point of fact inhabitated. At the same time it was occupied, because leaving the furniture there is for ordinary purposes, certainly including in particular the purpose of rating to the poor rate, occupation. It is a certain amount of use of the house, and I do not think it is questioned that what happened in this case would amount to occupation, although it is said, and certainly in the ordinary use of the word rightly said, it was not in fact inhabited.

Under these circumstances is the inhabited house duty payable? The duty is imposed in respect of inhabited houses, not of habitable houses. That much is, of course, quite clear. It was so in reference to the old Acts, and it is so in express terms in reference to the Act which really is the one I have to consider—namely, the Act of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36 (1851)—which reimposed the inhabited house duty which had been an existing tax, and which had been taken off some few years before. When this Act was passed, the window tax, which was a tax which existed for a great number of years, was taken off, and the inhabited house duty was restored, probably with variations as regards amount or anything of that sort, which does not concern me here. There was the tax imposed upon inhabited dwelling-houses by the first section, and by the second section all the powers, provisions, rules and regulations, directions, exemptions, fines, forfeitures, pains and penalties contained in any of the prior Acts with reference to the duties on inhabited houses were to be enforced in reference to the duties as reimposed. When you come to look at those various provisions, it is quite clear that in all the provisions in reference to the mode of charging the duty in reference to the period during the year of assessment for which relief from the duty was to be granted, the word that occurs is "occupied" and not "inhabited," and it appears as if the Legislature were treating the two words as meaning the same thing. Unless you can say either that "inhabited" means "occupied" or that "occupied" means "inhabited" you will get into difficulties in some one or other of the sections throughout the Act. There is a substantial difficulty to see how the thing is to be worked out. Before going to the clauses of the Act it seems to me as well to refer to the dicta upon the subject—I think there are only dicta—to which I have been referred. In Scotland it has been stated in two or three cases, and particularly emphatically and clearly in one case—Glasgow Corporation v. Inland Revenue—that "habitation" in this section is the same thing as "occupation." The Lord President says: "It is needless to say at this time of day that an inhabited house does not mean a place of residence—that habitation in the sense of the statute may consist of any kind of occupation of a house or building. If it be not unoccupied—that is to say, without any use made of it at all—then it is an unoccupied house within the meaning of the Act, and, being occupied, it is also within the meaning of the statute an inhabited house." If that passage correctly states the law in England as well as in Scotland—and there is no reason why it should be different—because this statute and the tax extends to Great Britain, and it is given in Scotland on the same terms as it is given in England—the present case seems to me to be quite clear. It is said, however, that there are dicta in England to the contrary, and the principal one, and probably the latest one, and one which certainly I should be inclined to follow if I were clear that it applied to the present case, is a statement by Wright, J., in the case of Clifton College v. Thompson. There was a question of a master's house and some other buildings in reference to Clifton College, and in dealing with one question the learned judge said: "That being so, the only ground on which the Crown could succeed would be that the college is assessable for the remainder of the premises as being a dwelling-house, or as including some other dwelling-house to which the rest is attached and occupied with that dwelling-house. But the premises which I have just mentioned"—I think he is referring to the chapel, library, sanatorium, gymnasium, racquet courts, fives courts, swimming baths, museum, and so forth—"do not appear to me to be capable of being treated as inhabited dwelling-houses at all. Boys do not dwell in or inhabit any class-room or gymnasium, or any of these other places; they neither dwell there or inhabit there, nor does anybody else so far as the case shows." Then we come to the passage there was a question about. "Then in addition to that on the second point to which I have adverted" (and I think that was shown by Mr. Lawrence to mean "the second point upon which I am now adverting") "it seems to me that the weight of authority in this country is to the effect that nothing is inhabited as a dwelling-house for the purposes of these Acts unless someone sleeps there." There is no doubt he had been referred to the Scottish cases, and to this particular one from which I have read a passage, and also had been referred to a case of Riley v. Read, which is an English case which has something on the point in it, but not very much; but he had also been referred to another case in England. He had not been referred to many cases, but he deals with it in this short way in his judgment: "It seems to me that the weight of an authority in this country is to that effect that nothing is inhabited as a dwelling-house for the purposes of these Acts unless someone sleeps there." As I say, if I knew exactly what authorities the learned judge was referring to, and that he had this point in his mind, I think I ought to follow that; but I am not quite able to understand. In the first place, he does not tell us which are the cases he does refer to which lead him to that conclusion, and in the next place what he is referring to is not so much to the fact that somebody does sleep there or that there is no sleeping accommodation, but he is referring to the character of the use that is made of the place—as a class-room, gymnasium, and so on—and I do not think he is meaning to say that if those places included a bedroom for a caretaker or somebody or other that the assessability for inhabited house duty would depend upon whether or not the bedroom was slept in during the year of assessment. I think he is rather referring to the character of the occupation of what he had before him—that it was not occupation including sleeping accommodation or occupation in the nature of it. In point of fact, laying stress not only upon the word "inhabited," but upon the phrase "inhabited dwelling-house." There being somewhat of an uncertainty as to what that means, the fact that it is only a dictum, and the fact that there are clear decisions in Scotland, seem to me practically to leave this quite open, so that I have to go back and look at the statute a little more carefully than I have hitherto done. In this case it seems to be admitted—I think it would have to be admitted, but it seems to me expressly admitted—that if this gentleman in the year in question had done that which in most of the years since he has had the house, he has done—namely, lived in it for a few weeks, or let it for a few weeks—then he would have been assessable to the inhabited house duty for the entire year. All the provisions which deal with dividing up the year of assessment into periods for which the tax is to be paid and periods for which it is not to be paid, clearly seem to deal with the question of occupation and not habitancy. The word "occupied" at any rate occurs in all of them, and the test is when it comes to be occupied and so on. It is "occupation" in all those sections that govern the question whether or not a portion of the year is a portion in respect of which the tax is to be paid. That being so, if it is correct to say that this house would have been taxable for the whole year if the owner of it had left it for the greater part of the year in exactly the condition in which he has left it—namely, furnished, with a key at a house-agent's close by, nobody actually in it—but had gone down and lived there in the summer for a month with his family and his servants, then one has to see how that would come about. It seems to me that it would come about in this way: When the assessment is made, if the person whose duty it is to go and make the assessment goes to the house, and finds it furnished and in that sense occupied, he has not to inquire whether anybody was sleeping there the night before, or whether anybody is going to sleep there on that night, but he is to assess it. That, I think, appears from the 10th section of the Act of 1803, and the 15th section of the same Act. The 10th section reads thus: "And every dwelling-house, cottage, or tenement of whatever description occupied at the time of making the assessment shall be brought into charge in respect of the duties set forth in the schedule marked A by the respective assessors." Now, that schedule marked A relates to the window tax and not to the inhabited house duty. The section then continues: "And in their default by the respective surveyors and inspectors herein mentioned, according to the number of windows therein, subject to the powers of discharging the same as after-mentioned." Then we get to the portion that seems material for the present case: "And every dwelling-house, cottage, or tenement and other the premises therewith occupied and hereby charged" clearly relate to the premises which are, for the purposes of the charge, to be included with the dwelling-house in the charge, such as certain outbuildings and things of that sort, and amongst other things they include the garden, provided it does not exceed one acre. That is, "the premises therewith occupied and hereby charged"—not all the premises therewith occupied, but so much of the premises therewith occupied as is hereby charged. The section then goes on: "As set forth in Schedule B, being together the annual rent of £5 or upwards, shall also be brought in charge in the like manner, according to the full and just yearly rent at which the same is really and bonâ fide worth to be let in respect of the duties set forth in the said schedule marked B." And if any assessor omits to charge and so on then he is subject to a penalty, "whether the occupier of any such house, cottage, or tenement shall be entitled to be discharged from the same in manner hereinafter mentioned or not." The 15th section corresponds with it, but relates to houses which are unoccupied at the time of making the assessment. It says: "Every house or tenement which shall happen to be unoccupied at the time of making the assessment shall be inserted as such in the assessment with the annual rent at which the same might be let if the same shall amount to £5 or upwards, and the assessors, and in their default the surveyors and inspectors, shall cause the same to be certified to the said commissioners from the time of such house or tenement coming into the occupation of any person or persons." So that if the house is occupied at the time of making the assessment, it is to be charged subject to the right of the right of the person to be discharged if any of the provisions of the statute enable him to be discharged. It seems to me, therefore, at the time of making this assessment the assessor would have to put this house in to assessment, because he would find it occupied, and that it would not be his business to inquire: "Was it slept in last night? Is it going to be slept in to-night?" or anything of the sort. It is occupied, it is habitable, it is a dwelling-house, it is ready for occupation as a dwelling-house, and not for something else. If it had no bedroom furniture in it or anything of that sort, but only class-room furniture or gymnasium apparatus or something of that sort, it would come under a different category as not being a dwelling-house at all, apart from the word "inhabited." But in the condition in which this house is, it is "occupied" as a dwelling-house although not "inhabited" as a dwelling-house, because it has the full furniture of a dwelling-house there, and is "occupied" for rating purposes. It seems to me, therefore, it is to come into charge, and, as I say, I think that is admitted in the argument for the respondent here, because it is agreed that he would be chargeable for the whole year if he had occupied or inhabited it at any period. That being so, it seems to me that even if the first operative words, as I may call them, of the section granting the tax would not in their ordinary interpretation of house duty cover it, it is brought in by this section, which directs that it shall be charged subject to such power as there is for the person charged to be discharged under any of the various sections of the Act. If that is the true interpretation, it is, I think, quite clear that there is no section of the Act under which the respondent can get discharged on the ground neither he nor anyone else had slept in the house during the year in question. None of the sections in reference to dividing up the period into times the house is occupied and times when it is unoccupied apply, and it seems to me that the result, therefore, will be practically that which the Scotch judges appear to have said it was—namely, that for the purposes of this statute a house is to be deemed to be an inhabited dwelling-house if, in point of fact, there is an occupier of it. Of course the fact of there being an occupier of it does not necessarily make him an inhabitant of it. There may be an inhabitant of a house who may be a servant, and his inhabitance may amount to occupation by somebody else, his master. That is the sort of case which may no doubt arise; but it seems to me that if, as here, such occupation as there may be of the house is an occupation of it as a dwelling-house as distinguished from the case dealt with by Wright, J., of a class-room and gymnasium, and things of that sort—if this house is ready to be slept in when the owner or anyone he sends there wants to sleep there, then it is inhabited within the meaning of these statutes. I think that it is the better interpretation on the whole. You have either to read "inhabited" in the first part as meaning "occupied," or "occupied" in a great many of the other parts as meaning "inhabited," and there is a choice between the two, and, having regard, amongst other things, to the analogy of rating, although it depends on different words, I think on the whole that the proper conclusion to come to is that the tax here has been imposed upon a house under such conditions as this one. I may just add that if the proposition contended for, that a house which was in the condition in which this house has been for the whole year could be released from a proportion of the tax by reason of its being in that condition for a portion of the year, could be maintained, it seems to me absolutely certain that this question must have arisen long ago, because it is an extremely common case. The particular case that has arisen here—namely, the house being occupied, uninhabited in this way for the entire year—is no doubt a somewhat rare one. It is not often that furnished houses are left without someone sleeping in them and unprotected for an entire year, and that accounts for the question not having arisen and been decided during the number of years which have elapsed since this tax was imposed. If the other proposition were contended for, it would be a very strong argument indeed against it, that it had never been set up during all this number of years. From the first imposition of the tax I suppose nearly one hundred years have passed, and considering the number of cases in which houses must have been left in this sort of state for a portion of the year, it would be a very strong argument against such contention; but that contention has not been set up, and it is to a considerable extent in consequence of that position of things that it appears to be agreed that relief does not exist for the portions of the year for which the house is in this condition, and it seems to me that it is taxable when it is for the whole year in that same position.

On the whole, therefore, I think my judgment must be for the Crown.

A company registered and having its head office in

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

England purchased nitrate grounds abroad. The business of the company was to manufacture nitrates and iodine from the caliche which was dug up from the surface of the nitrate grounds. The chief value of the grounds consisted in the caliche, and when that had been worked out the land, machinery, and plant would be of little value. The exact amount of caliche used by the company in any year could be ascertained without difficulty. In assessing the profits of the company to income tax under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts the company claimed a deduction in respect of the cost of the raw material caliche as being a disbursement or expense for the purpose of their trade.

Held, that the caliche represented capital of the company, and that the exhaustion of the caliche was in the nature of exhausted capital for which no deduction was allowable.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 16.—COLLINS, M.R., read the following judgment: The appellants are an English company who own a large tract of nitrate grounds in Chile. The upper stratum of these grounds consists of a substance called "caliche." This upper stratum, which contains about 30 per cent. of nitrate of soda, is loosened in the ground by explosives, and is then dug up, carted away, and utilized for the production of nitrate and iodine. The appellants are assessed to income tax under Schedule D, and claim, for the purpose of computing the balance of their profits and gains, to deduct a sum representing the cost price to them of the amount of "caliche" consumed in the year's working. Assuming that this sum can be calculated, as they contend it can, the question is whether they are entitled to make the deduction. They fully admit that if the tax was levied under Schedule A they could not support the deduction, but they claim that their position is radically different under Schedule D. Channell, J., affirming the view of the commissioners, has disallowed their claim, and against his decision they now appeal.

Their contention is that the sum deducted represents only the cost of the raw material consumed in the year and stored in the ground till consumed, and that there can be no distinction in principle between raw material acquired once for all and stored and the like material acquired from time to time as it is wanted for the purpose of manufacture. In my opinion, this contention is concluded by authority. The point has been frequently discussed in other cases where capital has been embarked in a wasting subject-matter, such as a coal mine, and the same argument has been advanced and overruled. I think those cases establish that on this particular point the provisions of Schedule D are no more favourable to the appellants than those of Schedule A. The words of Schedule A, No. III., under which this case would have fallen had the property been situate in England, are these: "The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited." The provisions of Schedule D, first case, rule 3, are as follows: "In estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made . . . nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom; nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern. . . ." The cases by which the contention for the appellants is concluded are Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, 2 Rettie 431; Knowles v. McAdam, 46 W. R. 114, 3 Ex. D. 23; and Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 6 Rettie 617; in the House of Lords, 29 W. R. 317, 6 App. Cas. 315; the first and last decided in Scotland, and the second in England. They are all reported in vol. 1 of the Tax Cases. The first and third raised the question of deductions claimed for the cost of sinking pits; the second for exhaustion of coals. In the English case it was held in the Exchequer Division that a deduction for exhaustion of coal might be made; in the Scotch cases, the first decided before, and the second after, the English case, the opposite view was taken, and the deduction for pit sinking was disallowed. The last case, Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, was taken to the House of Lords, where the Scotch decisions were approved and the English decision overruled. They were all treated as involving the same question. Thus barely stated, they conclude the case for the appellants, which could not have been argued but for a certain complication, which I have purposely omitted, and which, in my judgment, does not affect the decision, but upon which Mr. Danckwerts rested the whole of his argument. That complication arose thus. By section 8 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 36), it is enacted that the concerns described in No. III. of Schedule A, under which the concerns in question fell, "shall be charged and assessed to the duties hereby granted in the manner in the said No. III. mentioned, according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D of the said Act, so far as such rules are consistent with the said No. III." This enactment was treated in the courts below in all the three cases as bringing them within Schedule D, and the Scotch cases, therefore, are express decisions on Schedule D. In reviewing the whole question the House of Lords, in affirming those decisions, though they pointed out that they were to be dealt with under Schedule A, found no fault whatever with the reasoning or the result. On the contrary, Lord Cairns says (6 App. Cas., at p. 324): "I do not think this question is affected by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36. That Act provides that mines shall be charged and assessed according to the rules prescribed by Schedule D of the principal Act, so far as such rules are consistent with No. III. of Schedule A. But the thing to be assessed remains the same." Lord Blackburn goes a little more into detail. He says (at p. 337): "I see that in Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue reliance is placed in the judgment of the Lord President on the third rule as to concerns under the first case of Schedule D, that no deduction is to be made 'for any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital.' But I do not think reliance can be placed on this. If from the nature of the concerns in No. III. an allowance ought to be made for capital, then this rule should be rejected as inconsistent with No. III. If no such allowance should be made, the rule is not required." He decided, therefore, in disallowing the deduction, that this result followed from Schedule A itself, not because Schedule D would not have worked the same result as the Scotch court had held, but because it was not required. Lord Penzance did not refer to the point at all. The result is that the authority of the Scotch cases stands unimpaired on the construction of Schedule D. But though this would be enough to decide the appeal, the matter does not rest there, since there is also English authority for the application of the same principle to cases under Schedule D. In Gillatt v. Colquhoun, 33 W. R. 258, 2 Tax Cas. 76, a case under Schedule D in which a deduction was claimed in respect of the depreciation in value of a leasehold interest by efflluxion of time, A. L. Smith, J., said (at p. 83): "It seems to me also that in the case of the Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, which, as was pointed out by Mr. Grantham, was with regard to mining under Schedule A, the learned law lords who decided that case undoubtedly laid down that which seems to me to be applicable to Schedule D as well as to Schedule A—namely, that diminishing capital or exhausted capital cannot be brought into your profits and gains when making out your accounts either under Schedule D or Schedule A." Again, in City of London Contract Corporation v. Styles, 2 Tax Cas. 239, another case under Schedule D, the same principle was upheld in the Court of Appeal. The deduction was there claimed in respect of a portion of the sum paid by the company in purchasing the benefit of certain unexecuted contracts which the company was formed to take over, and from executing which their profits were realized. The argument there, as here, was, "You can use your capital in purchasing contracts from which you derive your annual profits. It is capital to start with, but then you use your capital wholly and exclusively for the purposes of your concern." To which Bowen, L.J., answers: "You do not use it 'for the purpose of' your concern, which means, for the purpose of carrying on your concern, but you use it to acquire the concern." The deduction was disallowed. That the principles governing this question are the same under both schedules was again asserted by the Scotch Court in Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Co. v. Kinmont, 17 Rettie 154, 2 Tax Cas. 516: see particularly the judgment of Lord McLaren, 17 Rettie, at pp. 165, 166, 2 Tax Cas., at p. 531. As pointed out by Channell, J., the question in these cases is not whether the deduction might be made in a theoretically perfect balance-sheet, but whether it is a deduction permitted by the Act. For the reasons I have given I regard this question as concluded by authority, and, therefore, it is unnecessary to examine it once again ab initio. The judgment of Channell, J., must be affirmed.

STIRLING, L.J., read the following judgment: The Alianza Co. is an English company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, with its registered office in London. The memorandum of association bears date the 11th of June, 1895. The objects for which the company was established were therein stated to be (amongst others) (a) to acquire and take over nitrate grounds known as Alianza, in Chile, with the buildings and machinery thereon, and a site for the erection of a manufactory and for refuse grounds, and also other lands adjoining the nitrate grounds and certain other lands, all being the property of Messrs. Gibbs; (b) to carry on the business of manufacturers and exporters of and dealers in nitrate, iodine, and other products. The company has, in accordance with these provisions of the memorandum, become the owner of the nitrate grounds, lands, buildings, and machinery mentioned in the memorandum, and has erected a factory on the site therein referred to. The nitrate grounds are of considerable extent, and contain deposits of a substance called "caliche," being the raw material from which nitrate of soda and potash and iodine can be manufactured. The company has worked these deposits and manufactured the "caliche" so obtained into the nitrates and iodine by the sale of which the company has realized very considerable profits. It is not disputed that, in accordance with decisions of the House of Lords in San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co. v. Carter, 44 W. R. 336, [1896] A. C. 31, the company is liable to be assessed in respect of such profits under Schedule D, case 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842; but a question has arisen whether, in making such assessment, there ought to be deducted from the admitted receipts of the company any sum in respect of the cost price of the "caliche" worked up by the company in the course of each year. The company claims to be entitled so to do on the ground that such cost is an expense "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade," within the meaning of the first rule applicable to the first and second cases under Schedule D. Primâ facie, the claim appears to be reasonable, for such an expense ought certainly to be deducted by a prudent trader from his gross receipts before he arrives at the amount of his profits for any particular period. But the answer on behalf of the Crown is that, however this may be, the deduction in question is forbidden by the terms of the Income Tax Act itself, and reference is made to the third rule applicable to the first case under Schedule D. That rule reads: "In estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains on account of any sum expended for repairs of premises occupied for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, nor for any sum expended for the supply or repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, beyond the sum usually expended for such purposes according to an average of three years preceding the year in which such assessment shall be made; nor on account of loss not connected with or arising out of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor on account of any capital withdrawn therefrom; nor for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern; nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern. . . ." With this there ought to be borne in mind section 159, which provides that "in the computation of duty to be made under this Act in any of the cases before mentioned . . . it shall not be lawful to make any other deductions therefrom than such as are expressly enumerated in this Act, nor to make any deduction on account of any annual interest, annuity, or other annual payment to be paid to any person out of any profits or gains chargeable by this Act, in regard that a proportionate part of the duty so to be charged is allowed to be deducted on making such payments, nor to make any deduction from the profits or gains arising from any property herein described, or from any office or employment of profit, on account of diminution of capital employed or loss sustained in any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, or in any profession, employment, or vocation." It is clear from these enactments (as has been repeatedly pointed out) that the law does not permit, as regards such assessments, all deductions which a prudent trader would make in ascertaining his own profits. In the present case the particular words relied on are those which prohibit deductions "for any sum employed or intended to be employed as capital in such trade." This prohibition was given effect to by this court, affirming the decision of a Divisional Court, in City of London Contract Corporation v. Styles, 2 Tax. Cas. 239. In that case the company had purchased for the sum of £180,000 the premises as a going concern of Charles Phillips & Co., contractors for public works and engineers, with their contracts, plant, and materials. From their receipts in carrying on the business they claimed to deduct a sum of £80,000, which (as they stated) "substantially represented a portion of the purchase-money paid to Charles Phillips & Co. for the purchase of the contracts and business on which the said net profits were realized. . . . The said business consisted entirely of partially executed or wholly unexecuted contracts and of the rights thereunder and the benefits to accrue therefrom": 2 Tax. Cas., at p. 241. The argument was that this £80,000 was money "wholly and exclusively laid out or expended" for the purposes of the business. The court decided against the claim of the company, Fry, L.J., saying: "It appears to me that this £80,000 was a sum 'employed or intended to be employed' as capital in the trade of the company; therefore it is a sum from which no deduction can be made under the Income Tax Acts": 2 Tax Cas., at p. 245. Now in the present case the cost price of the "caliche" deposited in the nitrate grounds formed part of the price paid by the Alianza Co. for the acquisition by them from Messrs. Gibbs of those nitrate grounds and other property. The argument urged before this court by Mr. Danckwerts was precisely that used in the case of City of London Contract Corporation v. Styles; and in my opinion effect cannot be given to that argument without departing from the decision in that case, which is binding on this court. That decision, however, does not stand alone. The same view was taken by the Court of Session in Scotland in a series of cases—viz., Addie v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue, 2 Rettie, 431, 1 Tax Cas. 1; Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, 6 Rettie, 617, 1 Tax Cas. 287, which was affirmed in the House of Lords, 29 W. R. 717, 6 App. Cas. 315, 1 Tax Cas. 311; Inland Revenue v. Farie, 16 Sc. L. R. 189. It is true that in all these cases the assessment was made under Schedule A, to which the rules under Schedule D were made applicable by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, s. 8, only "so far as such rules are consistent with" Schedule A. It is also true that Lord Blackburn, in advising the House of Lords in Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, held that recourse ought not to have been had in Addie's case to the third rule under the first case in Schedule D; but neither he nor any of the other noble lords who took part in the decision cast any doubt on the construction placed on that rule by the judges in Scotland. The only authority in the appellants' favour is Knowles v. McAdam, 26 W. R. 114, 3 Ex. D. 23, but this case was overruled by the House of Lords in Coltness Iron Co. v. Black, no doubt on the ground that an erroneous construction had been placed by the Exchequer Division on the statute 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, s. 8, already referred to. But at the same time I am unable to see that anything was said which lends support to the argument on behalf of the present appellants. It was said that the Alianza Co. is entitled to apply capital in payment of dividends, and the case of Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co., 41 Ch. D. 1, was referred to. I do not think it necessary to discuss the vexed question whether capital can be lawfully applied in payment of dividends, and, if so, in what circumstances. It is sufficient to say that I am not satisfied that such capital (if any) as may be lawfully paid away by a company to its shareholders in the shape of dividends would be regarded by the Legislature as an unfit subject for assessment to income tax, or would not fall within the prohibited deductions in respect of "capital withdrawn" or sums "employed or intended to be employed as capital." For these reasons I think that the appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

MATHEW, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The objections to the assessment have been sufficiently dealt with in the judgment of Channell, J., and I cannot add anything to the reasons given in the judgments of the Master of the Rolls and Stirling, L.J., for dismissing the appeal.

Originating summons.

This was a summons taken out for the purpose of determining, among other matters, the question whether in respect of a will certain settlement estate duty was payable out of certain settled chattels or out of a fund therein specified.

The facts were shortly as follows: By her will, dated the 3rd of July, 1899, a testatrix bequeathed certain pecuniary legacies therein specified, which she declared should be "free of all death duties." She made also certain specific bequests therein mentioned, and bequeathed certain chattels to the plaintiffs upon trust for some persons with divers remainders over. She then bequeathed a fund which she expressly specified, to the executors and trustees of her will upon trust to pay thereout her funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and the legacies which she had bequeathed in her will, and also to pay thereout "the death duties payable out of my estate," and to stand possessed of the residue of the said fund upon trust as to a part for the defendant, and as to the remainder on trusts therein declared. She bequeathed the residue of her property to the defendant.

The testatrix died on the 10th of May, 1903.

Subsequently this summons was taken out by her executors and trustees.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—The question is whether the settlement estate duty on the settled chattels is payable out of those chattels or out of the specific fund bequeathed "upon trust to pay thereout my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and the legacies bequeathed by this my will, and the death duties payable out of my estate." Does this trust amount to "an express provision to the contrary" within section 19, sub-section 1, of the Finance Act, 1896? Unless it does, the settled chattles must bear the duty payable under section 19. On the other hand, if the trust amounts to "an express provision to the contrary," effect must be given to it under the section.

The language of the testatrix is very wide. She directs "the death duties payable out of my estate" to be paid out of the specific fund. It is clear that settlement estate duty is a death duty. In section 13 of the Finance Act, 1894, where the expression "death duties" occurs, the expression is defined as including estate duty, and therefore settlement estate duty. A direction to pay "the death duties payable out of my estate" out of a specific fund would primâ facie include all death duties—i.e., settlement estate duty as well as estate duty. In In re Lewis there was a direction to pay "all duties payable by law out of my estate" out of a specific fund. It was contended that the testatrix had contracted duties of two classes—namely, duties payable by law out of her estate—i.e., duties payable by reason of death simpliciter, and duties payable by reason of something else—viz., the disposition she had made, such as the legacy duties. Kekewich, J., did not adopt this construction, but held that the "duties payable by law out of any estate" meant the duties thrown upon the residuary estate, and did not include settlement estate duty, which the law has said shall be payable out of the settled legacy. I am, however, not embarrassed by the expression "by law" in the present case. In the recent case of In re Pimm the testator, after settling certain freeholds, directed "my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and duties" to be paid out of residue. Farwell, J., said: "The expression 'my duties' is certainly a wide phrase, and I see no ground for restricting its generality. I think it is a compendious way of expressing what he had in his mind, and that he meant to say 'all duties to which my estate is liable by reason of any of the dispositions I have made in my will.' I can see no other sensible construction of this direction in the residuary clause of the will. The duties are payable to the revenue, but they arise under the provisions of the testator's will, and in this sense are the testator's duties. . . . The result is that in this case the settlement estate duty as well as the estate duty are payable out of the general residuary estate."

In the present case I am of opinion that the expression "the death duties payable out of my estate" extends to all death duties—viz., settlement estate duty as well as estate duty. It is a convenient and compendious expression, and I can see no reason to restrict its meaning. The duties must, therefore, be borne by the specified fund.

In re MANSER.
ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LUCAS. (a.)

Will—Legacy—Charity—Repair of burial grounds—Restriction to members of a particular sect—Advancement of religion.

A bequest for the purpose of keeping in order burial grounds which are restricted to the use of the Society of Friends is a gift for the advancement of religion, and, consequently, a valid charitable bequest.

Adjourned summons.

By his will, Alfred Manser, who died on the 27th of October, 1902, and was a member of the Society of Friends, gave various legacies, and continued as follows: "As to all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects both real and personal I give, devise, and bequeath the same to the said Edmund Lucas and George Bell Gripper upon trust to pay the following legacies and annuities—that is to say, to pay to the Hertford and Hoddesdon Preparative Meeting the sum of £1,000, I directing that the meeting shall appoint five of their members to receive and give a receipt for the same, and that the same shall be invested by the five members and the interest applied by them under the order of the said Preparative Meeting for the sole purpose of keeping in good order the existing burial grounds under the care of the meeting, and in particular the grave of my late wife."

Under the care of the Preparative Meeting were the following existing burial grounds: (1) Cottered (now disused), which John Exton gave by will "unto all Christian people to bury their dead frank and free without money and without price, so long as the world should endure"; (2) Hoddesdon; (3) Hertford, a piece of arable land used by the people called Quakers as a burying place; and (4) Ware (now disused).

Five members of the Preparative Meeting were duly appointed to receive the legacy, but the executors declined to pay it on the ground that it was void.

The Attorney-General, to whom the question of the legacy had been certified by the Charity Commissioners, took out this summons asking for an order directing the executors to pay the legacy to the Preparative Meeting.

E. Beaumont, for the summons.—This is a valid charitable trust, although restricted to the benefit of the members of a particular society. These trusts are sufficiently for the benefit of the public to support this legacy. A trust to keep in repair a church, or even the ornaments of a church, is good; therefore a gift to keep in repair the churchyard round the church is good: In re Vaughan, (1886) 33 Ch. D. 187, 192.

H. Terrell, K.C., and A. D. Tyssen, for the representatives of Henry Manser, the residuary legatee.—To be a good charitable legacy a gift for the repair of a burial ground must come within one of the four classes mentioned by Lord Macnaghten in Commissioners for Special Purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel, [1891] A. C. 531, 583, 40 W. R. Dig. 217. It must be a trust for the relief of poverty, for the advancement of education, for the advancement of religion, or for other purposes beneficial to the community. This case is obviously not within the first two heads. We submit, further, that it is not for the advancement of religion. A gift for keeping up a meeting-house would be good, but Quakers do not hold any settled religious service on the occasion of a funeral. A trust for the benefit of the members of a particular society such as a club or a friendly society is not a charity: In re Clark's Trust, 24 W. R. 233, (1875) 1 Ch. D. 497. The Society of Friends is simply a club. A burial ground belonging to the Church of England is not in the same position, because it is within the Church Building Act, 1803, which allows land to be given for burial grounds, and money not exceeding £500 to be given for the repair of churchyards. Such a gift would not be valid without the Act, and it does not apply to Quakers. The gift in In re Vaughan, 33 Ch. D. 187, for the repair of a churchyard was only supported on the ground that it was legalised by the Act. There is no case in which a gift of a burial ground for dissenters has been held to be a public charity.

Cann, for the executors.

M. Romer held a watching brief for the Preparative Meeting.

WARRINGTON, J.—Is a gift of money for the purpose of providing a burial ground a good charitable gift? If it is, it seems to me that a gift of money for the purpose of keeping such a burial ground in order would also be a good charitable gift. Now, is a gift of a burial ground for the benefit of the Society of Friends a good charitable gift? In my opinion it is. A gift of money for the purpose of providing, or, as in this case, for the purpose of keeping in good order, a burial ground, though that burial ground may not be a parish churchyard, and though it may be connected with the meeting-house of or for the benefit of members of a particular religious community, may, in my opinion, be supported as a gift for the advancement of religion, and therefore be a good charitable gift. There can be no doubt that a gift of money to be invested in the purchase of land or in the purchase of a building to be used as a chapel or meeting-house for the purposes of a particular Christian denomination would be a good charitable gift, as would be also money to be expended in the maintenance or "keeping in good order," to use the words in this will, of such a building. The same would be true of the ornaments of the building and the furniture or things necessary for the celebration of worship of whatever form conducted in that building. It seems to me that it is impossible to distinguish between money given for any of those purposes and money given for the purpose of providing or keeping in repair a burial ground, which I think most people would regard as ancillary to a building devoted to religious purposes in the way I have mentioned. I think one naturally connects the burial of the dead with religion. In re Vaughan, 33 Ch. D. 187, has been referred to as not supporting this view. That was a case of money given for the repair of a churchyard, and the question arose whether money so given was validly devoted to charitable purposes. North, J., found that it was. He found a good reason in his mind for so holding in the words of the Church Building Act, 1803, and he decided it on the words of that Act. It does not at all follow that if he had been driven to it he would not have decided it in the same way on other grounds, and I cannot see, therefore, that the case is any authority against the view which I have just expressed. But I think that he did also decide it on the broader ground. If one looks at the passage referred to in 33 Ch. D., p. 192, where the learned judge sums up what he had been saying in reference to the Church Building Act, I think one can see what his true view was. He says: "To put it shortly, I do not see any difference between a gift to keep in repair what is called 'God's house' and a gift to keep in repair the churchyard round it, which is often called 'God's acre.'"

It is admitted that a gift to keep in repair a Quaker's meeting-house would be a perfectly good gift. If so, on this view a gift to keep in repair a Quaker burial ground would be a perfectly good gift.

There will be a declaration that the legacy is valid, and a direction that it shall be paid, with interest at 4 per cent., to the five members of the Preparative Meeting upon production of evidence of their appointment.

HARGROVES, ARONSON, & CO. v. HARTOPP AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant — Building let in flats — Roof retained by landlord—No express covenant by landlord to keep roof in repair—Negligence in user of roof by landlord.

The defendant was the owner of a building let out in flats, and the plaintiff was a tenant of one of the flats. The roof was not demised, but remained in the possession and under the control of the defendant. The defendant neglected to clean out the gutters and pipes, and further neglected to repair them after notice had been given to him by the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff suffered damage.

(a.) Reported by MAURICE N. DRUCQUER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that apart altogether from any implied obligation upon the defendant to repair the roof retained in his possession and under his control, if there be evidence of negligent user of the roof by him whereby his tenant suffered damage, an action is maintainable by the tenant.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of his Honour Judge Rentoul at the City of London County Court.

By an agreement dated the 14th day of November, 1902, the defendant demised to the plaintiff a flat on the third floor of premises situate at Nos. 39, 40, 41, Foster-lane, Cheapside. The lease contained a covenant by the plaintiff to keep in good repair, and a covenant by the defendant that the plaintiff should peaceably hold and enjoy, the premises demised.

The roof of the building was not demised by the agreement, but remained in the possession and under the control of the defendant. There was no express covenant by the the defendant to repair, or keep in repair, the roof.

Owing to the defective condition of the roof, water went through to the plaintiff's premises and caused certain damage, in respect of which the plaintiff brought an action in the county court, and recovered the sum of £38. The learned county court judge found that the defendant had repaired the roof in the past at the request of his tenants, none of whom had in fact repaired, or been called upon to repair it; that in January and July a proper inspection of the condition of the roof had not been made; that in July at the request of the plaintiff the defendant had remedied certain defects in the roof, but in October, owing to the work and inspection having been negligently effected, the gutters and pipes became choked, causing water to come down into the plaintiff's premises, whereby the plaintiff sustained damage; that the plaintiff immediately gave notice to the defendant on the 22nd of October, but that the surveyor of the defendant did not attend until the 26th of October, during which interval further damage was sustained. The learned county court judge held that the defendant had been negligent in not keeping the gutters clean, and in not attending quickly enough after he had notice.

The defendant appealed, on the ground that the learned judge was wrong in law in holding that the defendant was under any liability to use reasonable care in keeping the gutters and pipes in question in good order.

Holman Gregory, for the appellant.—The defendant proved that there was no structural defect in the roof, and seeing that as a matter of law there was no liability on the defendant to repair, there was no cause of action against him. It is, of course, settled law that if the landlord does not covenant to repair he is not liable to repair: Gott v. Gandy, 23 L. J. Q. B. 1. Miller v. Hancock, 41 W. R. 578, [1893] 2 Q. B. 177, is no authority against the defendant, because there the plaintiff was a stranger invited to go on the premises. The landlord cannot be liable under the covenant for quiet enjoyment, because here there is no act of commission on the part of the landlord: Harrison v. Muncaster, 40 W. R. 102, [1891] 2 Q. B. 680 (see Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 684). There have been American decisions in my favour where the facts were precisely the same, Krueger v. Ferrant, 43 Am. Reps. 223—"In a lease there is no implied covenant on the part of the lessor to repair, and this applies to the case of distinct tenements under a common roof and the want of repair of the roof." Carstairs v. Taylor, 19 W. R. 723, L. R. 6 Exch. 217, is in my favour.

Sturges.—It has been decided that the landlord must take reasonable care: see all the judgments in Miller v. Hancock. So again all the judgments in Carstairs v. Taylor favour the view for which I am contending. I submit there is a duty upon the landlord to keep the roof in proper repair: Blake v. Woolf, 47 W. R. 8, [1898] 2 Q. B. 426.

Gregory replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J. — This case raises intricate points and is one of the instances which are not infrequently occurring of important points arising in small county court cases which require as much consideration as though they involved large sums of money and were being dealt with in the High Court without the formalities of such proceedings. We have come to the conclusion after the able argument addressed to us that upon the facts as we presume them to have been found in this case we ought not to interfere. I will say a word later with respect to the proposition which Mr. Gregory invited us to decide, but I think it proper to state first what I understand to be the facts. The learned county court judge found that the roof was not demised to the plaintiff in this case, and there is no evidence that any of the tenants, of whom the plaintiff was one, had any access to the roof or special privilege to go upon the roof, and the tenants had not in fact repaired the roof nor were called upon to repair it. Secondly, the learned county court judge has not based his judgment upon any neglect of the defendant, the landlord, of a duty to repair the roof. There was evidence that at one time the roof was out of repair and the repair was done. But it seemed in the opinion of the learned county court judge that neither the pipes nor the gutter were cleared in January or July, and that the roof was not inspected; further, that after notice on the 22nd of October the defendant's agents did not go to inspect in the time they ought to have done, whereby damage was sustained. We ought not to interfere in this case if there be a right of action to some part of the damage. We have got to deal with that state of things having regard to the findings of the learned county court judge, and seeing whether the learned county court judge has decided rightly in law upon these facts.

We have three findings of the learned county court judge: The roof was under the control of defendant, the gutter was not clear, and the defendant did not go quickly enough. Under the circumstances is the learned county court judge right in the view he has taken where the roof is under control and in the possession of the landlord? I do not wish to decide, nor is it necessary to decide in this case, that there is in all cases an obligation to repair on the landlord. We may have to decide that some day, but Mr. Gregory has ingeniously suggested that the landlord cannot be liable in this case because what he has been charged with is an act of omission and not of commission. I think that is a fallacy, because it seems to me, assuming the landlord to keep control of the roof and retain it in his possession and not to clear it out after he has notice, it may very soon amount to an act of commission—viz., allowing gutters to choke after he has notice. Assuming that the landlord has retained control of the roof and has, as in this case, repaired it when called upon, and has inspected it from time to time, is he liable to an action where the gutters are choked by neglect to repair them and when he knows they are in a dirty condition? Is there any authority that bears that out? It is strenuously urged by Mr. Gregory that unless there is an obligation upon the landlord to repair his neglect to clear out the gutters cannot be regarded as a breach of obligation to keep the roof in proper condition and proper repair. I think the cases have differentiated between mere obligation to repair and user when a part of the property is repaired and retained in the possession of the landlord, where there has been negligence on his part, and Carstairs v. Taylor is a case in which a similar point arose. In Carstairs v. Taylor, where the defendant had let to the plaintiff the ground floor of a warehouse, the upper floor being kept by the defendant himself, and a rat ate a hole in a pipe, whereby the rain came through into the plaintiff's premises and damaged his goods, it was held that the defendant was not liable, either on the ground of an implied obligation or that he had brought the water to the place from which it entered the warehouse. Mr. Gregory pressed us to say that the judgments rather contradicted the view that there was any obligation to repair. I do not think they went so far. I see the Chief Baron says that, conceded an implied covenant, the landlord would not be liable for mischief arising out of accidents of this kind. He decided that as the rat had caused the damage it was not his liability. Bramwell, B., adopts the same view, and says that the defendant can only be liable if he was guilty of negligence. And Martin, B., on p. 223, says: "Probably the defendant was under a liability to use reasonable care in keeping the roof secure, but he cannot be held responsible for what no reasonable care and vigilance would have provided against." That case was decided in 1871.

In Miller v. Hancock which is so frequently cited in this class of case, the defendant was the owner of a building the different floors of which were let separately, the staircase remaining in his possession and control. The plaintiff, a stranger, while coming down the staircase, slipped, owing to the defective condition of the staircase, and sustained injuries. The decision was in favour of the plaintiff, on the ground that there was by necessary implication an agreement by the defendant with his tenants to keep the staircase in repair, and inasmuch as the defendant must have contemplated that it would be used by persons having business with his tenants there was a duty on his part towards such persons to keep it in a reasonably safe condition. I am bound to say, now I have my attention drawn to these judgments by Mr. Sturges, there is much in favour of the view that as part of their reasoning in reference to the case of Smith v. London and St. Katharine Docks Co., L. R. 3 C. P. 326, they considered that there was a duty on the part of the landlord to the plaintiff in that case, apart from any question of a covenant to repair. It may be that that arises from the fact that they were dealing with the question of access to the house and it may be that they were considering it only from the point of view of deciding what was the right of the plaintiff, who was a stranger invited to go there, but I am bound to say that both Lord Esher, M.R., and Bowen, L.J., did use plain expressions in their judgments which would indicate that in their opinion there would be an obligation in respect to property the control of which still remains under the landlord, though such expressions went to a greater extent than was necessary for the actual decision in that case. But I do not think the judgment of Kay, L.J., goes so far, though he does say at the beginning of his judgment: "The question here raised is whether the duty to keep the staircase in a safe condition fell upon the landlord or the tenant."

I do not think Mr. Gregory is correct in saying that Miller v. Hancock has not some bearing in favour of the plaintiff. But I am content to decide the case on the basis that the landlord had retained in his possession the roof; the tenants had no special right to go on the roof to clean out the gutters, and there was evidence before the learned county court judge of negligence on the part of landlord; neglect to clear out the roof in the first instance and neglect to clear out after he had notice, and that being my view of the law and of the findings of fact, I think the judgment proceeded on the right basis and we ought not to interfere.

The American cases, though similar to this case, only involve questions of liability to repair and do not involve negligent user of part of the premises which remain under the control of the landlord. I do not decide the more difficult question whether there may not in all circumstances be an obligation to repair. There is an authority in 11 Modern Reports 7 that there may be an obligation to repair. I do not wish to decide that, but what I decide is, where the landlord is found to remain in possession and there has been negligent user on his part an action is maintainable.

WOLFE v. CLERK OF THE SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.
REEVE v. THE SAME. (a.)

Election law—Registration—County vote—Ownership qualification—Freehold estate of vicar in parish church building and its site—Pew rents—Occupation—Representation of the People Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 24.

Section 24 of the Reform Act, 1832, enacts that no person shall be entitled to a parliamentary county vote in respect of his estate as a freeholder in any land or building "occupied by himself," if such land or building so occupied is of such value (now £10 per annum) as would confer on him the right of voting for a borough, whether he shall or shall not have actually acquired the right to the borough vote in respect of such building or land (i.e., by being registered).

A vicar was the owner, in his capacity of vicar, of a freehold estate in merely the parish church building and the land on which it stood and the graveyard adjoining; he also received as vicar for his own use the "pew rents" —i.e., moneys paid by persons for the use of sittings in the pews of the church during divine service—to the amount of £40 a year. The said church building and land were situate within a parliamentary borough.

Held, that the vicar did not in these circumstances "himself occupy" the said church building and land within the meaning of section 24 of the above Act, and consequently was not by virtue of that section, prevented from having the parliamentary county vote as owner of a freehold estate in the said church building and land.

Semble, the fact that, in the case of a new parish church erected under the Church Building Acts, neither the Order in Council creating the new parish nor the deed of consecration of the church, contains the special provisions relating to pew rents embodied in the Church Building Acts, does not render the collection and receipt of pew rents by, or on behalf of, the vicar, illegal.

These were two cases stated by the revising barrister of the Wimbledon Division of the County of Surrey, and the main question raised in each was as follows:

Where a vicar in his capacity of vicar is the owner of a freehold property (situate within a parliamentary borough) consisting only of the parish church building and the land on which it is built and the graveyard adjoining, and actually receives for his own use "pew rents"—i.e., sums of money paid by persons for the use of sittings in the pews in the church during service—amounting to a greater sum than £10 a year, is the vicar to be deemed to be "in occupation" of the said church and land within the meaning of section 24 of the Reform Act, 1832, which in effect enacts that where a person holds freehold property in a borough of sufficient annual value (£10) to confer on him the right of voting for the borough, he shall not, if he be himself in occupation of the said freehold property, be entitled to be registered as a parliamentary elector for the county in respect of his ownership of the said freehold property.

WOLFE v. CLERK OF THE SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL.

The Reverend Edward Wolfe, in December, 1903, was inducted vicar of the parish or vicarage of St. Thomas, and had duly claimed to have his name entered on the list of parliamentary electors for the Wimbledon Division of the County of Surrey in respect of the ownership of freehold property in the said parish, the nature of his qualification, as stated in his claim, being "freehold benefice," and the description of the qualifying property being "the vicarage church of St. Thomas, Telford-park, Streatham."

The claimant in his capacity of vicar was the owner of a freehold estate in the said church building, the land on which it stood, and the graveyard adjoining; and he received for his own use an income at the rate of about £40 a year, derived from the "pew rents"—i.e., the sums paid by persons for the use during divine service of sittings in the pews of the said church. The said church building and land was situate in the Parliamentary Borough of Battersea (Clapham Division).

The claim had been duly objected to by one of the respondents, the main ground of objection being that, in the circumstances above stated, the claimant himself "occupied" the said freehold land and building in respect of which he claimed the county vote, and consequently, by virtue of section 24 of the Reform Act, 1832, was prohibited from having a county vote in respect of that property.

The revising barrister held this objection to be good, and disallowed the claim.

From this decision the claimant now appealed; the clerk of the county council and the objector were made respondents.

The case stated by the revising barrister was as follows:

"The vicarage of St. Thomas is a new district, parish, or chapelry, cut out of the new parish of Christchurch, in the ancient parish of Streatham, in the Streatham ward of the metropolitan borough of Wandsworth and the Clapham Division of the parliamentary borough of Battersea and Clapham. The claimant lives in the dwelling-house in the said parish of St. Thomas in the said parliamentary borough. The deed of consecration, dated the 21st of December, 1902, recites that whereas the minister, churchwardens, and certain inhabitants of the parish of Christchurch have represented to the bishop that by deed dated the 30th of March, 1899, made between Lees Knowles of the one part and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and their successors of the other part, a piece of land was conveyed to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and their successors to be held for the purposes of certain of the Acts of Parliament for building churches, and to be appropriated as the site of the then intended new church of St. Thomas with the surrounding yard and enclosure thereto belonging, and recites that a commodious building was erected thereon and completed and fit for divine service; that it was intended that the said church should be enlarged as soon as practicable, and that when so enlarged it would contain 850 sittings, of which 300 sittings should remain for ever free and unappropriated; that by deed dated the 1st of November, 1899, the right of the patronage and the nomination of the said intended new church of St. Thomas should be vested for ever in certain trustees parties to the last-mentioned deed, and recites that the said minister, churchwardens, and inhabitants of Christchurch have besought the bishop to consecrate the said building as and for a church; and the consecration deed then declares the said building duly consecrated. The said consecration deed contains no reference to sittings or pews save as hereinbefore stated. The claimant was duly inducted into the said vicarage by deed dated the 29th of December, 1903, which recites that the vicarage of St. Thomas, Telford-park, was constituted by an order of his Majesty in Council, dated the 9th of July, 1903, gazetted the 17th of July, 1903. I have informed myself of the contents of this Order in Council by referring to the Gazette. The said Order in Council states that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, acting in pursuance of 59 Geo. 3, c. 134; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 55, assign a district chapelry to the consecrated church of St. Thomas in the new parish (sometime chapelry district) of Christchurch. The boundaries of the district chapelry of St. Thomas are defined by the order. The order assigns to the minister of the said chapelry all the fees for marriages, baptisms, churchings and burials. This constituted St. Thomas a parish by statute. I saw in the Order in Council no reference to churchwardens or to sittings or pews. The freehold of the piece of land, constituting the site of the church and the surrounding yard and the enclosure thereto belonging vested in the claimant on induction as vicar of the said new parish by statute. The church has not been enlarged since the date of consecration. The church is fitted with sittings or pews consisting of rows of benches open at the ends, and fixed on the floor, each bench is numbered and has room for several sitters. Sittings are let one or more to any person applying for same, they are let for half a year, and not longer, no pew or seat is sold outright. The sittings are let in writing specifying the number of the pew or sitting and the price. No such writing or copy thereof was produced to me. The sittings are let for use during the ordinary public services only and not for additional or special or semi-private services; and if the seatholders are not in their places at the commencement of divine service the claimant, or those acting for him, can put strangers into the seats that are let but not occupied. The letting of sittings is actually done by the churchwardens; the claimant's churchwarden collects the seat money and hands it over to the claimant, less the cost of collection, for the claimant's own use and benefit. The amounts collected from letting the sittings do not appear in any of the accounts of the parish of St. Thomas. All the sittings are letable, but in fact many are untaken, although to let. There are no declared free places in the church at present. The scale of rent for sittings is fixed by the claimant in consultation with the churchwardens. The receipt of pew rents has been so far at the rate of £40 a year. Before the claimant was instituted or inducted to the living a number of questions were put to him in print or writing, and he answered them, returning the paper to the registry of the diocese. Some of the questions related to the sources from which the claimant's income might come, and the claimant made it plain by his answers to the said questions that he should look to his seat letting for part of his income. Income derived from letting of sittings is uncertain and fluctuating, and greatly dependent on the circumstances of the people and the character and ability of the vicar. There is no residence attached to the church. There is no glebe or tithe, there is no income from land unless as or save as hereinbefore appears. No documents were produced in court save copies of the consecration and induction deeds before mentioned, and a copy of the forms of declaration and oaths usually made or taken before institution. No evidence or proof of right to charge for sittings, or of an assignment of pew rents, save as above was given. I find as a fact that there has been no assignment of pew rents whatsoever to the said new church, or vicarage, or benefice. I am of opinion that neither the churchwardens nor the claimant have or has any legal right to reserve, for money to be paid to the claimant, any seats in the church, and that the price could not be recovered in an action. The churchwardens are under the circumstances aforesaid the claimant's agents. The claimant and the churchwardens are acting in good faith, and the said letting is, under the circumstances, not unreasonable. Similar letting of seats, outside the law, is practised in several churches of new parishes in South London to the knowledge of the bishop and other ecclesiastical authorities. In the greater number of new parish churches in South London there is no letting of seats. The parishioners of the claimant's parish do not contest or dispute the letting of seats by the claimant. The letting is likely to continue in the near future in the parish, and an income of over £10 will continue to the claimant from this source. The claimant occupies as owner the said freehold land, and the said land and the church building, and also occupies as tenant or owner a house in which he lives in the said parish (all within a parliamentary borough) of such value as would confer on him the right of voting at parliamentary and other elections for the said borough in respect of a £10 tenement qualification. The claimant's case was based solely on the pew rents. It was contended by the objector that the pew rents were unlawful, as there was no statutory or other authority or sanction for charging for the pews or sittings; and the income was in its nature too fluctuating and uncertain, and that under the circumstances there was no income and receipt sufficient in law from land within the parish such as to entitle the claimant to a parliamentary county vote in respect thereof. Further, in the alternative, that the claimant was in occupation of land alone, or land and building, of sufficient value to confer on him the borough vote, and that under section 24 of the Reform Act he could not successfully claim the county vote, and that the subsequent statute exempting ecclesiastical buildings from rating did not affect the question; and that the claimant could not sever the property occupied by him as owner and tenant so as to get two votes—I held (a) that the claimant's freehold land is of the value of £10 a year and upwards, and that he has a yearly income of that amount from the said land, and that the said income derived as aforesaid is sufficient in law to confer the freehold vote; (b) that he occupies the land within the meaning of section 24 of the Reform Act. I disallowed the claim and struck out the claimant's name and the names of seven other persons who were objected to for the same reasons and under similar circumstances."

REEVE v. CLERK OF THE SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL.

This was the appeal of the Rev. Arthur Reeve, whose claim to a county vote for the same division was disallowed on the same grounds.

The claimant was the vicar of St. Peter's, a new parish cut out of the ancient parish of Croydon pursuant to the Church Buildings Acts. The parish of St. Peter's was constituted about the year 1854. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners settled a scale of pew rents and assigned pews to be let by the churchwardens, and directed the churchwardens how the pew rents should be dealt with. They collect the money and pay the vicar.

The barrister was of opinion that in this case the pews and sittings at St. Peter's were let by the churchwardens, and the rents were collected and expended by them as public parish officials, pursuant to statutory authority, and not as agents or servants of the appellant; saving in this respect the revising barrister found that there was no material difference in the facts of this case and the preceding one.

The two cases were argued together.

Daldy and J. de Montmorency, for the appellants in both cases.—Each of these vicars (the claimants) though owner of a freehold estate in the land on which his parish church stands, is not an "occupier" thereof within section 24 of the Act of 1832; and the receipt of the pew rents does not constitute an occupation of the freehold: Beswick v. Alker, 21 W. R. 272, L. R. 8, C. P. 265.

They referred also to Griffen v. Deighton, 5 B. & S. 93; Capell v. Aston Overseers, 8 C. B. 1; Burton v. Aston Overseers, 8 C. B. 7.

Roskill, K.C., and W. Casson, for the respondent objectors in each case.—In each of these cases the freehold of the church building and the land on which it stands is vested in the vicar as owner, and as the vicar also receives for his own use the pew rents—a profit arising out of the freehold—he must be deemed to be "in occupation" of the freehold: Robson v. Hyde, Caldecott 310, at p. 315; Rex v. Agar, 14 East 256. The right of the churchwardens to the possession of the pews is subordinate to that of the vicar: Phillimore Ecclesiastical Law (2nd ed.), 1463-4. The vicar could maintain an action for trespass against a churchwarden for entering the church and interfering with the pews: Jones v. Ellis, 2 Young & Jervis 265.

Daldy replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—The following written judgment of the COURT was read by

KENNEDY, J.—The question for our consideration in the first case is whether the revising barrister was right in holding that the appellant "occupied" within the meaning of the Reform Act, 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 24, the land situate within the parliamentary borough of Battersea in respect of which, as a freehold of the requisite yearly value, the appellant has claimed to be placed upon the list of voters for the Wimbledon division of the county of Surrey.

The facts which are really relevant appear to us to be few. The appellant is the vicar of St. Thomas, Telford-park, Streatham. The vicarage was constituted by Order in Council dated the 9th of July, 1903. The deed of consecration of the church is dated the 21st of December, 1902. It recites the earlier deed bearing date the 30th of March, 1899, whereby the land on which the church was afterwards built was conveyed by the donor to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, for the purpose of the Church Building Acts, and as the site appropriated to the intended church; the building of the church, its intended enlargement, and the intended provision in the church, when enlarged, of 850 sittings, of which 300 should remain free and unappropriated. The appellant, as vicar, annually receives from the churchwardens for his own use and benefit the proceeds of pews which have been appropriated and let by them, to the amount of £40. The churchwardens collect the pew rents and deduct the cost of collection before making the payment of the receipts to the appellant. The case states the finding of the revising barrister that the churchwardens are the appellant's agents. The learned barrister appears to think that the collection of pew rents in this church is illegal. We are not prepared to adopt this view. The Church Building Acts, beginning with 58 Geo. 3, c. 45, make provisions for the letting of the pews and the employment of funds so raised in the payment of the incumbent: see Cripps's Law Relating to the Church and Clergy (6th ed.), pp. 412-419. The letting of sittings in this church, which was built under these Acts, was contemplated at the time of the deed of consecration, as appears from the recitals in that deed. It is true that neither in the deed nor in the Order in Council creating the parish do we find the special provisions relating to pew rents intended by the legislation of the Church Building Acts. But if the point were material we should not find ourselves able, on this account, to hold that the collection of pew rents in this church was contrary to law.

The real question, however, which the case is intended to raise for our decision is whether or not the revising barrister was justified in disallowing the vicar's claim to a vote for the county on the ground that, within the meaning of the Reform Act, 1832, s. 24, he "occupied" the land—the land on which the church stands and the graveyard adjoining. As to this, the finding of the revising barrister as to the agency of the churchwardens for the appellant in regard to the collection and application of pew rents does not appear to us to be material. We are of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister should be reversed. The vicar has, no doubt, legal possession of the freehold. He has, even as against the churchwardens, the right to the keys of the church: Ritchings v. Cordingley, L. R. 3 Ad. & Ecc. 113. But to create an occupation there must be an actual as well as a legal possession. "Occupation includes possession as its primary element; but it includes something more. Legal possession does not of itself constitute an occupation. The owner of a vacant house is in possession and may maintain trespass against any one who invades it; but so long as he leaves it vacant he is not rateable for it as occupier. If, however, he furnishes it and keeps ready for habitation whenever he pleases to go to it, he is an occupier, though he may not reside in it one day in a year": per Lush, J., in R. v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee, 25 W. R. 827, at p. 829, L. R. 2 Q. B. D., p. 588. "Legal possession is not enough to make an occupier assessable to the poor rate": per Lord Esher, M.R., in Crowther Smith v. New Forest Union, Ryde's Rating Appeals, 1886-1890, 311. Is the legal possesion of the freehold in such a case as the present coupled with the receipt of pew rents sufficent to create an occupation? No case has been cited to us which so decides. In Beswick v. Alker, which was, in regard to the material facts, practically identical with the present case, there are dicta which tend the other way. Bovill, C.J. (L. R. 8 C. P., p. 268), said: "There is nothing to show that the respondent is in the occupation of any land. A right to receive pew rents is not an occupation of land." We do not think that the judgment can be claimed by the appellant as a direct authority in his favour, because, according to the view taken by all the judges who heard the argument, they felt themselves somewhat cramped by the meagre statement of the case. "With the scanty information we have," said Brett, J., "it must be taken that the claimant has such a freehold interest in these pew rents as would entitle him to a vote for the county, but for the objection put forward by the appellant . . . there is no statement here that the respondent occupies the church." Still, the dictum of Bovill, C.J., that the clergyman's right to receive pew rents—an interest which, in Ex parte Arrowsmith, In re Leveson, 26 W. R. 600, 8 Ch. D. 96, James, L.J., described as "a profit arising from the use of the freehold," and Thesiger, L.J., as "a profit derived from the benefice"—does not constitute an occupation of land is a weighty authority in the appellant's favour. For, unless such receipts of pew rents constitute occupation, it is difficult to see in what respect a person in the position of the appellant can be said to occupy the land on which the church stands, or to be more than merely its legal possessor. The respondent naturally relies upon the cases of Robson v. Hyde and Rex v. Agar. On the facts these cases are distinguishable from the present one. In neither did the land consist of the parson's freehold, but the question, which was one of rateability, arose in regard to the interest, coupled with the receipt of pew rents, in a parochial chapel; in the earlier case there was a building leased to trustees and used for services of the Church of England, in the latter a Methodist chapel. The respondent relied mainly upon the dictum of Buller, J., in the earlier of the two cases, which was decided in the year 1783. "This case does not resemble the case of a clergyman. But, if it did, I am very far from being satisfied that a member of the Established Church, a parson or vicar, who has the profits of the pews given him by the parish in increase of his benefice, is not rateable for such profits." The language of the learned judge clearly shows that he was not intending to express a confident opinion; and we are no means sure that, rightly understood, the dictum is really relevant to the matter we are considering. Clergy have always been rated for their tithes, and the learned judge may have meant that he was far from satisfied that, if a parish gave a parson the pew rents in addition to the tithe (or other payments or endowment in lieu of tithes), the amount upon which he should be assessed for rating purposes should not be correspondingly increased. In our view, the receipt of the pew rents in the present case shows, as its amount exceeds 40s. a year, a value in the freehold from which the pew rents arise, sufficient to entitle the appellant to the county vote in respect of his freehold, as was held by this court recently in Vickers v. Selwyn, 52 W. R. 153; but does not, either by itself, or taken in connection with the fact of the appellant's legal possession of the land and of the church which stands upon the land, constitute an "occupation" of land within section 24 of the Reform Act, 1832.

Holding this view of the case, we do not think it necessary to express any opinion upon the point, which has been suggested, that the occupation mentioned in the section must be taken to mean an occupation of property in respect of which a person is liable to the payment of rates, and that, inasmuch as since the passing of the Poor Rates Exemption Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 30), ss. 1 and 2, a church such as the one in question is not such property, there cannot be an "occupation" of a church by the parson within the meaning of the Reform Act, 1832, s. 24.

With regard to the second case before us, the circumstances, as appearing in the case stated by the revising barrister, are not in any substantial matter distinguishable from the circumstances of the first case, unless a distinction can be based upon the finding in the second case, that the pews were let and the rents collected by the churchwardens and expended by them as public parish officials pursuant to statutory authority, and not as agents or servants of the appellant. In our view this matter is not really material, and in reversing the decision of the revising barrister in this case also, we have nothing to add to that which has already been set forth in our judgment.

A married woman who was married to a foreigner with no settlement of his own went to live in the parish of Birmingham. Before a year had elapsed the husband left the parish, intending to return. The woman remained on, and ultimately became chargeable to the parish.

Held, following Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, L. R. 5 Q. B. 364, that she had become irremovable by virtue of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, s. 1, as amended by section 8 of the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, by which it is provided that no person shall be removed from any parish in which such person shall have resided for one year next before the application for the warrant for removal.

Case stated by the Recorder of Birmingham on an appeal by the Guardians of Tewkesbury to quarter sessions against an order for the removal of one Alice Alinquest and her four children from the parish of Birmingham to the parish of Breden in the Tewkesbury Union.

The recorder allowed the appeal and quashed the order for removal, subject to the stating of this case.

The case set out the following facts: The pauper, Alice Alinquest, is the wife of Charles Alinquest, a foreigner with no settlement of his own. They were married on the 6th of July, 1890, and the children, the lawful issue of the pauper and Charles Alinquest, are all of them under the age of sixteen years. Doris was born in August, 1892, at New York, in America; Rose was born on the 5th of January, 1898, in the West Bromwich Union; Hubert was born on the 17th of October, 1899, in the West Bromwich Union; and Charles was born on the 16th of April, 1902, in the Birmingham Workhouse.

The pauper Alice and her husband came to reside in the parish of Birmingham in January, 1901, and continued to reside there until the 20th of June, 1901, when the husband went to America to work for his brother-in-law, intending to send for his wife and children when he got settled. The pauper Alice heard from him several times, but he said he was not able to get work and had made up his mind to return to England. He had not returned at the date of the order of removal, but the recorder found as a fact that he did not desert his wife and that he had the intention of returning.

From the 20th of June, 1901, the pauper Alice, with her three children, continued to reside in the parish of Birmingham until the 27th of March, 1902, when she removed to the Birmingham Workhouse. She remained there till the 19th of September, 1902, when she went out and has not returned.

The pauper Alice was born in 1869, and is the lawful daughter of Robert Warner, who had obtained at the time that she attained the age of sixteen years, a settlement by residence in the Tewkesbury Union.

On the 3rd of September the Guardians of Birmingham obtained an order for the removal of the pauper Alice and her four children from the parish of Birmingham to the parish of Breden, in the Tewkesbuy Union.

The recorder held that the pauper Alice was irremovable from the parish of Birmingham by reason of her continuous residence there for more than one year prior and up to the date of the order of removal, and he adopted the reasoning of the judgments in the case of Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, 18 W. R. 787, L. R. 5 Q. B. 364, as applicable to the present case. He also held that section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), was a bar to the setting up of a derivative settlement from her father. He accordingly held that neither the alleged settlement of the mother nor of the children had been made out, and allowed the appeal and quashed the order of removal, subject to the following questions: (1) Was the pauper Alice Alinquest at the time the order of removal was made irremovable from the parish of Birmingham; (2) if not, was the pauper Alice Alinquest, or were any of her children, properly removable to the Tewkesbury Union.

The Guardians of the Birmingham Union appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and Pritchett, for the appellants. — The pauper here was removable. The husband would have become irremovable had he remained at Birmingham for a year, but this break in his residence prevents her from acquiring the status of irremovability. Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East, 18 W. R. 787, L. R. 5 Q. B. 364, is against me, but that case must now be considered overruled since Guardians of Medway Union v. Guardians of Bedminster Union, 38 W. R. 295, 14 App. Cas. 465. She must therefore be removed to her maiden settlement, as here she could not acquire a derivative settlement from her husband, he having none. Three of the children, being within the age of nurture, follow their mother, and the fourth, being under the age of sixteen, is removable or irremovable as the pauper is removable or irremovable. Section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act has not really altered the case: Guardians of Reigate Union v. Guardians of Croydon Union, 38 W. R. 295.

He also referred to Reg. v. Guardians of Bridgnorth, 31 W. R. 938, 11 Q. B. D. 314; and Guardians of Dorchester Union v. Guardians of Poplar Union, 36 W. R. 706, 21 Q. B. D. 88.

R. C. Glen, for the respondents.—It is admitted that Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East governs this case. It is said that case has been overruled by Guardians of Medway Union v. Guardians of Bedminster Union, but there the husband had a settlement. The words of Blackburn, J., in the St. George's-in-the-East case cover this case exactly.

(a.) Reported by ALAN HOGG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Macmorran, K.C., in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—I am of opinion that the decision is right, and substantially for the grounds that the learned recorder has stated. The short ground, if I may so call it, upon which I wish to decide this case, is that in substance I think the learned recorder was right in saying that the principle of the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East applies. I myself am not able to see that that case is indirectly, certainly no directly, overruled by the House of Lords' judgment in the Medway case. It is not referred to in any of the judgments, and I cannot see anything that makes the reasoning upon this part of the case inconsistent with anything which the House of Lords' have said. The reasons which Blackburn, J., gives, and which I will not repeat, I venture respectfully to adopt as being to my mind conclusive in a case in which a husband has left a wife but not deserted her—under circumstances which are found as a matter of fact not to amount to desertion—and when the husband has left the wife under circumstances which are found as a matter of fact to indicate an intention to return, and when the husband could not be removed. I do not like to even venture on the expression, acquiring a status of irremovability, because I am not sure that that might not be used against me hereafter. I think Blackburn, J., points out very good reasons why the wife, who has in fact resided long enough to become irremovable, should not be removed. That seems to me to be part of the reasoning of the St. George's-in-the-East case, which I adopt, and which I think is sound. Had the husband been here for twelve months, then Lopes, L.J's, judgment in the Medway case, would have applied directly. The wife would then have acquired the status of irremovability by virtue of having resided with her husband for a period of twelve months. But it seems to me that we ought to find clear, plain, and distinct language to hold that a wife who has in fact resided twelve months shall be removable to her maiden settlement in a case in which a husband not having deserted her and meaning to come back, cannot himself be removed. I think it is pretty plain that the wife does not come in within either the original proviso to section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, or section 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1848, which replaces that proviso. If it is right that the wife could only be removed when the husband can be removed, then the position is pretty clear. I share the difficulty which Blackburn, J., felt in construing that proviso. All I have to decide in this case is this: Here the woman comes within the enacting part of the first section of the Act of 1846; she does not come within, in my opinion, the terms of the proviso as I understand it. Therefore it seems to me that unless it is necessary to hold that Mr. Pritchett's contention is right—namely, that you cannot consider at all what has been happening to her during the period of coverture when she has been residing with her husband—she cannot be removed. There are no words in the enactment which make it necessary to adopt that contention; and inasmuch as the husband could not be removed, I think that those who claim the wife should be removed, fail on the principle Blackburn, J., has laid down in Reg. v. St. George's-in-the-East. This woman having resided here, there is no state of things which would have made the husband removable if he had been here, and for the present purposes—whether you call it the status of irremovability or not being able to remove him—it leads to the same result—namely, that the wife cannot be removed. I think this appeal must be dismissed.

WILLS, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. It is admitted by counsel for the appellants that unless the St. George's-in-the-East case is overruled it governs this case. Now I understand the reason for supposing it is overruled by the case of Medway Union v. Bedminster Union is that the reasoning in the former case was partly founded on Reg. v. Glossop, and the train of reasoning by which Reg. v. Glossop was arrived at—though not the decision itself—is said to have been overruled by the House of Lords. But the decision in Reg. v. Glossop has no bearing on the facts of this case, and there is obviously material difference between the case where the wife has a derivative settlement by reason of her husband's settlement, and where she has none by reason of her husband having no settlement at the time when she is residing in the parish. Under those circumstances we are, as it seems to me, driven to look at the very words of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, as amended by the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, and the words are that no person shall be removed, nor shall any warrant be granted for the removal of any person from any parish in which such person shall have resided for one year next before the application of the warrant. It is true that in one sense there is a difference between her residence before the husband goes away and after he goes away, because after he goes away he himself has broken his residence, and therefore she cannot tack on simply as a wife, her residence after the break by the husband to that which she had before he went away; and she cannot therefore claim to have acquired the status of irremovability on the ground that her husband had acquired it. There is no decision, and if there is not a decision I do see why we should make one, to prevent her tacking on the residence during the time she had no settlement — when she had no settlement by reason of her husband not having a settlement — with the residence which she had afterwards after her husband had gone away. It is not at all like the case of the wife who becomes a widow, in which case it was held that where the wife had the settlement as long as she was a wife she could not tack on residence afterwards of her widowhood. The two cases are not analogous, and inasmuch as there is no decision which makes it imperative upon us to say that she has not resided for the period of twelve months, it is better to follow the language of the Act and say that she has resided for the necessary period. The late decision in the West Ham Union v. Holbeach Union is not without bearing upon this matter, because it does show that residence may be completed for the purpose of conferring a status of irremovability where the first portion of it was under a different capacity from the second. As it seems to me, there being no express enactment or decision which militates against this view, the residence may be considered as complete within the terms of the statute, and as conferring the privilege of irremovability. Although I follow what my lord has said about the husband being, I will not say irremovable, but its being impossible to remove the husband on other grounds if he were there, I prefer to put my judgment upon the ground that I have put it—namely, that the two periods may be tacked together, because I do feel that there is a very considerable difference between the position of a person who cannot be removed because there is no place to which he can legally be removed, and the position of a person who otherwise might be removed, and who had a place to which he could otherwise be removed, but who has acquired the protection of irremovability by reason of residence in one place for a sufficient period.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion upon the facts, which, I think, are important, and which are found thus: The woman is the wife of a man who has no settlement of his own, the man has left her, not deserting her, and with the intention of returning, and therefore he is in the position really—in a sense—of being treated as still residing in the parish of Birmingham. Under those circumstances, before she became chargeable the position of the pauper is that of a married woman with her children, who has resided for the statutory period, which would confer upon her the status of irremovability, if she could be treated as an independent personality. Is she, when she becomes chargeable, to be taken away to her maiden settlement at Tewkesbury, which is the settlement of her father, which she acquired through him; or is she to be treated as being chargeable to Birmingham, where she is and where she has resided for the statutory time, and where she is the wife of a man who has not deserted her, who intends to come back to her and her children, and who only for the time is absent? As I understand it—if one may venture to hope one understands the principles on which a great deal of complex legislation has taken place—there two important things, not to separate husband and wife and not to separate children from parents. We may assume that as far as possible the Legislature has not consciously enacted legislation which has violated those governing principles. Now what has happened here? The husband has no settlement of his own, therefore the wife cannot take a settlement from her husband. She has resided herself as a married woman, it is true, a sufficient time which would otherwise give her a status of irremovability, and if she is removed to the place of her maiden settlement then there will be a grave question, to say no more, as to whether the children will be able to follow her or will be planted—as I think Mr. Pritchett happily put it—in various spots; and certainly she will be separated from her husband, because her husband has no settlement where she had. He has no settlement anywhere in fact, and the whole family would be, as it were, sent floating about to various points that they might be directed to. Now, if the husband had a settlement there could be no question his settlement would be the wife's also, but where the husband has no settlement what happens? That is answered by Blackburn, J., in the St. George's-in-the-East case, and it is admitted that unless that judgment could be treated as overruled the learned recorder was perfectly right in the judgment he came to in this case. But it was said that that case was overruled and should be treated as overruled in a number of cases, finally by the judgment of Lord Watson and the reasoning in the Medway case. I confess myself I entirely differ. I see no trace of the St. George's case having been overruled directly or indirectly in any of the cases, including the last. On the contrary, I think the point emphasised by Lord Watson in that judgment, where he asserts his affirmance of Lopes, L.J.'s, view in the Court of Appeal, turns on the fact, absent in this case, where the husband had a settlement, and where that is so the wife follows that settlement, and you must obey that. That does not exist here.

Then can it be said that the Act of 1876 has modified either the grounds upon which Blackburn, J., proceeded or has altered any statement of his as to what he finds the law to be? That really is not suggested. It is again practically admitted, and rightly admitted, that the legislation so far as the case of wife and husband is concerned has not affected the statement of law upon which Blackburn, J., based his judgment in that case. If I may add, it seems to me, as I stated in the beginning, it is the only position which can be reasonably consistent—where the husband has no settlement—with the great object of keeping the family together and keeping husband and wife together; subject to this, that if the husband has a settlement of his own the wife must follow his settlement.

Infant—Maintenance—Contingent legacy—Legacy from parent to child—Contingent life interest—Right to surplus income and accumulations—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 43, sub-sections 1, 2, and 3.

A legacy given by a testator to his infant child, made contingent on the infant attaining twenty-one, bears interest for the maintenance of the infant, if, and for such period as, no maintenance is expressly provided. But all that the infant is entitled to have is maintenance, and he does not take any immediate vested interest in the income, so that should there be a surplus not required for maintenance, the surplus does not become the property of the child or pass to his personal representative if he dies a minor, but is regarded as an accretion to the corpus of the contingent legacy. Nor does the setting apart of a fund by the testator to answer the contingent legacy alter the character of the child's interest therein, but subject only to the right of maintenance thereout of the child, the income of the fund so set apart ought to be accumulated and added to corpus.

Consequently where a life interest in a legacy was given to a child, contingently on such child attaining twenty-one, the child was held entitled only to the income of the ultimate fund arising from the original fund and the surplus accumulated fund combined. By sub-section 2, of section 43, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the persons for whose benefit surplus income, after providing for maintenance is to be accumulated, are the persons who become entitled to the corpus of the fund set apart.

This was an appeal from the decision of Joyce, J.

The testator, E. S. Bowlby, by his will, dated the 17th of June, 1898 (inter alia), bequeathed to each of his sons (other than his eldest son, A. S. Bowlby) "who should attain the age of twenty-five years" the sum of £50,000.

And he empowered his trustees to apply the whole or such part as they in their discretion should think fit of the legacy of £50,000 so given to each of his younger sons "for or towards his maintenance, education, or benefit" during such time as such son should be under the age of twenty-five years.

During the suspense of vesting of such legacy the income thereof was to be accumulated, so as to follow the destination of the legacy from which the same had proceeded, but with power to apply any such accumulations in any subsequent year for or towards the maintenance, education, or benefit of such son in the same manner as such accumulations might have been applied had they been income arising from the original legacy in the then current year. The trust for accumulation was to cease at the end of twenty years from the testator's death in case any such son should not then have attained a vested interest in his legacy.

And the testator bequeathed to each of his daughters who should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry with the consent (if marrying after his death) of her guardian or guardians the sum of £50,000, "provided that the legacy of £50,000 hereinbefore given to each daughter of mine who shall attain the age of twenty-one years or marry with such consent as aforesaid shall not vest absolutely in her, but shall be retained by my trustees and held by them upon the trusts hereinafter declared concerning the same." These trusts were to invest the legacy and to pay the income to the daughter for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death upon trust for her children or remoter issue as she should by deed or will appoint, and, in default of and subject to any such appointment in trust for all or any the children or child of such daughter who being sons or a son should attain twenty-one, or being daughters or a daughter should attain that age or marry, if more than one in equal shares.

And the testator authorized his trustees at any time or times and at their discretion to appropriate any part of his personal estate in its then actual condition or state of investment in or towards satisfaction of any legacy given by his will or by any codicil thereto, with power for that purpose conclusively to determine the value of such part of his estate in such manner as they should think fit, and after such part of his estate should have been so appropriated the testator declared that his residuary estate, as well real as personal, should be discharged from the said legacy to the extent of the value as determined by his trustees under this power of the part of his estate so appropriated. And the testator devised and bequeathed the residue of his personal estate and all his real estate not thereby otherwise disposed of unto and to the use of his son A. S. Bowlby. And the testator directed that immediately after his death his trustees should take such steps as should be requisite in order that all children of his who should not have attained the age of twenty-one years on the day of his death might be declared wards of the Chancery Division, and that, "notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, all powers, whether statutory or otherwise, as to the education, maintenance, or advancement of such children or any of them while minors shall be exercised by my trustees only under the direction of the said court." The testator appointed his son A. S. Bowlby, T. W. S. Bowlby, and H. R. Wilson executors and trustees of his will.

The testator died on the 4th of November, 1902. There survived him his eldest son, A. S. Bowlby, who had attained twenty-one, and four daughters and three younger sons, all of whom were still infants.

On the 6th of January, 1903, the trustees, under the power contained in the will, appropriated, in satisfaction of each of the legacies of £50,000 to the four daughters and the three younger sons, the sum of £53,547 10*s.* 6d. Consols.

On the 9th of February, 1903, an order was made by Joyce, J., that the sum of £1,000 per annum be allowed out of the income of her legacy to the eldest daughter, Eva Mary Bowlby, for her maintenance from the 4th of February, 1903, and for the time to come during her minority, or until further order, and other sums were allowed for the maintenance of the other infant children respectively.

Eva Mary Bowlby attained twenty-one on the 13th of July, 1903.

The present summons was taken out by the trustees as plaintiffs against Eva Mary Bowlby as defendant to determine whether the unapplied income accrued during the minority of the defendant of her £50,000 legacy and the accumulations thereof should be paid and transferred to her, or whether they should be retained by the trustees upon the trusts declared by the will of the capital of the said legacy.

Joyce, J., contrary to his own view, held that by reason of the decision of Buckley, J., in In re Scott, 50 W. R 454, [1902] 1 Ch. 918, he was bound to hold that the unapplied income and the accumulations belonged to the defendant, and made a declaration accordingly.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellants.—This appeal is really brought for the purpose of asking this court to review the decision in In re Scott, 50 W. R. 454, [1902] 1 Ch. 918. By sub-section 2 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, these accumulations are to be held for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property from which the same arise. Having regard to the use of the word property in sub-section 1, it is submitted that in sub-section 2 it is confined to corpus. The infant tenant for life, therefore, on attaining twenty-one, takes only a life interest in the surplus income accrued during her minority. In both In re Wells, 38 W. R. 327, 43 Ch. D. 281, and In re Humphreys, 41 W. R. 519, [1893] 3 Ch. 1, the gift to the infant was vested, not contingent on attaining twenty-one. Those cases were decided on the principle that the Conveyancing Act, 1881, did not make any alteration in the rights of infants; but here before the Act the infant would only have taken a life interest in the surplus income: Hodgson v. Earl of Beclive, 1 H. & M. 376, 11 W. R. Dig. 135. The infant here has no vested interest, but is only entitled to something in the nature of maintenance: Williams on Executors (9th ed.), p. 1285; Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), vol. 2, cap. xx., s. 4, p. 1257. The effect of the appropriation was to make the income accessory to the capital. In such a case the intermediate income goes to the person who becomes entitled to the capital: In re Medlock, 55 L. J. Ch. 738; In re Clement, 42 W. R. 374, [1894] 1 Ch. 665; and In re Woodin, 43 W. R. 615, [1895] 2 Ch. 309.

Wyndham v. Wyndham, 3 Bro. C. C. 58; Shawe v. Cunliffe, 4 Bro. C. C. 144; Harvey v. Harvey, 2 P. Wms. 21; Chambers v. Goldwin, 11 Ves. 1; Brown v. Temperley, 3 Russ. 263; Martin v. Martin, 14 W. R. 421, 1 Eq. 369; and Butler v. Butler, 3 Atk. 58, were also referred to.

Rowden, K.C., and Stokes, for Eva Mary Bowlby.—We submit that In re Scott was rightly decided. "Property" in section 43 is not confined to corpus; it can refer equally well to the income fund, and the person "who ultimately becomes entitled" thereto is, as in this case, the infant. But apart from the statute it is an established rule of law that a contingent legacy by a parent or one standing in loco parentis to a child carries interest, unless the testator has provided another fund for the maintenance of the infant: Carson's Real Property Statutes, p. 590; Simpson on Infants (2nd ed.), p. 267. In In re George, 5 Ch. D. 837, 25 W. R. Dig. 127, James, L.J., speaks of a contingent legacy as carrying interest. If this is so, the infant is entitled to the interest notwithstanding any expressions in the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as it was not intended by that Act to alter the infant's rights: In re Wells and In re Humphreys.

Heath v. Perry, 3 Atk. 101; Hearle v. Greenbank, 3

Atk. 695; and In re Moody, 43 W. R. 462, [1895] 1 Ch. 101, were also referred to.

Vaughan Hawkins, in reply.—Though a legacy given by a father to a child is often said to carry interest, yet the cases show that the courts allowed only maintenance which might or might not amount to the full interest on the legacy.

Pett v. Fellows, 1 Swans. 561*n*; Wynch v. Wynch, 1 Con. 433; Mole v. Mole, 1 Dick. 310; and Ellis v. Ellis, 1 Sch. & Lef. 1, were referred to in addition to the cases cited earlier in the argument.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 9.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case the question is, Who is entitled to the accumulations arising from the excess of interest over the allowance for maintenance pending minority now that the infant, Miss Eva Bowlby, has come of age and become entitled absolutely as tenant for life to the income of a fund, such life estate having been bequeathed to her contingently on her marriage or attaining the age of twenty-one? I do not think it necessary to read the clause in the testator's will under which Miss Eva Bowlby takes. It is sufficient to say that the testator made provision for his sons and for his daughters, and that the clauses under which the sons take and those under under which the daughters take are not the same, the clause in favour of the sons containing an express provision for maintenance, and the clause in favour of the daughters containing no such express provision.

Before dealing with the question, What is the established rule of construction of wills of parents who leave legacies to children, whether vested but payable at a future time, or contingent, but make no provision outside the legacy for the maintenance of the child between the death of the testator and the date when the legacy becomes payable, I will deal with the question whether section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, is applicable in the facts of this case, and what is its effect if applicable, and in particular with the question whether the decision of Buckley, J., in In re Scott, ought to be followed. Joyce, J., followed that decision, but against his own judgment. I do not think that, having regard to the decision in In re Dickson, 33 W. R. 511, 29 Ch. D. 331, section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, applies to the facts of the present case, because the infant, Miss Eva Bowlby, is not under her father's will entitled even contingently to the intermediate income of the £50,000 left to her by her father. Under her father's will she may, at the age of twenty-one, become entitled in possession to a life estate in the £50,000, with its accretion by the addition to the capital of the accumulations arising from the surplus income after providing maintenance; but she can never take the intermediate income as her property, or, if she can so take, the application of section 43 is excluded by the will expressing a contrary intention within the meaning of sub-section 3 of that section; for if by the will the intermediate income is her property, held for her by the trustees, it cannot be that it is to accumulate for the benefit of the person who ultimately becomes entitled to the property—that is, the capital—from which the accumulations arise. The only way in which the section can apply is, if it is construed as Buckley, J., construed it in In re Scott, Scott v. Scott, and read, as that learned judge did, the word "property" in sub-section 2 of section 43 as meaning either corpus or income, as the nature of the gift may require. If this construction is adopted, the application of the section will not be excluded by a contrary intention within the meaning of sub-section 3 of section 43. I have, however, great difficulty in adopting Buckley, J.'s, construction of section 43, because, as pointed out in Hood and Challis's Conveyancing and Settled Land Acts (6th ed.), p. 123, to hold "that 'property' might not mean 'capital' exclusively, attributes to the Act an intolerable degree of looseness in the use of language." Secondly, because of the cases relied on as supporting this view, In re Wells is a case where the child took a vested interest, and In re Humphreys is a case in which the court held that by implication there was a gift of an immediate life interest. It is, however, to be observed that Lindley L.J., at the end of his judgment in In re Humphreys, does give some countenance to the suggested construction of the word "property" in sub-section 2, for he says: "With respect to the case of In re Wells, which we were asked to overrule, I am of opinion that the decision was correct, having regard to the terms of the will and to sub-section 3 of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, which in that case, as well as this, excluded sub-section 2. It may be that that result, which I think it safer to arrive at by the aid of sub-section 3, can be reached without the aid of that sub-section by construing sub-section 2 as suggested by North, J., when that sub-section has to be applied to the case of a tenant for life becoming absolutely entitled to the income in possession. I have some doubt about this, but I desire to leave the point open until the necessity for deciding it arises." As to the suggestion that, assuming section 43 not to apply, the clause of the will requiring "all powers whether statutory or otherwise as to the maintenance, education, or advancement of such children while minors to be exercised by the trustees only under the direction of the court" amounts to a testamentary direction that section 43 shall apply, I cannot agree. It seems to me that, if section 43 applies by force of the statute, there is no need for words to that effect in the will; and if, on the other hand, section 43 does not apply, the clause above cited will not make it do so, because, ex hypothesi, there is no statutory power.

I propose now to deal with the question of the general law, under which the will of a father giving a legacy to a child either not payable till a future date, or contingent on the happening of a future event, is so construed as to make a provision for the child's maintenance, by making the child's legacy carry interest. There can, to my mind, be no doubt but that the language in the cases in which this canon of construction was first established is language apt for the gift to the child-legatee of interest on the legacy payable in futuro or contingently during the interval between the parent's death and the arrival of the time or the happening of the event on which the legacy is made payable. Thus, in Green v. Belcher, 1 Atk. 505, Lord Hardwicke says: "In such a case interest by way of maintenance would certainly be allowable in the meantime; it being a constant rule in equity, that wherever a legacy is given by a father to a child, as a provision for such child, though the legacy be payable at a future day, yet the child has an immediate right to the interest on the money; if the legatee was a stranger to the testator, it would be otherwise." The words in Beckford v. Tobin, 1 Ves. sen. 308, and Crickett v. Dolby, 3 Ves. 10, are all of a similar character. The child's legacy is said to "bear interest" or "carry interest." It will be found that this sort of phraseology is used equally in modern cases. Take, for example, In re George, in which James, L.J., says: "But the rule of law is well established that a contingent legacy does not carry interest while it is in suspense, except in the case of a legacy by a parent or one standing in loco parentis to the legatee; and that exception is subject to another exception, that the rule giving interest to the child does not take effect when the testator has provided another fund for his maintenance, so that the income of the legacy is supposed not to be required for the purpose." It will be observed that in none of these cases is the statement made that the presence in the will of a gift in futuro by a parent to a child gives the child during infancy a right to an allowance for maintenance out of the testator's estate. On the contrary, the statement invariably is that the legacy in such a case should "bear interest" during a period before it becomes payable. I think that it can hardly be doubted but that the reason why the courts of equity, deeming it impossible that a father who made a future provision for a child should intend the child to starve until the legacy fell in, gave effect to the father's presumed intention to provide for the maintenance of his child, by construing the will as directing that the future legacy should bear interest before it became payable rather than by finding in the will an implied direction that the child should receive reasonable maintenance out of the residue of the testator's estate, was that the courts wished to avoid the appearance of affirming a common law right in children to maintenance during infancy independently of the father's intentions as expressed in his will, and also desired, by making the maintenance payable out of interest on a legacy contingently coming to the child, to provide for the child out of the fruit of a fund which contingently was to come to the child, because to do this seemed to be to do less violence to the provisions of the will than simply to order maintenance to be paid out of the residue of the parent's estate. Primâ facie, maintenance ought only to be ordered out of the property of the child. To construe the will as giving the child at once, not contingently, interest for maintenance, complies with this primâ facie rule.

Now the logical consequence of this view would be that so long as the child lived, pending the interval between the father's death and the child attaining twenty-one, the child would be entitled to the whole of such interest, although it was for the court to determine whether the whole or what lesser sum should be allowed for maintenance. It does not seem to me that the practice of the court in fixing the amount to be allowed for maintenance negatives the right of the child to the whole interest, because the order of the court fixing the amount to be paid from time to time for maintenance was necessary not from anything to be implied on a proper construction of the father's will, but from the inability of the child or its guardian to give to the executors or trustees a valid receipt or discharge. It is said that the dictum of Sir W. Grant in Hanson v. Graham, 6 Ves. 239, is an authority for the proposition "that what is not taken out of the fund for maintenance must follow the fate of the principal"; and it is said that Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 363, a decision by the same judge, leads to the same conclusion. These cases, however, are both cases in which there was an express direction for maintenance. In Hanson v. Graham the legacy to grandchildren of the testator was a legacy of £500 apiece 4 per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities when they should respectively attain their ages of twenty-one years or day or days of marriage, and the direction was to lay out for the benefit of the grandchildren the interest, the whole of which was given till they should respectively attain twenty-one or marry. The legacy was accompanied by an absolute gift of the interest; whereas in Leake v. Robinson there was only a direction for maintenance out of the interest, and no gift of interest. These cases in which there is an express direction for interest, and in which the interest will or will not follow the fate of the principal according as the interest is or is not given to the child-legatee, do not seem to govern cases in which the interest is given in accordance with the rule of construction laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Green v. Belcher. Mr. Simpson in his book on the Law of Infants (2nd ed.), pp. 317 and 318, states generally that where an infant is entitled to the whole income of a fund given for his maintenance, whether absolutely or till the happening of a certain event, such part of the income as is not applied to his maintenance belongs to him absolutely or to his personal representative, as the case may be, and cites Webb v. Kelly, 9 Sim. 469, as an authority for the proposition. That case, like Hanson v. Graham, was a case in which there was an express direction as to maintenance, and the court held, as it did in Hanson v. Graham, that the gift was so worded as to constitute a gift of the income. Mr. Simpson says: "On the other hand, where the legatee is entitled not to the whole income, but to maintenance out of it, the surplus, after providing a proper maintenance, follows the fate of the principal whatever that may be, and does not pass to the personal representative of the legatee," and cites Hanson v. Graham and a number of other cases. But neither the proposition in the text nor any of the cases cited conclude the question as to what is the true construction of the father's will in cases where the father makes a gift in futuro or a contingent gift to a child for whose maintenance no provision is made outside the gift, nor the consequential question who will be entitled to the accumulations of interest not required for maintenance; and I can find no case anywhere which concludes these questions. It appears, however, that there is a strong opinion amongst equity lawyers that the accumulations in such a case follow the fate of the principal; but it has never been so decided, and this view certainly seems difficult to reconcile logically with the statements of those judges who laid down the canon of construction.

So far as the practice is concerned, it seems that the interest as it accrues is never carried to the account of the infant, and that there is no case, or at all events no reported case, in which the personal representatives of a child dying under twenty-one, or before the happening of the contingency upon which the legacy was payable, have obtained payment of the surplus interest accruing during the child's life beyond what was required for maintenance. This, of course, goes strongly to negative the child's right to such accumulations; but we did not have any case cited to us in which the accumulations of interest were ordered to be paid to a residuary legatee or the next-of-kin or the remainderman. I am only speaking, of course, of cases in which the interest became payable only by virtue of the rule of construction to which I am referring applied in cases of a legacy in futuro or a contingent legacy given by a parent to a child for whose maintenance there is no provision. I am not speaking of cases in which interest is expressly given and constitutes a part of the gift in futuro or the contingent gift. On the other hand, I find in the case of Wynch v. Wynch, that the Master of the Rolls seems to have been of opinion that if the father had not directed maintenance to be paid out of his personal estate his children would have been entitled to interest on their legacies eo nomine. Again, in Chambers v. Goldwin there was an express direction for maintenance of a daughter till twenty-one or marriage and a contingent legacy in case she should attain twenty-one, payable at and to carry interest from that time. The daughter married at eighteen, and her husband claimed and the court allowed maintenance between the marriage and the majority of the daughter at the rate of £350 a year. I do not know if the court expressly fixed the rate of interest or whether the £350 was the whole of it; but as the application was not made until after the maintenance had been given I suppose the case was dealt with as if the allowance had been made pending infancy. It is difficult, however, to justify the order except upon the ground that the court thought fit to treat the will as authorizing interest to be allowed on the legacy from the end of the period during which the testator expressly directed maintenance to be provided for the child until the child attained the age of twenty-one. It is difficult to suppose that the court intended to prolong the period during which maintenance should be allowed as such beyond the period defined by the testator. Martin v. Martin runs on the same lines, the maintenance given by the will being maintenance out of the testator's residuary estate until the son should attain the age of fifteen. There was also a legacy to the son of £6,000, contingent on his attaining the age of twenty-one. The son also took a share of the residuary estate. Wood, V.C., says: "I think, on the whole, the proper construction is, that maintenance should be allowed by payment of interest on the legacy"; and then, after saying that it must be implied, although the legacy itself is contingent that interest is to be given in the meantime, Wood, V.C., concludes: "Lord Eldon having thus decided (Chambers v. Goldwin), I am bound to give the plaintiff interest on one or other of his legacies, and he being entitled to both contingently, I must select that which will be most for the benefit of the infant; and declare that interest at £4 per cent. is payable upon the £6,000 legacy."

I confess that I have considerable difficulty in coming to the conclusion that this interest allowed by the court as a matter of construction on a child's legacy from its parent for the purpose of maintenance, ought to follow the fate of the principal. If the interest itself is contingent on the legatee attaining the specified age, of course the interest will follow the fate of the principal; but it is impossible to suggest that interest, which is to provide maintenance for the child, can possibly be contingent in this sense. The interest must be something which immediately and absolutely to the extent required can be applied to the use and benefit of the child. Now let me assume that such interest can only be called for to the extent required, and the child dies an infant. Why should the accumulations of this interest, as to which the testator has given no express direction whatever, be allowed on the legacy for the benefit of the remaindermen or other person taking by a gift over, who may be a middle-aged man or woman? But if the accumulations of interest are to go to the remaindermen this is the result. I could understand a construction of the testator's will under which the court simply held that the goodwill of the testator, evinced by his gift of a legacy payable in futuro or contingently, necessarily imported an intention by the testator to provide for the maintenance of that child out of the residue of his estate in order to give the child a chance of living till the contingency might occur. In such a case there would be no surplus; but unfortunately this is not the construction which the courts adopted; for again and again one finds expressions like that used by the Master of the Rolls in Harvey v. Harvey: "Yet the infant legatee ought to have interest allowed him during his infancy in order for his maintenance." The intention of the testator is to give interest on the legacy and to give it to the child himself. It seems to me that to give the accumulations to the remaindermen is altogether outside the intention imputed to the testator.

I wish now to say a few words as to the effect of a direction in the will to segregate a contingent legacy from the rest of the estate. I have not read the clause, but I may mention here that there is a direction in this will. It is a general direction applying to all the legacies. Now the case of In re Cotton, 24 W. R. 243, 1 Ch. D. 232, decided under Lord Cranworth's Act, shows that under that Act, where a legacy is of capital plus income, maintenance might be ordered out of income to which the child is contingently entitled as an accretion to capital. In re George shows that where there is a gift of the corpus, but not of the income, Lord Cranworth's Act does not apply. It seems to follow that if the case is one in which the income is applicable for maintenance it can only come within section 43 if the construction of the will is such that the intermediate income, as distinguished from maintenance out of it, belongs to the child. The direction to segregate a fund to provide for the gift is the equivalent of a contingent legacy of the fund plus its income. If you have a contingent gift of the fund plus its income, maintenance may be given, not because the infant is entitled to the income immediately on the testator's death, but because he is entitled to it on the happening of the contingency. But in the present case the daughter is not entitled to the intermediate income on attaining the age of twenty-one. She is only entitled to the income of the capital fund increased by the accretion of the accumulations. If section 43 does not apply, the result is that she is only entitled to that which she gets by the true construction of the will in which a father gives a gift in futuro, or a contingent gift to a child, without providing for its maintenance in the period intervening before the attainment of the age or the occurrence of the contingency. If that to which she is so entitled is the interest, she is entitled to that, not contingently, but immediately on her father's death. But if that is a true description of what she is entitled to, then in respect of that interest she is brought within the scope of section 43, because that property is property held by trustees in trust for the infant for life, subject to a defeasance, as the words import, on her death, or by necessary merger on her acquiring the fund. The only effect of a direction for segregation and investment outside section 43 of the Conveyancing Act is to convert the contingent gift of the capital sum into a contingent gift of the capital sum plus the income, so that on the happening of the contingency the capital sum will be thus enhanced. Such a case is merely Hanson v. Graham. The enhanced capital will all go the legatee on the happening of the contingency; and if there is a mere direction for maintenance this will, of course, leave the income to follow the fate of the capital, except so far as it is applied for maintenance. I agree that a direction for segregation will have this effect in the present case so far as the legacy is concerned. It makes the legacy, upon a true construction, a contingent gift of the capital plus the income, but then it is not followed by a direction for maintenance. The fact is that, having regard to the legacy being a contingent legacy to a child for whose maintenance no provision is made in the interval between the death of the father and the happening of the contingency, the legacy must be read as though it contained these additional words: "And I direct that my daughter shall be allowed interest on the legacy during her infancy." The result is that the case is exactly on all-fours with what Sir W. Grant held to be the true construction of the express words in Hanson v. Graham—that is, that, inasmuch as the direction for maintenance in that case was coupled with an express gift of the whole of the income to the children, in such a case the income, though given for maintenance, did not follow the fate of the principal. Sir W. Grant expressly declares that the form of the legacy was such as, apart from the direction for maintenance, would have constituted a contingent gift of the capital plus the income—that is, this was a gift which could have equally been effected by a gift of the capital plus a direction for segregation; but, notwithstanding this, he held that as the direction for maintenance, properly construed, constituted a gift to the children of the interest, the interest did not follow the fate of the principal. So that, here I say that, if the construction put by Lord Hardwicke, Lord Eldon, and others on the will of a parent amounts to a gift of the interest to the children, that interest will not follow the fate of the principal. If my view of this construction put by Lord Hardwicke is right, a direction to segregate not affect the general law on this point; and then, so far as section 43 is concerned, if the case does fall within the section, either Buckley, J.'s, view in In re Scott is right, or if it is not, the gift of the interest to the child is a contrary intention within sub-section 3 of that section. The whole question really is, What was the construction put by Lord Hardwicke, and other judges following him, on the will of a father in such a case? So far as their words are concerned, I think that they construed the will of the father as giving the interest to the child independently of the happening of the contingency. I am told that the practice of the court has been to take a different view of what these judges meant, notwithstanding the fact that down to the present day the language of every judgment which I have seen speaks of the legacy to the child "bearing" or "carrying" interest. But I feel that, sitting as I do here, I am bound to follow the practice of the court. The result will be that the decision of Joyce, J., which he gave against his own judgment will be reversed, and this appeal will be allowed.

ROMER, L.J.—Before dealing with section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, I desire to make some remarks on the law (apart from that section) concerning a legacy given by a testator to his infant child made contingent on the child attaining twenty-one years of age. It is of course well settled that if and for such period as no maintenance is expressly provided for the infant by the testator, the legacy will bear interest for the maintenance. But the fact that the legacy is to bear interest for such a purpose, though it may be and often is shortly referred to by saying that the legacy "bears interest," does not make the legacy the less a contingent one or put the infant into the position of having an immediate vested life interest in the income of the legacy. All that the infant is entitled to is to have the maintenance. And the authorities show that the court is not bound to order that the legacy shall bear a greater rate of interest than is necessary for that maintenance. In Roper on Legacies (4th ed.), vol. 2, p. 1257, it is stated: "The court determines the quantum of the allowance, either the whole of the usual interest allowed by the court, or less, according to circumstances"; and at p. 1290, "maintenance being in fact another name for the whole, or a proportion of the interest on the legacy"; and in Chambers v. Goldwin the court in fact made such a legacy, during a period when the infant daughter was under the rule entitled to interest for maintenance, bear interest at a rate less than 4 per cent. per annum; and it does not appear that during the period any further interest was allowed by the court in favour of the legatee, though she attained twenty-one and became absolutely entitled to the legacy. It is possible that other like cases may be found. But the court has undoubtedly a jurisdiction to provide for the legacy carrying the full 4 per cent. interest, even though at the commencement of the infancy the child may not require the whole; and I think this is the course often adopted of late years, probably because the child as it becomes older may, for its maintenance, want the full interest, and even to have recourse to the surplus of past years. But, notwithstanding this practice and whatever may be the reasons for it, I see no sufficient ground for holding that the court has lost its right not to order payment of the full 4 per cent. in a case where there is no need for the full interest for the purposes of the maintenance. In cases where the full 4 per cent. interest is called for, the court may order it or parts of it from time to time to be applied in or towards the maintenance of the child; but, except so far as the orders of the court are concerned, or the interest may have been applied or may be required for maintenance, the child has acquired no vested interest in the interest; and should there be a surplus during the infancy not covered by any order of court, and not required for maintenance, that surplus does not in my opinion become the property of the child, but is regarded as an accretion to the corpus of the contingent legacy, and the child cannot obtain it unless he attains twenty-one years of age, and so becomes absolutely entitled to the legacy. Accordingly, so far as I can find, there is no case reported, and certainly no case is known to me, where the legal personal representatives of a child dying during infancy have obtained payment of the surplus accruing during the child's life. Nor is it the practice of the court to carry over the surplus to the separate account of the child. The practice is to treat the surplus as appertaining to the corpus of the legacy, so that the child on attaining twenty-one may apply for the legacy and accumulated surplus together. The views above expressed are clearly set forth in the judgment of Sir William Grant, M.R., in Hanson v. Graham, where he was pointing out the difference between a direct gift of interest on a contingent legacy and the right to maintenance, and, referring to the argument before him that what he ultimately held to be a true gift of the interest was more like a gift for maintenance, he says: "On the other side it was contended, that the interest is not so given as to bring it within the general rule, but what is given is more like maintenance. It is true, it has been held, that has not the same effect as giving interest; upon this principle, that nothing more than a maintenance can be called for, what can be shown to be necessary for maintenance however large the interest may be; and therefore what is not taken out of the fund for maintenance must follow the fate of the principal; whatever that may be." This principle has, so far as I am aware, always been acted on by the court in cases like those I have been considering; and in the case of a child dying under twenty-one the surplus ought to go to those whose funds have provided it, seeing that the interest was only payable for maintenance.

I will now consider the case where a testator for the purpose of providing a fund for a contingent legacy sets apart and creates a trust of certain personal property. In that case, apart from any special provisions to the contrary by the testator, and apart from any question as to maintenance, the income would be added to the corpus, and the legatee could only claim it if and when he became entitled to the corpus. See, for example, the cases referred to in the judgment of Chitty, J., in In re Clements. If, then, in the case where a fund is so set apart the legatee becomes entitled to maintenance, it follows that, subject only to the right of maintenance thereout of the child, the income ought to be and will be accumulated and added to corpus. And if the child dies during the infancy the surplus of the income up to the time of the death remaining after complying with the order of the court, and after providing for any sums still required for past maintenance, will not belong to the child's legal personal representative, but will pass to those entitled to the corpus of the fund. For the setting apart of the fund and the right of the child to maintenance out of the income did not change the contingent nature of the child's legacy. The child did not acquire a vested life interest during minority in the income. Accordingly, after providing for maintenance, the court does not order the surplus income during infancy to be carried to the separate account of the infant. Nor has it ever, so far as I am aware, ordered any surplus accruing during infancy to be paid to the child's legal personal representatives on the child dying while still a minor.

I now come to the circumstances of the present case. The testator has authorized his trustees to set apart out of his personal estate a sufficient fund to answer (inter alia) the legacies given by him to each of his daughters on her attaining twenty-one years of age or marrying with the consent (if marrying after his death) of her guardians. But those legacies are settled by the will upon trust for the daughter for life, and after her death upon trust for other persons whom I will call the remaindermen. The authority to the trustees to set apart has been acted upon by them in the case of the respondent Eva Bowlby. Now, apart from any question as to the right of that daughter to maintenance, and apart from the question as to the true construction of section 43 of the Act of 1881, this setting apart did not alter the contingent nature of the legacy. It did not make the life interest of the daughter begin before she attained twenty-one or married. The daughter, apart from her right to maintenance, acquired no vested interest in the income, and, so far as the income is not applied for her maintenance, it must in my opinion be held upon trust to accumulate as part of the contingent legacy, and this whether the daughter, though only tenant for life of the fund and notwithstanding the special provisions of the testator's will, is entitled to maintenance because she was the child of the testator (a point I need not decide) or because of the provisions for maintenance in section 43. This being so, unless there be something to the contrary in section 43, on the daughter attaining twenty-one, so far as the income set apart was not required or applied for her maintenance, it became part of the corpus of the legacy, and the daughter only became entitled to the life interest of the fund regarded as a whole.
